Portman Says 2008 Budget Includes "More Transparency." White House budget director Rob Portman, on CNN's Late Edition (2/4, Blitzer) said, "Our '08 projection, frankly, is just sort of a straight-line projection. We're assuming that the Iraq military operations will continue pretty much as they are. We, of course, hope that that's not the case. … We're giving Congress exactly what Congress asked for on a bipartisan basis, more transparency as to our costs and more information."

National Parks Would See Increased Spending. USA Today (2/5, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "National parks would be a big winner under…Bush's 2008 budget, and a plan to match up to $100 million annually in private donations could guarantee increases for a decade. Bush's budget, being unveiled today, would give the National Park Service $2.4 billion next year, administration officials told USA TODAY." That "includes a $258 million increase for daily operations, up 14.5%. Since 2002, those funds have risen 1.5% above inflation. The president proposes adding at least $100 million a year for the next 10 years. The funds would be used to hire 3,000 seasonal park rangers, guides and maintenance workers each summer, an increase of more than 50%. In addition, more than 1 million children could be enrolled in youth programs."

Bush To Fund Federal Program To Ease Traffic Congestion. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A6, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports, "With much of his domestic agenda stalled by Congress…Bush is embracing a new cause he is hoping will cross party lines and leave him with an end-of-term accomplishment: easing rush-hour traffic." In his budget, Bush "intends to showcase a highway 'congestion initiative,' according to White House documents, with grants for state and local governments to experiment with anti-jam strategies." In "a surprise that could foreshadow how Mr. Bush might reach out to Democrats -- and disappoint conservatives -- for the rest of his term, the centerpiece of the traffic plan involves an initiative that some critics say amounts to a tax, a plan depicted by administration officials as 'congestion pricing.' The administration will award $130 million in grants starting this spring to help cities and states build electronic toll systems that would charge drivers fees for traveling in and out of big cities during peak traffic times. The money also could go to other congestion strategies such as expanded telecommuting, but administration officials make it clear they think congestion pricing is the most powerful tool they have. The White House will seek an additional $175 million for congestion initiatives in next year's budget."

Analysis Predicts "Bonanza" Underpinning Bush Budgets, Strong Economy "Must" End. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A1, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that since he became president, Bush has "boosted annual defense spending by 50% -- including $500 billion over five years for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan -- and doubled spending on homeland security. At the same time, he's cut taxes, expanded Medicare to cover prescription drugs, approved $100 billion to clean up after Gulf Coast hurricanes, and signed bills that spend a little more each year on domestic programs. For years, critics said it couldn't last, backed by some historical precedent: President Johnson is blamed by many for triggering inflation in the 1970s by spending on both guns and butter." But "this time, it's been nearly painless. Inflation is in check. The federal budget deficit is down from its 2004 peak, and rests near its historical average of 2% of gross domestic product, a measure of the nation's total output. Long-term interest rates are relatively low. What's Mr. Bush's secret?" The Journal adds, "Ingredient one: strong revenue growth driven by an economy distinguished by surging profits and rising incomes at the top, which are taxed more heavily than incomes at the bottom. Ingredient two: tax cuts and spending increases, which arrived when the US economy needed a boost. Ingredient three, and perhaps the most significant: the willingness of foreigners to lend to the US, which finances the budget deficit without pushing up interest rates at a time when Americans don't save very much. … No one knows when this bonanza might end, although end it must. … For now, the budget the president will offer today essentially counts on continued good luck."

Democrats Hope To Finance Agenda By Cracking Down On "Tax Gap." The New York Times (2/5, Andrews, 1.16M) reports congressional Democrats, "hoping to finance an ambitious agenda without raising taxes, are on a collision course with the Bush administration about pursuing the potentially vast amount of money that people hide from the Internal Revenue Service." House and Senate Democrats "say the government could collect as much as $100 billion more a year by whittling the tax gap — the unpaid taxes, mostly on unreported earnings, that the I.R.S. estimated was about $300 billion a year." But the Treasury Department, "which oversees the I.R.S., says it cannot realistically recover one-tenth as much as Democrats suggest." On Monday, "as part of President Bush's budget proposal, the Treasury Department will unveil more than a dozen proposals to pursue tax cheats. But officials said those ideas would bring in less than $10 billion a year in extra revenue." The issue "may have new urgency with the Democrats now in power and driving the considerable momentum behind it." Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel "has cited the tax gap as a top priority for increasing revenue, ahead of any discussion about rolling back President Bush's tax cuts. Democrats badly want the money because they have adopted strict 'pay as you go' budgeting rules that require Congress to pay for any new programs or tax cuts with revenue from other areas."

Advocates Complain That Fewer Low-Income Seniors Get Free Drugs. USA Today (2/5, 5B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Eight months after Congress implored pharmaceutical companies to restore programs offering free drugs to needy Medicare recipients, advocacy groups say that some patients are still having trouble. 'Before the Medicare program, we had close to 4,000 seniors getting free drugs,' says Patricia White, executive director of the West Virginia Health Right clinic in Charleston, W.Va. 'We're probably down to 400 now.'" The issue "arose after many drug companies halted their assistance programs for Medicare-eligible patients once Medicare's drug benefit began last year. The drug companies feared running afoul of federal anti-kickback rules if they did not. Since then, Medicare officials and other regulators have said such programs can be set up in a way to avoid violating any laws. Currently, some drug companies, including AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline, Merck, Pfizer and Wyeth, offer help to Medicare members. Income limits and other rules vary, as do which drugs are covered. Dozens of other drugmakers, however, bar Medicare-eligible patients from assistance programs."

Bush Reportedly Looking To Truman As Model. Newsweek (2/12, Bailey, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article titled, "Inside Bush's Fixation With Harry Truman," reports that in a meeting with congressional Democrats after the midterm elections President Bush "compared his situation to the crisis Harry Truman faced in the early days of the cold war. Then, as now, Bush said, the United States confronted a dangerous ideological foe. Truman had answered with the Truman Doctrine, a vow to protect free peoples wherever they were threatened with communist domination. Truman's policies had been unpopular in their time, but 'history showed he was right,' said Bush, according to Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate. The Truman comparison didn't seem quite right to Durbin. … Bush's grasp of history may have been a little shaky, but there is no doubting the force of his conviction. Bush wants his legacy to be the long-term defeat of Islamic extremism."

"Resentment" Said To Drive Some Negative Media Coverage Of Bush. In his Washington Post "Media Notes" column (2/5, C1), Howard Kurtz writes, "These days, many in the media seem to be writing off President Bush." Are "pundits giving us the unvarnished truth, that we are witnessing the historic collapse of a presidency? Or is this the triumph of quick-draw, poll-driven journalism? … Some of the journalists who are especially aggressive in their coverage of Bush like him in private settings, where the president has a joshing manner and enjoys handing out nicknames. But professional resentment may still be behind some of the increasingly negative coverage," stemming from "Iraq, where the media fell down on the WMD debate," and "to Bush's 2000 campaign persona as a compassionate conservative." On both respects, "many journalists now believe they were led astray," and "that has given an extra edge to their stories and columns."

Top International-Policy Advisor At Treasury To Resign. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, Price, 2.04M) reports, "The US Treasury Department's top international-policy adviser, Timothy Adams, is resigning after seven years with the Bush administration. … In his resignation letter, Mr.

Adams said his responsibilities to his wife and three young children were 'incompatible' with the job's demands. Since becoming undersecretary for international affairs in 2005, Mr. Adams has spent much of his time traveling to more than 40 countries. He previously was chief of staff to former Treasury Secretaries John Snow and Paul O'Neill."

DOD To Furnish Pelosi With Jet For Coast-To-Coast Flights. Roll Call (2/5, Van Dongen) reports, "The Defense Department has agreed to furnish House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) with a jet big enough to fly nonstop coast-to-coast, despite complaints from some Republicans that the request was causing friction at the Pentagon." Drew Hammill, a spokesman for the Speaker, "said Friday that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for 'clarification' on rules governing her use of military planes. After Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker was granted access to military transport for additional security, given the person in that job is third in the line of succession to the presidency." The plane "used by former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for frequent trips back to his Illinois home was a small, Lear-type jet, according to a Republican leadership aide. But that plane needs to refuel every 2,000 miles and could not make the nonstop haul to California."

Federal Government Faces Retirement "Brain Drain." The Financial Times (2/5, Knight) reports the US Federal Government "faces a massive talent drain in the coming years as many senior government officials reach retirement age and fewer bright young people opt for careers in public service." About "90 per cent of senior managers in federal government are eligible to retire in 10 years, and more than 40 per cent of all federal employees will be eligible for retirement by 2010, according to the Council for Excellence in Government, a non-partisan research group." At the same time, "fewer young people are choosing to work for the federal government. Many top US colleges and public policy schools report that the number of graduating students going into public service has decreased."

Aging Workforce Prompts DOD's Recent Job Shadow Recruitment Day. The Washington Post's (2/5, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that during the recent Information Technology Job Shadow Day at the Defense Department, "The first questions were right to the point: Is there a lot of paperwork in applying for a federal job? What's the easiest way to get a security clearance?" The Post adds, "Like other" agencies DOD "is concerned about its aging workforce. The department has about 69,000 technology professionals in its civil service ranks, and officials estimate that 10,000 will be eligible to retire at the end of this year. Not all of them will leave, of course, but Defense officials are looking to the future and want to make sure that teenagers understand the importance of math, science and English courses as building blocks for technology careers. For the job shadow day, the Pentagon revved up briefings and tours worthy of visiting dignitaries." The Post adds, "Tour stops for the students included the National Military Command Center, which links the defense secretary to other top government leaders during emergencies; the office of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates (who was not in); the Pentagon courtyard; and the 9/11 Memorial Chapel. One group of students started their Pentagon day with a "talk show" segment taped by the Pentagon Channel, the in-house TV and Web broadcast service."

Krugman Says White House Has Built "Patronage Machine." In his New York Times column (2/5), Paul Krugman says, "Under the guise of promoting a conservative agenda, the Bush administration has created a supersized version of the 19th-century spoils system." The "blueprint for Bush-era governance was laid out in a January 2001 manifesto from the Heritage Foundation, titled 'Taking Charge of Federal Personnel.'" Heritage "demanded that politics take precedence over know-how: the new administration 'must make appointment decisions based on loyalty first and expertise second.' Second, Heritage called for a big increase in outsourcing — 'contracting out as a management strategy.' This would supposedly reduce costs, but it would also have the desirable effect of reducing the total number of civil servants." The "ostensible reason for politicizing and privatizing was to promote the conservative ideal of smaller, more efficient government. But the small-government rhetoric was never sincere: from Day 1, the administration set out to create a vast new patronage machine."

Requiring Banks To Bid For Student Loans Proposed. Michael Dannenberg and Phillip Longman, both of the New America Foundation, argue in the Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K) that student loan interest rates and subsidies for banks could likely be "a lot" lower if Congress would "make lenders bid for the right to sell federally guaranteed student loans." Banks "could compete by offering the highest bid for the right to sell guaranteed student loans to designated schools or by agreeing to accept the lowest amount of subsidy." The experience of Missouri's recent sale of some student loans "suggests that taxpayers could save $15 billion to $20 billion over the next five years if Washington relied on market mechanisms instead of backroom politics to establish subsidy rates."

Consensus Grows That Census' Race Categories Should Be Dropped. In the New York Times' editorial observer (2/5), Brent Staples says, "A growing number of demographers and historians who are fully sympathetic to the civil rights struggle would probably be happy to see the word 'race' disappear from the census as well. There seems to be an emerging consensus that the system of racial classification that has dominated national politics and the census for nearly two centuries is so fraught with imprecision — and so tainted by racist ideas that have been disproved by science — that it should eventually be dropped altogether." This view "has been percolating among census historians for years. But it has gained traction since the 1990s, when there was a pitched battle over a proposal that would have added a 'multiracial' category to the 2000 census. A compromise allowed people to check more than one box for race. But that change only fueled the debate by revealing a conflict between the fixed racial categories that have long dominated American life and a different sense of identity that's clearly on the rise among younger Americans."

WSJournal Says Bush Trade Policy Benefits Exporters. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "President Bush's trade promotion authority expires in a few months, and along with it the ability to strike new free-trade deals. So it's worth highlighting that some of the fastest-growing destinations for American products are the countries with which we've signed trade-opening accords." According to the US Trade Representative's office, "U.S. goods exports have climbed by some 26% among the 10 countries with which the U.S. has signed accords since 2001. Meanwhile, goods exports to the rest of the world have only grown by 13% across the same period. The differential is even larger over the 12 months through November 2006 for new free-trade partners Australia, Chile, Jordan and Singapore. U.S. exports to those nations rose at a rate of 40.5%, compared with 14.4% to the rest of the world. No doubt this reflects the commodity (copper) boom in Chile, where, for example, Caterpillar has been able to double its exports of heavy equipment." The "new trade 'populists' in Congress like to claim that US exporters are getting a raw deal from Bush trade policy. As the export facts show, the truth is precisely the opposite."

NYTimes Says FDA News More Drug Regulatory Power. The New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) reports the Food and Drug Administration "is making encouraging moves to strengthen its regulation of drugs that are already on the market. But the changes fall far short of what's needed to protect millions of unsuspecting patients whose adverse effects may show up only after years of use." The FDA had "already been moving to strengthen its safety assessments but now has developed a more comprehensive approach." Even so, Congress "needs to give the agency more money and more teeth: including explicit powers to impose conditions on drugs that begin to look risky, to require additional testing and even to yank drugs from the market."

Democrats Urged To Back Teacher Accountability Standards. Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (2/12) writes, "It's time to move from identifying failing schools to identifying failing teachers. Sounds obvious, but it hasn't happened in American education. … Each political party is about half right. Republicans are right about the need for strict performance standards and wrong in believing that enduring change is possible without lots more money from Washington. Democrats are right about the need to pay teachers more but wrong to kiss up to teachers unions bent on preventing accountability. As President Bush's flawed (but landmark) No Child Left Behind (NCLB) program comes up for reauthorization this year, the onus is on Democrats. Will they cave to their party's biggest special interest -- or do what most of them acknowledge in private is essential?"

OTHER NEWS:

"Vibrant Economic Boom" Provides Rare Good New For Bush. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Pethokoukis, 2.03M), in an article titled, "A Bounce For Bush Steady interest rates and an expanding economy give the president some good news, for a change," reports, "It's not really too surprising that George W. Bush's visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange last week marked only the second time that a sitting president had made such an appearance. … After all, most politicians probably think it's better to be seen as a representative of the common man and Main Street than of shiny-suited financiers and Wall Street. But Bush's big problem right now is that instead of Main Street or Wall Street, he might be more associated with Haifa Street." According to US News, "Wall Street's not a bad alternative for an embattled president dealing with a foreign policy nightmare, especially when he can talk up what's turning out to be a vibrant economic boom."

Analysts Say Housing Slump Not Yet Over. USA Today (2/5, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Housing is proving to be one of the biggest wild cards in the economy in 2007 as analysts are deeply divided about whether the worst in the downturn is over or there is much more pain to go. Only 9% of economists say the housing decline ended in 2006, according to a USA TODAY survey of 55 economists taken Jan. 18-24. Another 42% said the downturn will end in the first half of the year, and 45% said housing will bottom out in the second half." USA Today adds, "When housing bottoms out is key for the economy. Thus far, the fallout has been small. The economy grew at a faster pace in 2006 than in 2005 even though sales of previously owned homes fell 8.2%, the biggest drop in 17 years, the National Association of Realtors says."

On its front page, USA Today (2/5, 1A, Knox, 2.27M) also reports, "Renters be warned: Landlords are expected to raise apartment rents for a third-straight year in 2007, forcing tenants to turn over a growing chunk of their pay and making it harder to save for a home, a report to be issued today by Marcus & Millichap finds."

House Democrats Expect Wave Of GOP Retirements In 2008. Roll Call (2/5, Duran) reports, "The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is watching more than two dozen House Republicans for signs they are ready to call it quits in 2008. The Democrats believe a wave of Republican departures can help them cement their House majority. … Given the GOP's new minority status in the House, Democratic strategists think some veteran Republicans will head into retirement while some younger Members will opt to run for other offices. Democrats also believe that ethics scrapes could force a handful of GOP incumbents from office." For 2008, "even though many of the 27 districts in question are notable for their Republican tilt, House Democratic strategists, emboldened by wins in the previous cycle in Republican territory such as Kansas and close calls in GOP bastions such as Wyoming, believe they can put many open seats in play."

Rothenberg Analyzes House GOP Prospects In 2008. Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (2/5), "Most surge elections, during which one party makes sweeping gains in the House of Representatives at the expense of the opposition, have been followed by a surge back toward the other party two years later. Will the 2006 elections produce the same snapback, with substantial Republican gains, or can Democrats minimize their losses, securing their control of the House after next year's presidential election? … Former Republican Congressmen Charles Bass (N.H.), Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Jim Leach (Iowa), Anne Northup (Ky.), Rob Simmons (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.) didn't lose because they were terrible candidates. They lost because they were in marginal seats or in districts carried by Al Gore in 2000 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. It will be very difficult (though obviously not impossible) for the GOP to retake those districts." It also "seems unlikely that GOP open seats that went Democratic in November in Iowa, Colorado, New York and Arizona suddenly will snapback to the Republicans." Republican "chances of reclaiming seats lost in 2006 undoubtedly are strongest in fundamentally Republican and conservative districts. That means that Democratic House freshmen such as Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Nick Lampson (Texas), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and possibly Jerry McNerney (Calif.) are at greatest risk. In addition, a couple of Democratic incumbents who almost lost despite the strong wind at their backs -- Georgia Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall -- surely have to consider themselves at considerable risk."

questionnaire. All responses were anonymous. The most overwhelming response was that more than 80 percent of respondents said they believed the GOP could win a majority in the 2008 elections."

Cole Says NRCC Won't Take Sides In Primaries. Roll Call (2/5, Drucker) reports, "The National Republican Congressional Committee will not take sides in any House GOP primaries this cycle, NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) said in an interview Friday." Cole also "said that he will refrain from doling out personal endorsements and campaign contributions in primaries while he is chairman." Cole's decision "partly is due to the wishes of House Republicans, who in a recent closed-door meeting were fairly unified — and vocal — in their desire that the NRCC avoid playing kingmaker in contested primaries." But Cole also "attributed his policy to a belief that candidates who navigate a primary without help or anointing from Washington, DC, insiders emerge battle-tested for the general election and in a better position to secure the support of grass-roots Republicans."

Snow Encouraged To Run For Senate, President. The Washington Times (2/5, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "American Spectator senior editor Quin Hillyer thinks Tony Snow should consider a run for the US Senate" or for president in "2012 or even 2016 (he's only 51 right now)." Hillyer adds that "if Snow can't exactly pull off a race for president in 2008, there is another public office he ought to consider. Virginia's senior US Sen. John W. Warner will be just shy of 82 when the next election rolls around." The "notion piqued the interest of U.S. News & World Report's Paul Bedard, who went right to the source yesterday, asking Mr. Snow if he intended to pursue office. 'I am absolutely Shermanesque,' came the reply. 'After this job, the best I am likely ever to have, I'm going to do something that will enable me to spend much more time with the family.'"

McCain Said To Pass GOP "Tax Litmus Test" This Time Around. In his column in the Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K), Robert Novak says Sen. McCain, "who echoed Teddy Kennedy on taxes when he ran for president in 2000, sounds more like Jack Kemp as a 2008 candidate. 'I've never voted for a tax increase in 24 years,' he told me last week. 'Never, ever, not under any president, including President Reagan, and I will never vote for a tax increase, nor support a tax increase.'" McCain "wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent. ('If I didn't vote to make those tax cuts permanent, it would have the effect of a tax increase.') He supports radically scaling back the estate tax and does not now favor upper-income increases in the Social Security tax. McCain gets tax policy advice from conservatives, including supply-side founding father Arthur Laffer. 'I may have changed some of my views,' the senator said. 'You learn over 24 years.'" Novak adds, "Thus, McCain passes the Republican tax litmus test, as he did not in 2000. That may be why McCain has lost liberal journalists and other non-Republicans entranced by his campaign against George W. Bush."

McCain Defends New Aides Despite Past Clashes, Criticism. The New York Times (2/5, Times, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday that several aides brought on to his presidential campaign were 'good people,' despite his own past criticisms of their work for others in the past." Appearing on "This Week" on ABC, McCain was "asked about a front-page article in The New York Times on Sunday noting that Mr. McCain's political team includes advisers who tried to skewer him in the 2000 primary against George W. Bush. And Mr. McCain has brought on members of the team that produced the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement in 2004 questioning the Vietnam War service record of Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, which Mr. McCain had criticized." McCain said, "These are good people who were doing as they were instructed. They are people who shape the message, don't dictate it."

Giuliani's Position On Judges Said To Mollify To Conservatives. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (2/4, Wallace) said he thinks former New York city Mayor Rudy Giuliani will run for president and that the "conventional wisdom is well, once he gets in the race and everyone learns that he's pro-choice, and has a different view on gay rights and has been pro-gun control, that his support will collapse. I'm not so sure. This is a war election. The Democrats are going to be the anti- war party. … I think if Giuliani is conservative on judges, if Giuliani says look, 'I served in the Reagan Justice Department with John Roberts and Samuel Alito, they're the kinds of judges I'll put on the court, I might vote differently as a legislator on abortion, but let's not have the federal courts resolve these issues, let's give them back to the democratic processes in the states' -- if he makes that a very key part of his campaign -- his conservative view on judges -- I think he has a chance to overcome social conservative concerns." Kristol added, "But most social conservatives want to fight the war against jihadist Islam. If they think Giuliani can do that, they'll be open to him."

Hagel Says He Would Not Be An "Antiwar" Presidential Candidate. Asked on ABC's This Week (2/4, Stephanopoulos) if intends to run for president, Sen. Chuck Hagel responded, "I'll make that decision as time develops. But last point on this: I'm not an anti-war candidate. … Every member of the Congress should be engaged here, and their people that they represent should know where they stand. If they want to continue to send young men and women to fight and die in Iraq, then they should step forward and explain that position and why. If they don't, explain that. But to have a different position than the president's on a war doesn't qualify anyone to be an anti-war candidate."

Edwards Says His Healthcare Plan Would Raise Taxes. The AP (2/5) reports John Edwards "said Sunday his plan for universal health care would require higher taxes and cost up to $120 billion year." Edwards said, "The bottom line is we're asking everybody to share in the responsibility of making health care work in this country. Employers, those who are in the medical insurance business, employees, the American people -- everyone will have to contribute in order to make this work." Edwards added, "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes. The only way you can pay for a health care plan that costs anywhere from $90 (billion) to $120 billion is there has to be a revenue source." Edwards said "his plan would aim to provide health care coverage for the 47 million people who currently lack it and reduce the cost of health care coverage for middle-class families, partly by making health care programs more efficient."

Edwards Says Vote On Iraq War Was Mistake. The Washington Post (2/5, A4, Mosk, 690K) reports that of the "2008 Democratic presidential contenders who voted to give President Bush authority to wage war in Iraq, only one," John Edwards, "will have no chance to make a very public U-turn when resolutions opposing the president's new war plan come before Congress in the coming days." But Edwards "showed again yesterday that he will find other venues to parlay his Senate vote into an extended mea culpa." On NBC's "Meet the Press," Edwards said, "It wasn't just the weapons of mass destruction I was wrong about. It's become absolutely clear -- and I'm very critical of myself for this -- become absolutely clear, looking back, that I should not have given the president this authority." The Post adds Edwards's 'nationally televised admission was just the start of a lengthy public dissection of the errors he said he made in casting the most important vote of his Senate tenure."

Edwards was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/4, Russert) if Sen. Hillary Clinton is "morally bound to admit the war was wrong," Edwards answered, "If she believes that her vote was wrong, then, yes, she should say so. If she believes that her vote was right, then she should defend it. … If we believe it is morally wrong to escalate this war and it is strategically wrong to escalate this war, what I have said is it is not enough to give speeches, to talk to political pundits, to pass nonbinding resolutions. … I actually believe that what the president and Cheney are counting on is that what we'll do is we'll talk about it, we'll complain about it, we'll talk about how bad the escalation is, but at the end of the day, we'll go along. We cannot go along. We cannot enable this president to make another in a terrible series of bad mistakes." Asked he believes Clinton "has been open and honest about her support of the war," Edwards responded, "I don't know the answer to that question, honestly. I don't know what's inside her head and her heart about this. I can't tell whether there are political calculations going on. I just don't know."

Edwards Admits Obama Was Right To Oppose The Iraq War In 2002. Later in his Meet the Press interview Edwards admitted that Sen. Barack Obama was correct in opposing the Iraq war from the start but contended Obama wasn't "burdened like a lot of us with the information that we were receiving on the Intelligence Committee and as members of the United States Senate. We were getting very intimate, detailed information about what was actually happening in Iraq. … I was wrong" and "should be held accountable for that. But I do think it matters when you are willing to be open and honest with voters about what you've done."

Edwards Taking Sharper Tone In Second Race. The New York Times (2/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports Edwards, "faced with what he always knew would be a tough race against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination and now the challenge of convincing his party that he is also a better alternative than Senator

Barack Obama," is "trying to muscle his way past them and the rest of the field, in part by staking out early and provocative positions on the big issues." On Iraq, Edwards "not only came out for a complete withdrawal within 12 to 18 months, but he also challenged his Democratic rivals who are still in government to confront President Bush more directly. And on Monday, Mr. Edwards will set out a plan to provide health insurance to the 46.6 million Americans who do not have it, stealing a march on Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats on what is shaping up to be one of the biggest domestic issues of the presidential race." Edwards "has taken on a sharper tone since that campaign ended in defeat. He is campaigning as a harder-edged economic populist now, which he says represents more a change in tone than in substance. He says he is both more electable and more authentic than Mrs. Clinton, and more experienced than Mr. Obama." In the "battle to be the most credible alternative to Mrs. Clinton in the Democratic primaries, Mr. Edwards has built some early advantages. He has avidly pursued labor support."

Edwards Setting The Standard For Negative Campaigning Thus Far. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (2/12) writes, "Speaking to the Democratic National Committee after Sen. Barack Obama and before Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, [Sen. John Edwards] accused Senate Democrats (that is, Obama and Clinton) of caving in to President Bush's Iraq escalation policy. … Isn't it a little early to start calling your opponents cowards, even if you don't do it by name? Not this time: nasty is in season already. One reason is the insane money scramble, which literally raises the stakes. And with such a demographically diverse field, chances for emotional collisions abound." Fineman adds, "Going 'negative' on the war is tricky for Obama, who says he wants to walk the high road. … Edwards embodies the darker tone."

Obama Campaign Focusing On Message, Not Viability. The Washington Post (2/5, A1, Kornblut, 690K) reports in a front page story that in the "nearly three weeks since Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) made his unofficial debut as a presidential candidate, his senior advisers have been holed up in a temporary office on Connecticut Avenue NW, feverishly working to translate the huge excitement about his candidacy into a political strategy." For all "the buzz about his running, Obama did not enter the race with the conventional weapons of a presidential candidate -- a deep database of donors, a tactical road map for winning primaries or even a sign marking the entrance to his ad hoc campaign headquarters. Obama is only now starting to build a political infrastructure that matches his growing support." But the "challenge for Obama is not just assembling the nuts and bolts of a national campaign on the fly. He must, his advisers believe, do so in a way that reflects the distinct, next-generation message of his candidacy, or at least avoids making him look like every other politician in the race." In "contrast to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who spent the first two weeks of her official candidacy trying to project strength and inevitability, Obama will seek a more pared-down image that focuses on the substance of his message ('the audacity of hope,' as his book title put it) rather than on proving his ability to win a general election."

Supporter Urges African Americans To Back Obama. The Politico (2/5, Smith) reports a "key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians." The comments "by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists." Speaking to "more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC," Jones said, "How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" The Politico adds Jones, "a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like 'crabs in a barrel' the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community."

Gore Resisting Pressure To Seek Presidency Again. The Washington Times (2/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Al Gore is "basking in the global spotlight for nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar, but a growing number of Democrats want him to make another bid for the presidency." Gore said he is "interested in a 'different kind of campaign to try to change enough minds' to solve the global-warming problem, but that doesn't stop people from asking." On Friday, Gore "spoke to 1,500 Silicon Valley leaders gathered…for the annual 'State of the Valley' conference, hosted by Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network. The audience sent the Democrat questions via text-messaging during the speech. The first on the list, projected on jumbo screens to Mr. Gore's left and right: 'Will you run for president?'" Gore said, "I don't have any plans to run for president, but I appreciate the request.'" The Times adds, "Not everyone is convinced, and 'Draft Gore' movements are sprouting across the country." The "problem is that Mr. Gore doesn't seem to want to renew his political career, and nothing about his lifestyle suggests that he'll mount a bid. His friends and former advisers say privately that he is happy with his life as a somewhat regular -- albeit wealthy -- public figure."

Thompson, Vilsack Discuss National Issues. USA Today (2/5, Page, 2.27M) interviewed former Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Tommy Thompson of Wisconsin. Asked if they would vote for a Senate resolution in opposition to President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq, Thompson said, "I would vote against the resolution. President Bush was asked by the (Iraq) Study Committee, by the American public, by the electorate to try something different in Iraq. … We should give this opportunity a chance to work." Vilsack said, "The president's escalation plan is about to make a big mistake even bigger." Asked if the US should negotiate directly with Iran and Syria, Thompson said, "I believe strongly that the United States should take the leadership — not alone, but in conjunction with all the European countries that support our philosophy, our way of government, Japan and our allies. (We should) have a conference, have a summit and develop a unified position. America cannot do it alone." Vilsack said, "We have made a mistake over the course of the last several years in not having direct discussions with Syria, Iran, and North Korea. We in all areas have made situations that were quite dangerous be more dangerous." Asked if they "support providing a way for illegal immigrants to gain legal status while remaining in the USA," Vilsack said, "I think these folks should have to pay a fine. I think they should have to pay back taxes, because that's only fair to the rest of us. I think they should be put at the back of the line, given no preference, and be given the opportunity to earn their way to citizenship." Thompson said, "They have to go back to their country and apply. They've got to go to the back of the line and allow those individuals who come into this country legally really to have preference."

Romney Still Dogged By Questions About His Stands On Social Issues. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "In his stump speech…Mitt Romney makes no mention of hot-button issues like abortion or the role of religion in politics. But when the speech is finished, the Republican presidential hopeful is swarmed by reporters asking only hot-button questions: Will conservative voters believe that the formerly pro-choice ex-governor of Massachusetts is now antiabortion? How did he make the conversion? Will evangelical Christians back a devout Mormon like Romney? Romney…insists that voters are more concerned with other issues, like 'How are we going to beat the jihadists? How are we going to be competitive with Asia? How to improve our schools and healthcare.' And yet answering those hotter-button questions may hold the key to whether Romney has a shot at winning the Republican nomination."

Kerry Seen As Lingering In Disappointment Over 2004 Loss. The New York Times (2/5, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports a "Senate loner for 22 years," John Kerry "seems all the more isolated now as he darts past the media hordes around the next set of presidential seekers, colleagues that include Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama." Even in the "best of times, Mr. Kerry's face hung droopy and funereal, one of the most weary in American politics. Today, Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the exit poll president-elect for a few hours in November 2004, endures the peculiar pariah status that his party reserves for its losing nominees." As the 2008 campaign "begins in earnest, Mr. Kerry has been forced to adapt to something resembling a normal Senate life. This has been no small challenge for a man whose identity has long been steeped in becoming president, or trying to." The Times adds, "Yet to many eyes, Mr. Kerry will always be trapped in yesterday's news and lingering disappointment. He is a member of the tiny club that knows what it is like to lose an election to George W. Bush — to blow an election, by some accounts."

Clinton's Lifelong Ties To Minister Explored. Newsweek (2/12, Meadows, 3.12M) reports, "If Hillary Clinton and George W. Bush have anything in common, it is a deeply rooted wariness of outsiders. Both the president and the woman who hopes to succeed him have always relied on a small, closed circle of friends and advisers who have been with them for years. … There is another person on Hillary's shortlist of confidants who goes back farther than any of them, but whom you've probably never heard of. The Rev. Don Jones, a Methodist minister who is now 75, was perhaps Hillary's earliest spiritual and political mentor. She has written of her 'lifelong friendship' with him. It was Jones who first awakened young Hillary to the civil-rights movement and counseled her on questions of faith. They continued to be in touch as Hillary became a national figure. Years later, he helped her through the darkest period in her life, the aftermath of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky."

Clinton's Attempt To "Soften Up Her Image" Analyzed. U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (2/12) writes, "On her first foray into Iowa as a presidential candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton was clearly trying to soften up her image. 'I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience,' she said. 'The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom is part of who I am.' Wow. Could this be the same Hillary Clinton who told voters way back in her husband's first run for the White House that she wasn't just going to stay home and bake cookies? … The Clintons are a great reflection of the national zeitgeist. So don't take Hillary's appearance in Iowa in pastels lightly: It may mean we've come full circle, baby."

WPost Criticizes Clinton Campaign's Bundling Plan. The Washington Post (2/5, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "As she launches her presidential fundraising juggernaut," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) "is tasking her biggest financial backers to bring in $1 million or more for her campaign, the New York Times reported. Truth be told, for a fundraiser with a fat Rolodex of rich friends, this isn't quite as daunting as it sounds." While "the senator's not to blame for this state of affairs, the audacity of the $1 million target does evoke distasteful memories of the Lincoln Bedroom rake-it-all-in mentality of the Clinton presidential years. And the unwillingness of her campaign to commit to listing its big bundlers -- as President Bush did during both of his campaigns -- is appalling."

Schwarzenegger Complains About Lawmakers In New Recordings. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Nicholas, 850K) reports recordings "of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger bantering with aides in closed-door meetings reveal him complaining about lawmakers from both parties, casting some as obstructionist and two-faced." The recordings, "newly obtained by The Times, also feature him chatting about American resentment of illegal immigrants, about his taste for gas-hungry Hummers and about his wife's habit of tinkering with his speeches." The recordings "offer a rare window onto the governor's operation and a more complex portrait of Schwarzenegger than typically emerges in public, where his appearances are carefully stage-managed." In the "latest recordings, the Republican governor describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) as a 'very sick man' and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) as 'a political operator coming from the union background' who evinces no real 'passion' about issues. And he worries that a federal plan to build a fence along the Mexican border will send a troubling message."

Bush Rhetoric On Iran Echoes Iraq Stance. In an analysis, the AP (2/5, Raum) says President Bush's "tough new stance on Iran and his military buildup in the Persian Gulf recall some of the drumbeats that preceded the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. As then, the Bush administration is making allegations about Iran without providing proof." While Bush "insists he has no plans to invade Iran, only to protect US troops in Iraq," in recent days Bush "raised the US naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region; The administration confirmed that Bush has authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian agents who are plotting attacks on US forces; [and] the administration has armed Iran's Arab neighbors with Patriot missiles." Bush's "saber-rattling," the AP writes, "rather than reaching out to Iran and Syria diplomatically as recommended by the Iraq Study group and many in Congress -- is a risky strategy" and has lead "many national security professionals [to] suggest this approach could lead to wider conflict."

Report Warns Military Action Against Iran Would Be "Highly Dangerous." The Financial Times (2/5, Smyth) reports military action in response to Iran's atomic program would be "highly dangerous" with "diplomacy still an option," according to a report published today by Crisis Action, a group of British non-governmental organizations, think-tanks and trade unions. The report warns that "US or Israeli attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could lead to civilian deaths, radioactive contamination, heightened conflict in neighboring Iraq and Afghanistan, al-Qaeda attacks stemming from intensified anti-western feeling, higher oil prices and an acceleration of Tehran's nuclear program." Among those endorsing the report is Sir Richard Dalton, UK ambassador to Iran from 2003 to 2006, who said the report was "wagging a finger" to remind the British government that military action should be "a last resort in self-defense or to prevent an imminent threat."

Iranian Official Criticizes Administration For "Disinformation." In a letter to the editor of the New York Times (2/5, 1.16M), M. A. Mohammadi, press secretary for Iran's mission to the United Nations, writes, "The United States has now resorted to the soft power of disinformation about Iran by leveling false charges regarding Iran's behavior toward Iraq." Instead, he says that while Iran has "fully supported the new government in Iraq and has signed various trade and energy agreements with Baghdad, the United States government continues to demonize Iran and blame it for America's own failures." Mohammadi goes on to say that Iran "favors a strong, unified Iraq whose sovereignty is not constantly trampled upon by the intrusive Western powers. To this effect, Iran has responded favorably to Iraq's call for a regional forum to discuss the country's dangerous crisis."

Experts Urges Congress To Avert War With Iran. Leonard Weiss of the Center for International Security and Cooperation at Stanford University and Larry Diamond of Stanford's Hoover Institution write in a Los Angeles Times (2/5, 850K) op-ed, "Despite anguish and anger over the Bush administration's decision to escalate its failing war in Iraq, Congress is unlikely to cut off funding. … But nothing prevents Congress from using its power of the purse to prevent an American attack on Iran." They concede that Iran is "not innocent of dangerous and provocative behavior," but says "war is not yet justified, except in the minds of those who have been lobbying for it for years." Therefore, Weiss and Diamond urge Congress to pass "a law preventing the expenditure of any funds for a military attack on Iran unless Congress has either declared war with that country or has otherwise authorized military action under the War Powers Act."

India Faces "Delicate Diplomacy" In Talks This Week. AFP (2/5) reports India will engage in "delicate diplomacy this week during talks with Washington on a crucial civilian nuclear deal and with nuclear renegade Iran over energy and regional issues," analysts said. Energy cooperation will be "high" on Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee's agenda when he visits Tehran this week "amid growing US pressure on countries for tougher sanctions" against Iran. The two countries are "expected to discuss two multi-billion dollar gas deals including a pipeline that would cross Pakistan to help meet demand in energy-hungry India." Meanwhile in Washington, India's special envoy on the US nuclear deal, Shyam Saran, "is expected to conclude a deal that lifts three decades of US sanctions barring the transfer of civilian nuclear technology and equipment to India." However, US ambassador to New Delhi, David C. Mulford, last week warned that Washington "would be following Mukherjee's Iran visit."

Cohen Says Strong US-Indian Relations Should Include Military Cooperation. Former Secretary of Defense William Cohen writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) that the US-India relationship "emanates from shared values, interests and objectives," which "demonstrate that India and the US are ideal partners in exerting a positive influence in the 21st century." The "healthy relationship" between the two, he says, "serves as a working example of cooperation between countries of divergent history and composition." Specifically, Cohen writes that the recent US-India civilian nuclear initiative "has the potential to engender goodwill and partnership" and "finally removes the cinder from the eye, ending decades of misunderstanding and distrust about India's nuclear intent and capabilities." The "increasing strategic connections" between the US and India, he concludes, therefore "should progress to closer military coordination -- and cooperation."

Europeans Rethink Relations With US Amid Changes Of Leadership. The Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Marquand, 59K) reports Germans and the media "solidly" backed the decision to indict 13 CIA last week for "kidnapping a German of Lebanese descent and interrogating him in Afghanistan." The "solidarity" in Germany "underscores a shifting tone in Europe. As changes of leadership loom in Britain and France, and capitals contemplate relations with a post-Bush US, Uncle Sam may expect stronger 'pushbacks' from Europe, experts here say." Public disapproval of the US-led "war on terror" is "also growing, spurring the change." For example, Gordon Brown, who is shortly expected to take over as prime minister in Great Britain, "opposed the Iraq war from the start, and has made no secret that he plans to carve out an independent line on the venerable 'special relationship' with the US." Meanwhile, also "boosting this sentiment is Europeans' recognition that the US is also in flux with an election season starting up, and that President Bush's term appears to be winding down with the United States in a vulnerable position overseas."

Merkel Seen As Europe's "Most Commanding" Leader. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Fleishman, 850K) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel "can work a room, turning pragmatism into an erudite, diplomatic charm that has made her Europe's most commanding leader." Merkel is "rising in stature as British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac are set to leave office," and has "improved ties with the Bush administration even though Merkel has refused to send troops to Iraq and has criticized the treatment of terrorism suspects in US custody." Her government is also "attempting to revive Middle East peace talks, negotiate an end to the crisis over Iran's uranium enrichment program, improve links with China and build a unified Europe less driven by the traditional German-French axis."

Palestinian Truce Begins Taking Hold. The Washington Times/AP (2/5, Laub) reports on Sunday night "efforts were underway to restore a truce" between Palestinian factions as "gunmen pulled back from their positions" in Gaza and "both sides began to exchange hostages." Meanwhile in the West Bank, "a strategy session by Fatah leaders ended in a shouting match, with some participants demanding Abbas' party take a tougher stand against Hamas in the struggle for control of the Palestinian government, and others pushing to give a mediation effort by Saudi Arabia a chance." The AP says the "infighting among Palestinians has overshadowed new efforts to restart the peace process with Israel," with Israeli Deputy Premier Shimon Peres Sunday saying Israel must "leave Gaza to the Gazans."

The New York Times (2/5, A9, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the "fierce internal clashes between Palestinian factions have shocked many Palestinians and Arab governments, who fear that the continuing bloodshed is damaging the Palestinian image before the world, Palestinians say." Even as the Bush administration has moved recently "to try for significant progress toward peace, Palestinians say their own infighting is making it too easy for Israel to argue that the time is not right to promote a Palestinian state."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Mitnick, 59K) warns the violence between Fatah and Hamas "is threatening to spill over, as Fatah militants in cities such as Nablus embark on a series of kidnappings as a counterpunch to Hamas gains in Gaza." A "new West Bank battle front," it says, "would expose nearly twice as many Palestinians to the daily skirmishes that have kept Gazans shuttered indoors, and threaten to drag Israeli forces into the fray."

Saudi Shiites Fear Crackdown On Rights. The New York Times (2/5, Fattah, Al-Samh, 1.16M) reports, "With sectarian tensions rising between Sunnis and Shiites throughout the Middle East, and pressure growing on the Saudi government by the country's Sunni leadership, Saudi Shiites, who have made great strides in recent years, are worried that those gains will be rolled back." Despite recent advances, the Shiites' "hard-won rights have yet to be enshrined into law, meaning they could be rescinded at short notice." More recently, Sunni clerics have "stepped up their preaching against Shiites recently, declaring them again to be infidels. And earlier this week King Abdullah, speaking of rumors that Shiites are seeking to convert Sunnis, said that such attempts would fail, and that Sunnis would always make up a majority of the world's Muslims."

No Confirmation Of Al-Qaeda Casualties In Somalia Strike. The Financial Times (2/5, Wallis) reports Ethiopia is "working closely with the US to identify Islamist combatants killed in neighboring Somalia, but there has been no confirmation yet of the death of targeted al-Qaeda suspects," according Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Meles said the US had been "assisting with DNA testing on suspects killed in recent fighting," but "we do not have definite information on a number of the key al-Qaeda targets. There are reports that one or two of them might have died but we have no confirmation."

New North Korea Nuclear Weapons Talks Inspire Little Optimism. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Omestead, 2.03M) reports, "Like any good diplomat, Christopher Hill knows how to dampen expectations before sitting down to hash out a deal. But more than most envoys, Hill, the top U.S. negotiator in talks resuming in Beijing this week over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs, has ample reason to let some skepticism show. Fifty-two frustrating months into a confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear weapons programs, the six-nation talks established to rein in Pyongyang's atomic breakout have, so far, netted nothing. … Even advocates for negotiations increasingly suspect that, despite its decision to rejoin talks, the North has made a strategic choice to stick with nuclear weapons as the ultimate deterrent to any effort to dislodge Asia's most secretive and anti-American regime. Time, it seems, has been working against Hill and others seeking a deal: With Pyongyang's nuclear buildup and its seeming judgment that the administration is tied down by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may believe that he can wait out President Bush."

US Negotiator Says Pyongyang Must Live Up To Pledge. The AP (2/5, Lim) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Sunday said Pyongyang "must live up to its pledge to fully dismantle its nuclear program," as Japanese news reports suggested it "may be willing to shut down a key reactor." Hill, who was meeting with South Korean officials in Seoul to discuss negotiating strategies before the six-party talks resume in Beijing Thursday, said, "Frankly, we cannot accept anything less than 100 percent implementation of the September statement. The ultimate task for us is to complete denuclearization."

WSJournal Warns Against Releasing Frozen North Korean Funds. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) writes Beijing "rolls out the welcome mat" for Kim Jong-nam, the eldest son of dictator Kim Jong Il, who has been "living the high life at five-star hotels, gambling at Macau's famous casinos." His residence in Macau is "a reminder of another Macau-North Korea connection that Beijing would like to forget -- the laundering of ill-gotten North Korean money at Macau's Banco Delta Asia." As six-party talks resume Thursday in Beijing, Pyongyang "is demanding that the US lift sanctions on Banco Delta Asia and hand over the $24 million." Doing so, the Journal warns, "would only encourage Kim Jong Il in the pursuit of the illicit activities that make it possible for him to pay off the generals who sustain his regime -- and keep his son living it up in Macau."

Satellite Downing Complicates China's Effort To Reach The Moon. Newsweek (2/12, Liu, Carmichael, 3.12M) reports, "Western analysts still can't say what Beijing was thinking when it shot down one of its aging weather satellites. True, the recent test was a fine show of marksmanship, destroying a refrigerator-size target sailing at orbital speed 500 miles up (as high as U.S. spy satellites). But was it worth risking a new arms race? Was it even worth the mess it caused? … The drifting wreckage is a danger not only to other countries' spacecraft but to China's own ambitions for the heavens -- which go far beyond blinding the U.S. military. Beijing put its first man into orbit less than four years ago. Today the Chinese are reaching for the moon."

New UN Chief Off To "Rocky Start." The Washington Times (2/5, A1, Pisik, 88K) reports on its front page Ban Ki-moon is "off to a rocky start after one month as U.N. secretary-general, with diplomats complaining that his transition is progressing far too slowly and member states resisting his early proposals for restructuring." U.N. insiders have "questioned his early appointments, saying he is not striking out boldly with his own team, but relying too much on insiders from predecessor Kofi Annan's tenure." Such criticisms "have frustrated members of the transition team and worried Mr. Ban's early supporters."

UK Seeks To Contain Europe's Largest Bird Flu Outbreak. NBC Nightly News (2/4, story 7, 0:25, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "In Britain, nearly 160,000 turkeys are being destroyed in an effort to contain an outbreak of the deadly strain of bird flu. Health officials say about 2,500 turkeys died of the virus on a commercial farm northeast of London" owned by the country's largest producer.

The Financial Times (2/5, Cookson, Aglionby) says a "biosecurity zone has also been set up around" the farm "as a precaution against the deadly virus spreading." Brussels said Sunday that the UK had "followed the correct procedures in dealing with the outbreak and had informed it in good time." Meanwhile, the European Commission Monday will formally endorse the security cordon established by the UK, while an EU spokeswoman said she did not expect any internal or external pressure for a trade ban.

Survey Shows French Blacks Face Discrimination. The Washington Times (2/5, A1, Bryant, 88K) reports on its front page that France's "comfortable image of itself as a colorblind society -- already weakened by race riots in 2005 -- received a further blow last week when a new survey found that a majority of French blacks believe they face discrimination in daily life." Coinciding with a "disturbing television documentary about living as a black person in France," the survey by the TNS-Sofres polling agency is "the first of its kind and is galvanizing public debate just weeks before presidential election." The Times notes that French politicians in this year's presidential and legislative races "are beginning to grasp the potential power of the minority vote, particularly since a voter-registration drive has been stunningly successful in many low-income areas where minorities live."

Author Says Qaddafi "Deserves Sole Credit" For Policy U-Turn. Author Hisham Matar writes in the New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) that since 2003 Libyan diplomats "have been hard at work convincing the West that Libya is no longer interested in amassing weapons of mass destruction, blowing up Western airplanes or covertly financing armed movements abroad." Presenting this "new face," he says, "has been largely effective: sanctions, in place since 1982, have been lifted; Libya has been removed from the United States roster of terrorist nations; and the list of international trade agreements continues to grow." According to Matar, Colonel Qaddafi "deserves sole credit for Libya's foreign policy U-turn. He has never found it necessary to devote himself to a single political ideology; his only consistent policy has been to guard his personal political survival." The United States and Britain, Matar concludes, "understand this, but have only exploited it for their own myopic objectives, forgetting that Libya's political development can lie only with its people."

Mallaby Criticizes Chinese Ties With Sudan. The Washington Post's (2/5, A15) Sebastian Mallaby writes, "Last week China's leader, Hu Jintao, provided Sudan with an interest-free loan to build a presidential palace. With that gesture, Hu demonstrated his contempt for the Western understanding of the world -- and for Western policy toward his own country." By pursuing commercial ties with Sudan, Mallaby says Hu was "implicitly saying that economic development comes first and that political development is unimportant." This Chinese understanding of development, he continues, "threatens to undermine the Western one. Western development aid is increasingly linked to measures of good governance, and investment from Western corporations and banks comes with conditions designed to ensure that ordinary people benefit. This promising advance cannot succeed if African dictators can ignore Western conditions with Chinese assistance."

Aid Groups Urged To Put Pressure On Bangladesh. C. Christine Fair, managing editor of India Review, and Sumit Ganguly, a professor of political science at Indiana University in Bloomington, write in a Wall Street Journal (2/5, A17, 2.04M) op-ed, "With the world's attention focused on whether accountable government can take root in Iraq, the democratic life blood of a much larger Muslim country -- Bangladesh -- is seeping away with hardly a murmur from the international community." Bangladesh, which they say is becoming "a de facto military-controlled state," is also "responsive to public exhortation and receives significant international aid." Donor countries, they argue, "can achieve leverage if they coordinate and render some forms of assistance conditional." The country's army "must be reminded of this to discourage any extraconstitutional action -- and to teach it that the suppression of democracy cannot be a cost-free business."

New Russian Migrant Laws Criticized. The Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K) op-ed contributor Masha Lipman writes the Russian government "recently outlawed foreign migrant workers at Russian retail markets as of April 1. A similar restriction cuts out middlemen by requiring that at least half of all salespeople sell their own produce. The official rationale is that this legislation protects domestic producers. But this politically motivated, hasty decision is more likely to harm Russian consumers and further exacerbate the situation of migrant workers." However, Lipman says, "Such actions corrode what respect for law and lawmaking is left here. Local officials will probably think of ways around the restrictions, and some are sure to take advantage of new opportunities for graft. Still others expect that the absurdity of some provisions and the damage the law is inflicting on consumers will lead to its revision."

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 29

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 30

TERRORISM NEWS:

Abduction Case Drawing Little Attention. The Washington Post (2/5, A11, Whitlock, 690K) reports that while the decision to press charges against the CIA agents "won widespread applause last week from German politicians and the public," there has been "an awkward silence and no prosecutions in the parallel case of another German citizen, Mohammed Haydar Zammar, who was also covertly abducted in a CIA-sponsored mission" after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. However, "The difference: German agents were directly involved in the Zammar case, providing crucial information to the CIA about his travels and making a secret trip to Syria to interrogate him after he landed in prison there."

Congress Urged To Confront Administration On Surveillance Program. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/5), Shayana Kadidal, a staff attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which is challenging the NSA domestic spying program in federal court, and Ari Melber, who served as a legislative aide in the U.S. Senate, write, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recently announced that the administration's domestic-spying program will stop bypassing judicial oversight. Instead, it will submit domestic surveillance to review by a federal intelligence court, as required by law. … But before anyone celebrates the 'good news' of an attorney general saying he will stop breaking the law, Congress must confront the administration's record of illegal spying and ensure that surveillance is truly back within the rule of law." Kadidal and Melber continue, "This is a big challenge because the administration spent the last six years undermining the traditional tools Congress uses to supervise intelligence by ignoring the law, stalling court oversight and declaring that warrantless spying would continue. … For Congress, that means there is little point in passing another law to restate rules that the administration is openly defying. Public hearings would also be ineffective for reforming or exposing the classified program. So what can the new Congress do? … The only way to bring spying back under the rule of law is for Congress to strengthen the branch of government that makes the law work: the courts. … Unfortunately, the courts, with their traditional deference to the political branches, have been slow to tackle this problem." Kadidal and Melber add, "Yet there is much Congress can do to ensure swift and meaningful judicial oversight. First, there is precedent for providing fast-track review for important cases. Congress can require that the pending cases get accelerated review by either the appeals courts or the Supreme Court. Although the Supreme Court usually gets to choose whether to hear a case, Congress can make the right of appeal mandatory. … To ensure that the courts actually hear the spying cases, Congress should pass a statute curtailing the 'state secrets privilege' with precise boundaries to prevent further misuse. … Congress must strive for the higher ambition of protecting the rule of law itself by empowering the courts to swiftly enforce the laws Congress passed - and review the conduct of the president who broke them."

Columnist Blasts Gonzales Over Habeas Remarks. The Washington Times (2/5) runs a column by syndicated columnist Nat Hentoff, in which Hentoff writes, "Considering the state of the world, and the divisiveness in this nation, I am seldom startled these days by news from Washington. But an exception was the appearance of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a Jan. 18 hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee in which he stated: 'There is no express grant of habeas (corpus) in the Constitution... The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States is hereby guaranteed or assured the right of habeas corpus... there's (only) a prohibition against taking it away.'" Hentoff continues, "This is an astonishing dismissal by our chief law enforcement officer of the oldest fundamental right in Anglo-Saxon law that even precedes the Magna Carta of 1215. … Alberto Gonzales is dead wrong. … The Magna Carta has resonated for centuries and states: 'No free man shall be taken or imprisoned... except by... the law of the land.' Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist Papers, wrote that 'the practice of arbitrary imprisonments, have been, in all ages, the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny.' Hamilton cited the 18th-century English jurist, William Blackstone, whose commentaries are still referred to in courses on the law: 'Confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten... is a... dangerous engine of arbitrary government,' said Blackstone. … It is a pity that the chief law-enforcement officer of the United States not only does not take habeas corpus for granted, but says that it is not guaranteed to all of us. If our attorney general doesn't know that, consider how many students throughout our school systems may also be uneducated in the Great Writ -- and its history. How would the president do in an unannounced quiz on habeas corpus?"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

"Open Revolt" Building Against Real ID Act. The New York Times (2/5, Lipton, 1.16M) reports Maine legislators started what "is turning into an open revolt against" the Real ID Act last month when they passed "a nonbinding resolution that rejected the law. … Since then, legislatures in five states — Georgia, Montana, New Mexico, Washington and Wyoming — have voted in committee or on the floor of one chamber to move similar legislation ahead." State officials are hoping "that Congress will repeal or modify the law, or at least provide some of the billions of dollars the states claim it will cost to establish the new licensing system nationwide." However, Stewart A. Baker, an assistant secretary of Homeland Security, said opponents of the new law "are forgetting that this was a 9/11 commission recommendation and a recommendation for a very good reason."

DHS's Future As Counterterror Agency Said To Rest Largely With Allen. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A7, Block, 2.04M) reports the Department of Homeland Security's addition last summer to the "elite" Intelligence Program Managers Group as a move that "perhaps had less to do with the department's mission and capabilities than with the reputation of its chief intelligence officer, Charles E. Allen." However, "as the intelligence system comes under scrutiny with the expected appointment of a new Director of National Intelligence, DHS and Mr. Allen's efforts there are coming in for a hard look." Known as "The Legend" form his years at the CIA, Allen's "experience has yet to turn DHS and its constituent agencies into top-notch intelligence collectors or analysts, say both DHS's congressional overseers and officials in the department." His "success or failure will be pivotal in determining whether the department, created after the 9/11 attacks, will be a counterterrorist bulwark or a bureaucratic backwater."

WAR NEWS:

Prospects For Senate Passage Of Iraq Resolution Uncertain. The Financial Times (2/5, Daniel) says the Senate will today challenge President Bush's "proposed Iraq strategy with a debate on a non-binding resolution opposing the plan to send additional troops. However, several senators from both parties on Sunday warned it was unlikely to win the 60 votes needed for approval." The Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Chaddock, 59K) headlines its report "In Senate, Passage Of Iraq Resolution Uncertain." USA Today (2/5, 9A, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Republicans "are threatening to use the filibuster...to prevent a vote on a resolution that expresses disapproval of the troop increase." That "may be the only way for Bush supporters to prevent a bipartisan vote of no confidence."

The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Levey, 850K) says, "Not a single American soldier will do anything differently this week if the Senate approves a resolution criticizing President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq." The "nonbinding resolution would have no more force of law than the one approved Thursday commending the Miss America organization for its commitment to 'the character of women in the United States.' Yet the immense symbolism of what may be the first formal rebuke of Bush's war strategy has produced the most passionate war debate on Capitol Hill since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago."

McCain, Hagel Face Off On Eve Of Senate Surge Debate. ABC World News (2/4, story 2, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The Senate is preparing for a big fight over a resolution opposing President Bush's new war strategy." ABC (Hendren) added, "Today on 'This Week' with George Stephanopoulos, Sens. John McCain and Chuck Hagel outlined rival resolutions. McCain supports the surge of 21,000 troops to Iraq. The alternative to securing Baghdad, he says, is disaster." McCain: "You'll see a bloodletting in Baghdad that makes Srebrenica look like a Sunday school picnic." Hendren: "McCain's plan does set tough benchmarks for Iraq's government. But there is no 'or else' clause. Sen. Hagel's bill condemns the surge." Hagel: "Very simply put, we disagree with escalating our military involvement in Iraq. That is totally different than saying, 'Let's get out. Let's cut the funds.'"

McCain, on ABC's This Week (2/4, Stephanopoulos), said of the resolutions, "I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it. In other words, this is a vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there."

Asked on ABC's This Week (2/4, Stephanopoulos) to respond to McCain's comments, Hagel said, "What this resolution is about is, first, disagreeing with the President's position on increasing our military involvement in Iraq. … We lay out in the resolution options, ideas, some taken from the Baker-Hamilton report: getting American troops out of the middle of a sectarian interest, sectarian civil war in the cities, moving them out toward the borders, providing territorial integrity, protection, doing the things that we should do, we can do. But we cannot continue to feed our troops into the middle of a civil war."

On Fox News Sunday (2/4, Wallace), Sen. Lindsey Graham agreed with McCain, adding, "If the Democrats really believe this war is lost and this is just another Vietnam in another form, cut off funding."

The AP (2/5, Yen) says McCain "sought to weaken support" for a resolution opposing the surge strategy. McCain "is sponsoring a resolution expressing support for a troop increase and setting benchmark goals for the Iraqi government. He sought to capitalize on some of the Democratic division." The Washington Times (2/5, Pfeiffer, 88K) headlines its report on McCain's remarks "McCain Questions Honesty Of Push For Resolution." The Politico (2/5, Sheffield) summarizes the Sunday talk show debate on Iraq.

McCain Says He Wanted More Troops Sent To Iraq. Asked on ABC's This Week (2/4, Stephanopoulos) if he is "doubtful" that the "20,000 troops" proposed by Bush are "enough," McCain answered, "I'm worried. … I'm worried that this is not enough troops. But I looked Gen. Petraeus in the eye and I said, 'do you have enough troops?' He said, 'If I think I need more, I'll ask for them.' And he also said if he thought the mission was going to fail, he would tell the President and us. I would have liked to have seen more, as you know. But apparently…this is all we got."

Graham, on Fox News Sunday (2/4, Wallace), said, "I think additional troops would help dramatically."

Lieberman's Role In Debate Tests Democrats. Roll Call (2/5, Billings) says that when senators "go to the floor this week to debate the proposed Iraq troop surge, Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) will demonstrate once again to his Democratic colleagues that he is his own man. And while the Democratic leadership has made clear that Lieberman should be treated just as any other Caucus member, they cannot completely extinguish skepticism in their ranks about his long-term party loyalty." While Democrats in the chamber and their aides "said last week Lieberman's political posture hasn't changed much since winning re-election as an Independent Democrat. But in a narrow 51-49 seat majority, Democrats privately acknowledged they are still worried that as an Independent free from party peer pressure, Lieberman may cost them precious votes or even go so far as to join the GOP Senate minority."

Webb, Feinstein Seek Enhanced Diplomatic Efforts. Sen. James Webb, on Fox News Sunday (2/4, Wallace) said, "I think what we have right now, even with this so- called new strategy, is half a strategy -- not even half a strategy, honestly. You cannot deal with Iraq simply as a military situation even inside Iraq. We just finished a full month of hearings on the Armed Services and the Formulations Committees. … The preponderance of the testimony was basically saying that we're not going to be able to fully deal with the situation without an aggressive diplomatic strategy that is in tandem with a military strategy. And we've not seen that for four years."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, on CNN's Late Edition (2/4, Blitzer) said, "The military can't build a nation. … I'm not talking about turning, pulling everybody out tomorrow. What I am talking about is holding the Iraqi government's feet to the fire publicly, to make certain achievements very rapidly. … You have the prime minister, who basically can't carry out any effective action at this time. You have all of the elements growing of a failed state. To put the American military as the only remedy in this situation is a huge mistake."

Kyl Says Bush Plan "Should Be Given A Chance." In a USA Today (2/5, 11A, 2.27M) op-ed, Sen. Jon Kyl writes,

"The president's plan for success in Iraq should be given a chance. Although critics have focused almost exclusively on the reinforcement of troops -- the so-called surge -- the president's strategy is a comprehensive approach to the security and political problems facing Iraq. Under this plan, the Iraqi government has committed to lead the effort to defeat the militias and any other challenges to the government's monopoly on force. The new plan also relies on political and economic measures that will help to create a more unified government capable of providing essential services to its citizens. Opponents of the new strategy apparently do not agree that a political solution depends on peace and stability in Iraq."

Resolution Debate To Be Felt In 2008 White House, Congressional Contests. The Washington Post (2/5, Murray, Weisman, 690K) says on its front page that the "historic showdown to begin today represents the first bipartisan confrontation between Congress and the White House over the Iraq war since the invasion nearly four years ago," one that will test "Senate Republicans facing reelection in 2008 -- many from states where voters are angry with Bush's war policy and want the troops to begin heading home." Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Feldmann, 59K) reports, "As the Senate begins debate Monday on competing resolutions on Iraq, the Democrats are fresh out of their own debate on a way forward in Iraq at the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting."

More Commentary. USA Today (2/5, 11A, 2.27M) editorializes that Sen. John Warner's "resolution is not an easy call. Critics say it sends a dispiriting message to the troops, and there's no getting around that. But the administration diminishes its case by trying to imply that its critics are unpatriotic if they don't silently follow the president's lead. No American leader should need a sermon on the value of honest argument and dissent, even in wartime. Voters elected scores of new legislators in November with the demand they speak up. Lack of support for the war is driving the resolutions, not the other way around."

The New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "There isn't much encouraging news in the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq. Ethnic and sectarian identities are hardening and violence is spiraling, as shown again in Saturday's horrific Baghdad market bombing. Iraq's new governing institutions are weak and leading politicians have a 'winner-take-all attitude' that can only make matters even worse. ... The only real hope for Iraq lies in a bold reversal of course by Iraqi politicians that puts national reconciliation ahead of sectarian advantage. Mr. Bush needs to get serious about demanding such a change, including enforceable deadlines for overdue steps like eliminating militia supporters from the police, ending vengeful anti-Baathist measures targeting the Sunni middle class, and guaranteeing the fair allocation of oil revenues. Otherwise, Iraq seems headed over the cliff."

The Los Angeles Times (2/5), meanwhile, editorializes, "More than 540,000 Iraqis have fled their homes because of sectarian fighting in the last 11 months — 80% of them in Baghdad ... It is tempting to try to separate Shiite and Sunni combatants before they further shred and bleed their country, Yugoslavia style. But partition is a dangerous idea ... First and most important, the Iraqis do not want it. Second, the biggest prize in the ethnic wars — Baghdad — may be ghettoized, but it cannot be easily divided. Third, not all the violence is between Shiites and Sunnis; Shiite sects battle each other for power, and other ethnic strife may yet erupt in the north. Across Iraq, partition would force multiethnic cities and mixed families to choose sides and identities, however artificial. And the agony of Baghdad might simply be repeated in Kirkuk, Basra or Nasiriya."

White House Claims Regarding Iranian Involvement In Iraq Disputed. Newsweek's Mark Hosenball (2/12) writes, "The White House has ratcheted up rhetorical attacks, suggesting that Iranian government elements were supplying Iraqi Shia insurgents with deadly weapons technology. But the idea that Iran plays a key role in fomenting violence inside Iraq took a knock last week with the publication, by the U.S. intelligence czar's office, of a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. The NIE, representing the consensus view of all 16 U.S. intel agencies, says that because sectarian antagonisms among Iraqis themselves are so intense and 'self-sustaining,' Iranian or Syrian involvement is 'not likely to be a major driver of violence.' U.S. officials still maintain that Iran is helping Iraqi Shia insurgents build bombs that are particularly deadly because they can penetrate armored vehicles. But three U.S. officials familiar with unpublished intel (unnamed when discussing sensitive info) said evidence of official Tehran involvement is 'ambiguous.'" Hosenball notes, "Last week U.S. military officials in Baghdad were set to brief reporters about evidence American forces had assembled about Iran's interference in Iraq. But the briefing was canceled; one of the U.S. officials suggested it had been put off because intel officials couldn't agree about the info."

Shiite-Sunni Division Seen As Potentially Undermining Al Qaeda. Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria (2/12) writes, "For those in the West asking when Islam will have its Reformation, I have good news and bad news. The good news is that the process appears to have begun. The bad news is it's been marked by calumny, hatred and bloody violence. In this way it mirrors the Reformation itself, which we now remember in a highly sanitized way. … Look at the daily sectarian killings in Iraq, listen to the dark warnings of Saudi and Jordanian leaders about a 'Shia crescent,' watch the power struggles in Lebanon. Islam's quiet cleavage has come out into the open. At a recent demonstration in the Palestinian territories, opponents of Hamas taunted the Sunni Islamists as 'Shiites' because of their links to Iranian-backed Hizbullah. … These emerging divisions weaken Al Qaeda, but they will help most Muslims only if this story ends as the Reformation did."

Lebanon Described As "Testing Ground" For Sunni-Shiite Struggle. U.S. News and World Report's Mitchell Prothero (2/12) writes, "For more than two months, Lebanon has teetered on the brink of chaos. Hezbollah and its allies have been demanding the American-backed government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora submit to the formation of a so-called national unity government-one that would tip the political balance in favor of the Shiite community. … There are concerns about further clashes next week if thousands of pro-government demonstrators turn out to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri." Prothero notes, "During Lebanon's 15-year civil war…the country mainly split between Christians and Muslims. Now…the conflict's defining characteristic is the rift within the Muslim community, a split that draws in on opposing sides the region's two major powers, Sunni Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran. Lebanon is a testing ground for growing Iranian influence-and for Saudi Arabia's efforts to block it."

Skelton Regarded As "Eerily Prescient" On US Challenges In Iraq. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "It was on the eve of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, in March 2003, that Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton sent a letter to President Bush. 'There is no doubt that our forces will be victorious in any conflict,' he wrote. 'But there is great potential,' he warned, 'for a ragged ending to a war as we deal with the aftermath.' … He went on to outline some possibilities that would prove eerily prescient: Shiites attacking Sunnis, forcing U.S. troops to protect them. 'Stabilization and reconstruction prove more difficult than expected,' Skelton wrote. 'This puts pressure on troop rotations, reservists, their families ... and requires a dramatic increase in end-strength.' Nearly four years later, it is just such an increase in end-strength, meaning the overall size of the military, as well as the strain of repeated rotations on the Army and Marine Corps, that Skelton will confront as the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. … As President Bush presses his case for sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq and details surface about wasted reconstruction aid (including Olympic-size swimming pools ordered up by Iraqi officials), Skelton summarizes the goals for his tenure with a word that has become his mantra: 'Oversight. Oversight. Oversight.'"

Millenarian Shiite Cults Emerge As Destabilizing Force In Southern Iraq. Newsweek (2/12, Dehghanpisheh, 3.12M) reports, "Dhia Abdul Zahra claimed he was the messiah. And on the eve of the holiest day in the Shiite calendar, Ashura…Zahra tried to deliver salvation. Hundreds of his followers, armed with heavy weapons, clashed with Iraqi and American soldiers northeast of the holy city of Najaf on Jan. 28. The Soldiers of Heaven, as the cultists called themselves, apparently planned to storm Najaf and assassinate top Shiite clerics. They fought fiercely: an American helicopter was shot down, killing two soldiers, and Iraqi forces called for reinforcements at least twice. … It would be easy to write off the thirtysomething Zahra, who was killed along with more than 250 others in the battle," but "the Soldiers of Heaven are only one of dozens of Shiite factions, some of whom have similar millenarian ideas, that have sprung up across southern Iraq." Newsweek goes on to report that "although President George W. Bush praised Iraqi forces after the battle…in fact the Iraqis were nearly overrun. … Only repeated U.S. airstrikes crushed the cultists."

O'Connor Among ISG Members Not Publicly Second-Guessing Bush. Newsweek (2/12, Rosenberg, 3.12M) reports, "In a NEWSWEEK exclusive," Sandra Day O'Connor "talks about stepping down, Iraq and caring for her ill husband." Newsweek notes, "Lately, some study-group members have expressed frustration that President George W. Bush has not embraced their recommendations, but O'Connor -- still unwilling to plunge into politics -- demurs. 'There are probably no perfect answers,' she says."

Zuckerman Contends "Serial Disaster" Would Follow US Withdrawal. U.S. News and World Report's Mortimer Zuckerman (2/12) writes, "George W. Bush bet his presidency on Iraq. And now he's betting his party's future on it. If the new troop 'surge' fails, it will destroy the Republicans' reputation on national security for at least a generation. The president said, 'Nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America to succeed in the Middle East, to succeed in Iraq.' He's right. Abandoning Iraq would plunge the country we went to war to save into a grim horror movie. The Iraqi government cannot stop sectarian killing when it is able to call on the world's most powerful military. Who can expect it to do so if the Americans leave? … Most Americans believe the nightmare in Iraq simply cannot get much worse. Wrong -- it most certainly could. Advocates of a 'phased' withdrawal of our troops must reckon with the certainty of a serial disaster: a full-blown civil war spreading a contagion of violence across the region, with Iran virtually uncontainable. Our enemies, as the president said, would emerge with new safe havens, new recruits, and new resources."

Imminent Baghdad Offensive "Unlike Anything The City Has Seen" Since 2003. ABC World News (2/4, lead story, 2:40, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Today, a senior US military officer said the operation to secure Baghdad will be 'unlike anything the city has seen.' Officials say the joint US-Iraqi command center that will oversee this offensive will open tomorrow. And that the operation itself will begin very soon after that. Past efforts, as you probably know, to secure Baghdad, have failed. But the US military says this time, this time, the tactics will be different." ABC (Marquez) added, "On a day when Iraqis are cleaning up after the single-deadliest bombing in the war, US commanders say the new offensive to secure Baghdad will be bigger than any other operation in the four-year history of the war. Starting tomorrow, for the first time, US troops and Iraqi soldiers and police will operate under a single command. The key to the strategy: clear out insurgents, hold disputed territory, and build a more formal presence, with Iraqi troops taking the lead." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, US Military Spokesperson: "In order for this plan to be successful, it's important for the people in Iraq and in America, to be patient." ABC added, "But after an enormous truck bomb leveled a market and destroyed a mainly Shiite neighborhood in central Baghdad, many Iraqis have little patience left."

The Washington Times (2/5, 88K) reports, "Briefing a small group of foreign reporters, three American colonels who are senior advisers to the Iraqi army and police in Baghdad said a command center overseeing the crackdown in the capital would be activated today. 'The expectation is the plan will be implemented very soon thereafter,' a senior adviser to the 9th Iraqi army division said at a U.S. military base in Baghdad."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Murphy, 59K) also notes "US military officials cautioned patience – despite the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. '[That] will not turn the security situation overnight,' Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said in Baghdad. 'Iraqi forces suffer deficiencies in leadership and logistics. It will take more than two months to solve these problems.'"

Shiites Angry Over Delay In Implementing Crackdown. The New York Times (2/5, Cave, Oppel, 1.16M) says "a growing number of Iraqis blamed the United States on Sunday for creating conditions that led to the worst single suicide bombing in the war, which devastated a Shiite market in Baghdad the day before. They argued that the Americans had been slow in completing the vaunted new American security plan, making Shiite neighborhoods much more vulnerable to such horrific attacks." The "critics said the new plan, which the Americans have started to execute, had emasculated the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that is considered responsible for many attacks on Sunnis, but that many Shiites say had been the only effective deterrent against sectarian reprisal attacks in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhoods. Even some Iraqi supporters of the plan, like Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister who is a Kurd, said delays in carrying it out had caused great disappointment. … 'A long time has passed since the plan was announced,' Basim Shareef, a Shiite member of Parliament, said Sunday. 'But so far security has only deteriorated.'"

US Helicopters Were Shot Down. The Washington Post (2/5, A12, Londono, 690K) reports, "Four American helicopters that crashed in Iraq in the past two weeks were shot down, a U.S. military spokesman said Sunday, prompting officials to reevaluate how troops move around in an increasingly hostile war zone. … A Sunni insurgent group backed by al-Qaeda, the Islamic State of Iraq, posted photographs and a video on its Web site Sunday that it said showed the downing of the helicopter. The group asserted responsibility for the attack and warned that Iraqi airspace will be inhospitable for US forces."

NBC Nightly News (2/4, lead story, 2:40, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "We have come to expect nightly reports of new violence in Iraq with civilian casualties now the norm. But even by those standards it has been a horrific 48 hours. Police added 100 to the death toll today. That follows yesterday's massive attack, a truck bomb that killed at least 130 people and wounded more than 300. It was the single deadliest bombing since the war began with the full impact only becoming known to us today."

New Type Of IED Poses Fresh Challenge To US Forces. USA Today (2/5, 1A, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "A type of homemade bomb that can include parts commonly found in Iraqi kitchens and that is easy to hide on desert roads has proliferated in Anbar province and spread to other parts of the country. Troops in armored vehicles are endangered by the bomb, which U.S. military officials call a 'speed bump.'" The bomb "is formed by sandwiching plastic explosives between metal plates, such as baking trays, a Pentagon intelligence document shows. A detonator switch triggers the bomb when a vehicle rolls over it, ripping into the often-unarmored underside. … The speed bump first appeared in Anbar province, Pentagon records show."

Small Iraqi Air Force In Place. The New York Times (2/5, Glanz, 1.16M) reports "the Iraqi Air Force is flying again." But "like everything involving the rebuilding of Iraq's security forces, the return of the air force is fraught with ambiguity." The Iraqi Air Force "once boasted more than 500 combat aircraft. Now it has around 20 helicopters and planes and has barely figured in discussions on rebuilding the Iraqi security forces. There are no fighter planes in the current fleet and none are expected in the next few years at least, indicating that the United States will be responsible for air defenses here for some time to come."

Waxman Panel Prepares To Probe Bremer, Contractors. The Atlanta Journal Constitution (2/5, Malone) reports, "After years of stockpiling findings and allegations, Rep. Henry Waxman will unleash four days of hearings this week aimed at exposing an array of 'waste, fraud and abuse' in government." Waxman "is set to begin Tuesday by digging into the Bush administration's program to rebuild war-torn Iraq. Scheduled first is former Ambassador L. Paul Bremer, who oversaw the early reconstruction effort." Waxman plans to ask Bremer "about allegations that the reconstruction agency he ran 'filled positions with unqualified staff who were politically connected.' The oversight panel also is set to focus on private contractors hired to provide supplies for the U. military effort in Iraq, especially subcontractors working for Halliburton, the corporate giant once led by Vice President Dick Cheney."

The Politico (2/2, Allen) reported Bremer "plans to point to unexpectedly chaotic conditions in post-Saddam Baghdad as he defends his record at a hearing on Iraq spending before House Democrats on Tuesday, according to sources familiar with his testimony. This is the first aggressive exploration of the administration's Iraq contracts since Democrats took control of Congress last month." Bremer "told Politico he looks forward to committee members' questions, but also plans to give them a 5,000- to 6,000-word treatise in addition to his five-minute opening statement. 'I welcome the opportunity to go up and talk about it,' he said in a telephone interview. 'In the letter of invitation, the committee spoke about their interest in lessons learned. Given the difficulty that we've encountered in reconstruction in Iraq, I think it's helpful to look at lessons learned. That's a good approach to have. I look it as a constructive opportunity for me to do that.'"

KBR Faces Hearings. The Financial Times (2/5, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Executives from government contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan, including KBR and Compass of the UK, face a rocky ride in Washington this week as Henry Waxman, the congressman, begins hearings on allegations of 'waste, fraud and abuse.'" Waxman "is likely to focus his line of inquiry on allegations that Halliburton wrongly entered into a subcontracting arrangement with ESS, a division of Compass that ran a dining facility in Iraq, which in turn used Blackwater to provide it with security services." He "said in a letter to Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, in December that the security subcontract [with Blackwater] raised 'serious questions' about the oversight exercised by Halliburton and the Pentagon regarding the tiering of subcontractors, and whether it was 'proper' for Halliburton to bill the government for the services."

Iraq Accuses Syria Of Aiding Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Roug, 850K) reports the Iraqi government Sunday accused Syria of "harboring insurgents fomenting violence" in Baghdad. The allegation "strained relations with Iraq's neighbor just weeks after the two resumed diplomatic ties." At a news conference in Baghdad, Iraqi spokesman Ali Dabbagh said, "I confirm that 50% of murders and bombings are by Arab extremists coming from Syria. … and we have evidence to prove it." However, the Times reports that no evidence was presented during the session with reporters.

Petraeus Assembles Team Of PhD Advisers. The Washington Post (2/5, A1, Ricks, 690K) reports in a pessimistic article that Gen. David Petraeus "is assembling a small band of warrior-intellectuals ... They are smart colonels who have been noticed by Petraeus, and who make up one of the most selective clubs in the world: military officers with doctorates from top-flight universities and combat experience in Iraq. Essentially, the Army is turning the war over to its dissidents, who have criticized the way the service has operated there the past three years, and is letting them try to wage the war their way. ... But there is widespread skepticism that even this unusual group, with its specialized knowledge of counterinsurgency methods, will be able to win the battle of Baghdad. ... Also, experts agree that the basic problem in Iraq is political, not military, and that although a military campaign can create a breathing space for politicians, it cannot by itself reverse the dynamic driving Iraqis to fight a civil war."

Covert UK Unit Serves As "Secret Weapon" In Iraq. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (2/5, Rayment) reports, "Deep inside the heart of the Green Zone ... lies one of the most carefully guarded secrets of the war in Iraq. It is a cell from a small and anonymous British army unit that goes by the innocuous name of the Joint Support Group (JSG), and it has proved to be one of the coalition's most effective and deadly weapons in the fight against terror." The unit's members "are trained to turn hardened terrorists into coalition spies using methods developed on the streets of Northern Ireland, where the British Army managed to infiltrate the Irish Republican Army (IRA) at almost every level." They "have supplied intelligence that has saved hundreds of lives and resulted in some of the most notable successes against the myriad terror groups fighting in Iraq. Last week, sources said, intelligence from the JSG led to a series of successful operations against Sunni militia groups in southern Baghdad. ... The killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaeda in Iraq until his death in June, came after intelligence obtained by the JSG, as did the rescue of kidnapped British peace campaigner, Norman Kember."

Officer Who Refused To Go To Iraq Faces Court-Martial. ABC World News (2/4, story 3, :25, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "An Army officer who refuses to serve in Iraq becomes the first to go on trial tomorrow. Twenty-eight-year-old Ehren Watada will be court-martialed at Ft. Lewis, south of Seattle. He has called the war morally wrong and illegal. He said he would fight in Afghanistan but not in Iraq. He could face four years in prison if convicted."

The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Tizon, 850K) reports, "Thousands of GIs have gone AWOL or voiced opposition to the Iraq war, but when an officer says he won't go, the whole military machine must take note. It means dissent has crept up the chain of command, potentially undermining the war effort. The Army felt compelled to respond forcefully, charging [Ehren] Watada, 28, with one count of failure to deploy and four (later reduced to two) counts of 'conduct unbecoming' for making public statements against the war and against the Bush administration. His court-martial begins today at Ft. Lewis, 15 miles north of here." Watada is "not as big as the Rushmore-sized symbol he's become to the antiwar movement, which hails him as nothing less than an American hero. But he also bears no sign of the sniveling qualities ascribed him by pro-war groups that have branded him a coward." "Quiet support" from other soldiers "makes him think that maybe, just maybe, a whole lot of other uniformed souls feel the same way he does and just haven't figured out a way to say so."

US General Takes Over Command Of NATO Force In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/5, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "A senior American officer, Gen. Dan K. McNeill, took over command of the 35,000-member NATO force in Afghanistan from the departing British commander on Sunday, ahead of an expected spring offensive by a resurgent Taliban." Gen. McNeill "inherits a force that has expanded its mission to cover all of Afghanistan and is still struggling to contain the Taliban. Although the group was largely defeated in 2002, it mounted a strong comeback last year, leading to the bloodiest fighting in the country since the beginning of the war in 2001."

Diehl Says Bush Team Apologizing For Musharraf's "Failure To Deliver." Jackson Diehl writes in the Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K), "In the months after Sept. 11, 2001, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf was a new and shaky U.S. ally. He decided to side with the Bush administration against al-Qaeda, but there were persistent reports that elements of his army still supported the Afghan Taliban. … Five years later…Musharraf is still promising a moderate and tolerant regime -- but there are still reports that his army is quietly helping the Taliban. He's also still promising democracy -- but just as in 2002, he's preparing to rig Pakistan's upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections to ensure that his term is extended and his power unchallenged." Diehl adds, "What has changed is the response of the Bush administration. Five years ago it portrayed itself as giving Musharraf a chance to perform. Now it defends and apologizes for the general, despite his chronic failure to deliver."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, Phone Companies Balk At Proposed Pretexting Rules. The AP (2/5, Dunbar) reports, "Federal regulators working on rules to secure the calling records and other private information of telephone customers are running into resistance from phone companies and law enforcement agencies." The AP continues, "The rules, an effort by the Federal Communications Commission to combat 'pretexting,' are circulating among the commissioners for comment and may be voted on this month. … Pretexting is the practice of impersonating a phone customer to gain access to his phone records. President Bush signed a law last month criminalizing the practice and imposing penalties including up to 10 years in prison." The AP adds, "The issue gained prominence last year when executives of the Hewlett-Packard Co. were charged with hiring private detectives who used the technique to investigate board members. … The new law gives police a weapon to punish perpetrators. But it leaves out any requirements for how phone companies should protect their customers' private data. Cell phone bills, for example, can reveal who a person has called and, in some cases, even the caller's location. … The FCC chairman, Kevin Martin, told reporters recently that the new rules will require that customers use a password to access their account information. … In written comments to the FCC, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said immediately alerting customers in such cases may tip off investigative targets and lead them to destroy evidence, change their behavior or slip away. … He proposed that companies not tell customers for at least seven business days after notifying the FBI or the Secret Service."

Court To Decide On "Scheme Liability." The Financial Times (2/5, Masters, Waldmeir) reports, "US courts are considering on Monday whether to bless a new legal theory thought up by plaintiffs' lawyers that could put banks, lawyers and business partners on the hook for billions of dollars when a public company goes bust because of fraud." The Times continues, "The fifth circuit federal appeals court in New Orleans will take up the issue of 'scheme liability' when it hears arguments on whether Enron's shareholders can pursue a class action against Credit Suisse, Merrill Lynch and lawyer Vinson & Elkins. … Banks and lawyers have traditionally been protected by a 1994 Supreme Court decision that says shareholders cannot recover money from firms and people who simply 'aided or abetted' securities fraud. But the recent corporate scandals prompted plaintiffs' attorneys and angry investors to look for a way around that rule. They argue that the banks and lawyers participated in a 'scheme' to hide Enron's losses from investors and should be held "primarily responsible" for the company's collapse." The Times notes, "Scheme liability 'is almost indispensable. There would have been no way to hold the big banks responsible in Enron without scheme liability,' said Bill Lerach, the plaintiff's attorney who represents Enron shareholders. … But Greg Markel, a lawyer for banks, warned that the theory 'creates uncertainty for financial institutions and that uncertainty increases the costs of doing business.' … The trial judge in the Enron case initially agreed with investors, but other US courts have divided in cases involving fraud at Dynegy, Parmalat and HealthSouth. The Securities and Exchange Commission favours a limited form of scheme liability that could increase the number of companies targeted by such lawsuits. … The US Supreme Court is also considering whether to hear two scheme liability cases. One includes companies allegedly involved in sham transactions conducted by Homestore, the online estate agents site. The influential ninth circuit federal appeals court found that business partners can be held liable if their transactions with a company had 'the principal purpose and effect of creating a false appearance of fact in the fur-ther-ance of a scheme to defraud' even if they did not directly mislead investors."

Hyundai CEO Convicted Of Embezzlement, Fraud In South Korea. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A2, Ramstad, Yoon) reports from Seoul, South Korea, "A court here found Hyundai Motor Co. Chairman Chung Mong Koo guilty of embezzlement and fraud, and sentenced him to three years in prison, breaking a pattern of leniency for high-profile executives convicted of white-collar crime." The Journal continues, "The decision poses a major leadership problem for Hyundai, the world's No. 6 auto maker by volume, as it faces slower growth and mounting challenges including new competitors from China." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors alleged that Mr. Chung took about $100 million from Hyundai and affiliated companies for political payoffs and personal use. They sought a six-year prison sentence. Mr. Chung, who told the court at one point during his trial, 'I am guilty to a certain extent,' had asked for leniency. … At a hearing where the verdict and sentencing were announced, Seoul Central Court Judge Kim Dong Oh said Mr. Chung engaged in 'behavior that goes against market practices.' The judge, one of three who listened to the trial and handed down the ruling, said, 'It shows there's something wrong in the corporate culture of Korea.'" The Journal notes, "The sentence presents Hyundai with a major quandary: Should it replace Mr. Chung, who is the son of Hyundai's founder and has been depicted for years both inside and outside the company as a near-omnipotent leader? A Hyundai spokesman said the company was 'disappointed' and that Mr. Chung will appeal the decision. It said he remains in control of the company."

Bush's Comments On CEO Pay Seen As "Tipping Point" For Issue. USA Today (2/5, 1B, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "Lawmakers in both houses of Congress plan to make laws affecting executive pay packages, and a new rule from the Securities and Exchange Commission is forcing companies to provide a simplified summary of top executives' compensation in their public filings. Even President Bush weighed in on the subject last week in New York, exhorting corporate boards to tie CEOs' salaries and bonuses to their success in improving companies and bringing value to shareholders. 'When…Bush talks about CEO pay, you know that it's moving to the top of the national agenda,' says Robert Reich, professor of public policy at the University of California at Berkeley and former secretary of labor under President Clinton." Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, a senior associate dean at the Yale School of Management and "a prominent expert on corporate leadership," says "the Bush speech represents a tipping point in the debate over executive pay. 'By the time Johnny Carson started to joke about Watergate, Nixon had lost his credibility in all quarters,' says Sonnenfeld."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ To Release Rules Expanding DNA Sampling. The New York Times (2/5, Preston) reports, "The Justice Department is completing rules to allow the collection of DNA from most people arrested or detained by federal authorities, a vast expansion of DNA gathering that will include hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants, by far the largest group affected." The Times continues, "The new forensic DNA sampling was authorized by Congress in a little-noticed amendment to a January 2006 renewal of the Violence Against Women Act, which provides protections and assistance for victims of sexual crimes. The amendment permits DNA collecting from anyone under criminal arrest by federal authorities, and also from illegal immigrants detained by federal agents." The Times adds, "Over the last year, the Justice Department has been conducting an internal review and consulting with other agencies to prepare regulations to carry out the law. … The goal, justice officials said, is to make the practice of DNA sampling as routine as fingerprinting for anyone detained by federal agents, including illegal immigrants. Until now, federal authorities have taken DNA samples only from convicted felons." The Times notes, "The law has strong support from crime victims' organizations and some women's groups, who say it will help law enforcement identify sexual predators and also detect dangerous criminals among illegal immigrants."

Outcome Of Libby Case Said To Hinge On His Credibility. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's defense in his perjury trial rests largely on the claim that he was too busy with pressing affairs of state to recall minor events such as conversations with reporters about an obscure CIA employee." But "after nine government witnesses testified in federal court here over the last two weeks, a question is starting to emerge: Given all the time and attention the White House devoted in 2003 to CIA operative Valerie Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, how credible is Libby's apparent forgetfulness?" The Times adds "legal experts cautioned against reading too much into what the jury might be thinking at this stage of the trial because Libby's lawyers have yet to present their case. And for the prosecution, proving that a senior government official intentionally lied is no easy matter. Also, some of the government's witnesses have demonstrated memory problems of their own, potentially bolstering Libby's faulty memory defense."

The Washington Post (2/5, A13, Leonnig, 690K), meanwhile, describes the trial as "an awkward cocktail party where the guests know each other too well and don't always get along." It is "a sometimes genial and sometimes strained reunion -- with hearty backslapping as well as forced smiles and uncomfortable silences, but without the canapes and cocktails to lighten the mood."

Cheney's Role In Plame Leak Takes Center Stage At Libby Trial. Newsweek's Michael Isikoff (2/12), in a piece titled, "The CIA Leak: Boring In On The Veep," writes, "The Scooter Libby trial has put a new focus on Vice President Dick Cheney's own role in the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson's identity." Cheney "thought the [CIA] wasn't going far enough in distancing Cheney's office from the trip by Joseph Wilson." Isikoff notes that an FBI agent's testimony this week "is the first suggestion that Cheney himself talked about disclosing Wilson's wife's identity to the press as a way of undercutting Wilson's credibility. … The new testimony could make things more awkward for Cheney, due to be called as a defense witness soon."

U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Halloran , 2.03M) reports the Libby trial "won't go down in history as the turning point in the collapse of the Bush administration's once powerful control over its Iraq message. That milestone has long since passed. But testimony by an all-star parade of witnesses…will make a fascinating footnote-with details about the usually secret and occasionally inept workings of a wartime White House and the reporters who cover it."

PG County Executive Backs Away From Official After Shooting. The Washington Post (2/5, B1, Thompson, Weil) reports, "Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson distanced himself yesterday from Keith A. Washington, the county homeland security official and police officer who shot two men during an altercation at his Accokeek home. One of the two men has died, and the matter is under investigation." The Post continues, "Johnson said the relationship between him and Washington -- who had backed Johnson for office and once served as his driver -- is not one of personal friendship. He also said he did not believe Washington, a police corporal, should resume his homeland security post -- a job to which Johnson had appointed him. … 'I don't think he should come back to Homeland Security, no matter what happens,' Johnson told a reporter yesterday." The Post adds, "Johnson did not give reasons but said he believed Washington should return to the police department, which pays his salary. … It was not clear yesterday whether Washington could remain in the security post without the support of Johnson, who appointed him. Washington did not return calls last night. … Washington was appointed a deputy director of homeland security by Johnson in 2004. He is a longtime Johnson supporter who worked at one time as his driver. … He was one of few county police officers to support Johnson, who as state's attorney had focused on combating abuses by police. … Washington, a 16-year police officer, has been on paid administrative leave since the night he shot unarmed deliverymen Brandon D. Clark, 22, and Robert White, 36."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Window Closing On Civil Rights Slaying Prosecutions. USA Today/Jackson Clarion-Ledger (2/5, 3A, Mitchell) reports, "Despite high-profile convictions in the past two decades, most killers from the civil rights era will go unpunished. … Now the window of time is closing. Death is claiming potential defendants and witnesses," and the recent arrest of James Seale "is certain to be one of the last because suspects are dying, former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones of Birmingham said." USA notes, "Retired FBI agent Jim Ingram said he and other agents investigating racial violence in Mississippi in the 1960s often ran into hostile neighbors, frightened witnesses, reluctant prosecutors and all-white juries, many of whom refused to convict in these crimes." Rep. John Lewis "believes there is bipartisan support in Congress for the Unsolved Civil Rights Crimes Act that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down evidence in the unpunished killings."

NYTimes Columnist Examines "Travesty" Of 1970s Louisiana Murder Conviction. In a column for the New York Times (2/5), Bob Herbert writes from Destrehan, La., "The term 'time warp' could have been coined for this rural town of 11,000 residents that sits beside, and just a little below, the Mississippi River. A remnant of the sugar-plantation era, the region's racially troubled past is always here, seldom spoken about but inescapable, like the murk in the air of a perpetually stalled weather front. … The Harry Hurst Middle School is on the site of the old Destrehan High School, which was the scene of violent protests during the integration period of the 1970s. Local residents have tried to blot out the murder case that made Destrehan High notorious three decades ago, but there's a big problem with that collective effort to forget. The black teenager who was railroaded into prison (and almost into the electric chair) for the murder of a white student in 1974 is still in prison all these many years later. He's middle-aged now, still suffering through a life sentence without any chance for parole in the notorious state penitentiary at Angola." Herbert continues, "There is no longer any doubt that the case against the teenager, Gary Tyler, was a travesty. A federal appeals court ruled unequivocally that he did not receive a fair trial. The Louisiana Board of Pardons issued rulings on three occasions that would have allowed Mr. Tyler to be freed. … But this is the South and Mr. Tyler was a black person convicted of killing a white. It didn't matter that the case was built on bogus evidence and coerced witnesses, or that the trial was, in the words of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, 'fundamentally unfair.' Mr. Tyler was never given a new trial and the pardon board recommendations were rejected by two governors. … (Lurking in the background as the case unfolded was David Duke, a former grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan who was very active politically in Louisiana and always ready to inject his poison into the public issues of the day. If you drive around Destrehan and nearby communities today you will still see some of the old blue-and-white campaign signs for Duke.)"

NCLB's Use Of Race Used To Urge Bush To Support Use Of Race In School Admissions. Alec Ian Gershberg and Darrick Hamilton of the New School's Milano Graduate School for Management and Urban Policy in the Christian Science Monitor (2/5) argue that the Bush Administration is "inconsistent" in its principles regarding the use of race because it opposes the use of race "as a criterion for admission to public elementary and high schools" while the No Child Left Behind Act "requires that schools show adequate progress in each of 10 'subgroups' of students" including "racial and ethnic categories such as blacks, Hispanics, Asians, native Americans, and whites." One result is that "school staff must now view all their students through an explicitly racial lens." NCLB "is a tacit admission that race matters." So "the administration must reconsider its positions on affirmative action and school integration. And it must stop urging the Supreme Court to ban a tool some local school districts deem effective and desirable for providing access and expanding student diversity."

NYTimes Praises Florida For Changing Election Machines. The New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Florida, famous for doing so much wrong in its elections, is poised to take two very important right steps. First, Gov. Charlie Crist says he plans to end the use of touch-screen voting machines that do not produce a paper record. Florida's move may finally sound the death knell for these unreliable, inherently antidemocratic voting machines." Governor Crist is "asking the Legislature to finance the purchase of new optical-scan machines, and it is expected to agree. Choosing optical scans is Governor Crist's second good move. In optical-scan voting, voters mark a paper ballot that is then read by a computer. Polling place lines are shorter, because many voters can fill out ballots at the same time. These paper ballots are the official ballots, and can be recounted by hand to resolve a dispute."

ANTITRUST:

Developments At Ohio Mill Hinge On Awaited DOJ Antitrust Decision. The Steubenville (OH) Herald-Star (2/5, Giannamore) reports, "Many developments for the local steel mills hinge upon the decision of the U.S. Department of Justice in an antitrust claim against Mittal Steel." The Herald-Star continues, "While the date has passed for expiration of a memorandum of understanding between Esmark and Mittal for the purchase of Mittal's Weirton mill, negotiations between the two firms are continuing. … Esmark spokesman Bill Keegan said Friday that Esmark and Mittal 'continue to negotiate in earnest' on the potential purchase agreement and discussions are continuing." The Herald-Star adds, "Esmark, Mittal and Weirton's Independent Steelworkers Union officials all said they were not sure how Justice would make its decision known. A Justice spokeswoman said Friday the decision was 'still pending' and a statement could be expected at some point. … The Department of Justice and Mittal entered into an antitrust consent decree in August when Mittal and Arcelor merged. The concern was over Mittal's control over tin-producing assets in the eastern United States. Through the merger, Mittal came into possession of the Canadian Dofasco mill in Hamilton, Ontario, which produces tin. It already owned the Weirton mill and the Sparrows Point, Md., plant, both of which produce tin. … Because of the placement of Dofasco into a Dutch trust by Arcelor when it had been fighting Mittal's offers earlier in 2006, Mittal faced difficulty in selling Dofasco. The company had been ordered to use its best efforts to sell Dofasco and, absent a sale, Justice would choose between Weirton and Sparrows Point to be sold to ease the antitrust concerns. … A November deadline on the decision was extended to Jan. 28, which passed without word from the Justice Department."

BAR/BRI Settles Antitrust Class Action For $49 Million. The National Law Journal (2/5, Bronstad) reports, "The publishers of the BAR/BRI law review course have agreed to pay $49 million to settle a case brought by a class of nearly 300,000 law students alleging they each were overcharged by about $1,000." The Journal continues, "West Publishing Corp., the owner of the BAR/BRI, and Kaplan Inc., which makes the preparatory coursework for the Law School Admission Test, agreed to settle claims that they conspired to monopolize the law exam market. … The antitrust case had sought triple the $300 million in damages and applied to all students who took the BAR/BRI course from 1997 to 2006." The Journal adds, "The parent company of West Publishing, The Thomson Corp., has agreed to pay $36 million as part of the proposed settlement, according to John Shaughnessy, senior director of corporate communications at the legal and regulatory market group of The Thomson Corp. … Kaplan agreed to pay nearly $13 million as part of the proposed settlement. … Eliot Disner, a partner in the Los Angeles office of McGuireWoods who brought the year-old case, said the proposed settlement, minus attorney fees, comes to $37 million for class members. He estimated that, with 290,000 anticipated class members, each would receive about $125, although that amount could be higher if some members don¹t claim their share."

Simon Property Group Makes Offer For Mills Corp. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A2, Berman) reports, "Simon Property Group Inc. and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management yesterday lobbed in a roughly $1.56 billion offer for Mills Corp., a move designed to derail a $1.35 billion agreement with Brookfield Asset Management." The Journal continues, "Investors had for weeks been expecting a higher offer for Mills, a real-estate investment trust with dozens of shopping malls around the country. As Mills's largest shareholder, Farallon has aggressively pushed for a higher offer for the Chevy Chase, Md.-based company." The Journal adds, "The emergence of Simon, the country's largest REIT by market value, gives Farallon's efforts some important momentum. The two are expected to put up equal amounts of equity to help fund their bid, creating a per-share price of $24, greater than the $21-per-share deal struck by Brookfield, based in Canada, last month. Mills also has an additional $6 billion-plus in debt and preferred stock that the two partners would assume. … The offer puts into relief two of the emerging deal-making themes of 2007: Hedge funds are getting increasingly comfortable assuming controlling ownership stakes and are finding willing allies among corporate stalwarts such as Simon. The new year has also brought a spate of "jumped" transactions, in which bidders have shown little fear about busting up an agreed-upon deal. Robust financing markets have made such maneuvers possible, and bankers on Wall Street expect still more unsolicited activity in the months ahead." The Journal notes, "Simon's move also highlights the seemingly relentless rise of commercial real-estate, even while residential property values continue to suffer. Simon already is the country's largest mall developer, with interests in 285 properties throughout the U.S. The Indianapolis-based firm had developed five properties with Mills during the 1990s, and is in a 'better position to enhance its assets' than other owners, a person close to Simon said yesterday."

Triad Hospitals Reaches Deal With Private Equity Group. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A2, Berman, Francis) reports, "Triad Hospitals Inc. Monday morning announced a deal to sell the company to private-equity buyers for about $4.4 billion." The Journal continues, "The buyers of the Plano, Texas, hospital chain were CCMP Capital Advisors LLC and the private-investment arm of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Triad said in a press release. … The deal may presage more buyouts or acquisitions in the sector: Hospitals have been fertile territory for buyout shops lately, most notably in last year's record-setting purchase of hospital giant HCA Inc." The Journal adds, "The deal values the company at $50.25 a share, a 16% premium over Friday's close of $43.27 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Triad, spun off by HCA in May 1999, had 51 general acute-care hospitals and 10 ambulatory-surgery centers in early 2006, primarily in small southern U.S. cities. … Triad has been considered a likely buyout target by many analysts after an October conference call in which executives said they had held talks with "various groups" that would continue, though they said nothing was then imminent. … At about the same time, Community Health Systems Inc. of Brentwood, Tenn., said it was considering going private, among a variety of strategies. In addition, Health Management Associates Inc. of Naples, Fla., borrowed to pay shareholders a dividend valued at half its share price, which analysts described as the equivalent of a public buyout."

Next Installments Of Climate Change Report To Highlight Human Cost Of Warming. USA Today (2/5, 9D, Vergano, 2.27M) reports, "The human and economic cost of global warming will move to center stage when the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change releases the second and third installments of its report this spring, experts say." The "panel's report is the creation of three separate 'working groups,' which each prepare a separate report. The first, which was released Friday and involved the efforts of thousands of scientists and government reviewers, concludes with 90% certainty that humanity is triggering global warming by burning fossil fuels, cutting down forests and other activities." The April report, according to Gary Yohe of Wesleyan University, one of its authors, will "assess the effect of warming on socioeconomic and natural systems and show that the effects on people 'are distributed across the globe and in every major sector of human activity.'" The "third report, to be released in May, focuses on 'mitigation' measures, such as taxing carbon dioxide production."

Halting Global Warming Would Require Radical Measures. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Zarembo, 850K) says the IPCC report "notes that a concerted world effort could stave off the direst consequences of global warming, such as widespread flooding, drought and extreme weather. Ultimately eliminating the global warming threat, however, would require radical action." The Times adds, "To stabilize atmospheric levels of carbon dioxide — the primary contributor to global warming — CO2 emissions would have to drop 70% to 80%, said Richard Somerville, a theoretical meteorologist at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla. Such a reduction would bring emissions into equilibrium with the planet's ability to absorb carbon dioxide."

Groups Question AEI Solicitation Of Warming Critiques. The Washington Post (2/5, A4, Eilperin, 690K) reports the American Enterprise Institute "has been soliciting critiques of the just-released international assessment of the evidence on climate change, a move that prompted some academics and environmentalists to accuse the group of seeking to distort the latest evidence for global warming." Advocacy groups questioned why AEI "has offered $10,000 to academics willing to contribute to a book on climate-change policy." The Post adds, "AEI visiting scholar Kenneth Green -- one of two researchers who has sought to commission the critiques -- said in an interview that his group is examining the policy debate on global warming, not the science."

WSJournal Warns Against Radical Policy Changes Based On IPCC Report. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) writes, "[T]he real news in the fourth assessment from the [IPCC] may be how far it is backpedaling on some key issues." More pertinent than the latest IPCC report "is the underlying scientific report," which is due in May. According to "people who have seen that draft, it contains startling revisions of previous U.N. predictions." The Journal adds, "We don't deny that carbon emissions may play a role [in warming], but we don't believe that the case is sufficiently proven to justify a revolution in global energy use. The economic dislocations of such an abrupt policy change could be far more severe than warming itself, especially if it reduces the growth and innovation that would help the world cope with, say, rising sea levels." The "IPCC report should be understood as one more contribution to the warming debate, not some definitive last word that justifies radical policy change."

WPost Says Endorsement Of Report Makes Bush's Warming Position "Particularly Troubling." In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/5, A14, 690K) says the IPCC report is "full of frightening evidence and, we hope, policy-inducing conclusions." The Post adds, "Many climate scientists say the report doesn't go far enough." The "assessment's value does not lie in its innovative approach to describing global climate change. On the contrary, because so many individuals and organizations signed on, the report's strong language is virtually unassailable. Even the Bush administration hailed it, which makes the president's continued neglect of the issue particularly troubling." The Post concludes, "Now that leaders in the United States and abroad have agreed on the basics of the problem and the seriousness of the consequences, sound policy -- the likes of which President Bush continues to oppose -- should follow."

Proposal Would Triple Snowmobile Traffic In Yellowstone. The New York Times (2/5, Robbins, 1.16M) reports the "latest installment in the long-running debate over the use of snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park is a proposal to allow as many as 720 to enter each day, nearly three times as many as permitted in the last several years." But the plan, "which could be adopted by the end of the year, has drawn fire from environmentalists and praise from snowmobile advocates and some businesses in the communities around the park." The plan "is described in a preliminary draft environmental impact statement that was released to agencies and governments near the park for comment in December."

Ethanol Skeptics Concerned By Potential Fallout From Massive Subsidies. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Lavelle, Schulte, 2.03M) reports, "Washington loves a 'win-win,' but there are plenty of doubts as to whether the love affair with ethanol qualifies. Even though the ethanol industry profited handsomely last year, it continued to benefit from billions of dollars in taxpayer subsidies. And as ethanol becomes a larger part of the energy mix, it is not clear that Washington is prepared for the fallout. Ethanol already consumes so much corn that signs of strain on the food supply and prices are rippling across the marketplace. Environmental impacts will multiply as more land and water are devoted to the prized yellow grain. And, even if these problems were overcome, ethanol's potential growth could be stunted by an energy system currently tailored to gasoline. Ethanol undoubtedly plays a role in the quest for energy independence and the desire to curb global warming. But some observers worry that ethanol development may take the place of more effective initiatives: forcing automakers to increase gas mileage, for instance, or mandating cuts in carbon dioxide emissions."

Will Notes Democratic Senators 1997 Opposition To Kyoto Protocols. In his column for Newsweek (2/12, 3.12M) George Will writes, "John Kerry says that one reason America has become an 'international pariah' is President Bush's decision to 'walk away from global warming.' Kerry's accusation is opaque, but it implies the usual complaint that Bush is insufficiently enthusiastic about the Kyoto Protocol's binding caps on emissions of greenhouse gases. … Fine. President Bush should give the world something amusing to watch. He should demand that the Senate vote on the protocol." Will goes on to note that in 1997, "a 'sense of the Senate' resolution declared opposition to any agreement that would do what the protocol aims to do. … President Clinton and his earnest vice president knew better than to seek ratification of Kyoto by a Senate that had passed its resolution of disapproval 95-0. Fifty-six of those 95 senators are still serving. Two of them are John Kerry and Barbara Boxer. That is an inconvenient truth."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Polar Express" Nets More Arrests, Thousands Of Ecstasy Pills Seized. The Boston Globe (2/3, Murphy, Radin) reported four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday "charged 23 people…with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering. … 'This ecstasy was manufactured in clandestine laboratories in Canada, then smuggled into the United States, ending up in Boston and further distributed to gangs and other buyers in the city,' said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Boston office." A task force "sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials. Investigators seized 85,000 ecstasy pills, worth nearly $2.6 million on the street, 130 pounds of marijuana, five guns, and $25,000." The Globe adds that law enforcement officials "raided houses in Dorchester and Quincy…and arrested 21 of those charged."

The Boston Herald (2/3) reported federal authorities "said they seized 85,000 tablets of ecstasy and 100 pounds of marijuana when they dismantled what they described as an international drug ring with tentacles that reached north to Canada and across the Pacific to Vietnam. Twenty-three defendants - all Vietnamese or Vietnamese Americans from Dorchester, Quincy, and Randolph - are accused of orchestrating the operation, distributing the drugs and laundering thousands in cash. Nineteen of them were arrested in a sweep…by federal agents. Arraignments are set for Monday."

The AP (2/3) reported 19 arrests "were made early Friday, and authorities were searching for the other four. Prosecutors say none of those charged live in Canada. At the peak of the operation, officials say several hundred pounds of marijuana were transported to the Boston area from Canada and other U-S points."

Mexican Cartels Said To Be Filling US Demand For Meth. In Mexico City, the Arizona Republic (2/4) reported that meth "superlabs" controlled by Mexican cartels are taking over what was once a mom-and-pop business in the United States. "'Mexican drug-trafficking organizations, being the entrepreneurs they are…decided they could produce large amounts of meth in Mexico, then smuggle it across the Southwest border using the same drug routes they've used for generations,' said Steve Robertson, a spokesman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … As the raw materials become harder to get, small-time cooks are being put out of business. The Mexican cartels have rushed to fill the demand with California-based superlabs, which can produce more than 10 pounds of meth a day."

Two Florida Men Get Life Sentences For Roles In Cocaine Ring. The Palm Beach Post (2/3) reported two Jupiter men "were sentenced to life in federal prison Thursday for their roles in a countywide cocaine distribution ring. Their supplier, a Boynton Beach man, was sentenced to 20 years. … They were arrested along with 35 others in May in a massive sweep that included 450 officers from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office and the Boynton Beach, Delray Beach and Jupiter police departments. Sixteen of those arrested are serving sentences ranging from two to 10 years, officials said."

Experts Disagree On Prevalence Of Heroin Use. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/4, Maykuth, Stoiber) reported, "While national statistics indicate that heroin abuse has been steady in recent years, some Philadelphia-area drug-treatment experts say it appears to be on the rise. … Other law enforcement officials, however, say national statistics do not support the anecdotal accounts of regional officials. … William R. Hocker, spokesman for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said heroin use appeared stable. 'Heroin's a mainstay,' he said. 'It's always going to be there.'" Most studies "peg the number of Americans using heroin at a fraction of 1 percent."

IMMIGRATION:

Former Dallas Police Officer Pleads Guilty To Immigration Fraud. The Dallas Morning News (2/3, Trahan) reported a former Dallas police officer "has pleaded guilty to a federal charge of immigration fraud for helping his wife, a native of Mexico who was in the U.S. illegally and had ties to drug traffickers, obtain a fake visa. Jose Luis Cabrera, 37, an 11-year Dallas Police Department veteran, was fired in December after a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment accusing him of conspiring with his wife, Moraima Cabrera, 34, to commit passport fraud. … After they married in March 2004, Mr. Cabrera was so desperate for his wife to avoid deportation to Mexico that, according to federal officials, in April 2005 he brought her to the Dallas office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. He offered agents a deal: His wife would share what she learned from her drug trafficking past in exchange for legal immigration status."

Guatemalans Denied Asylum In US Seek To Stop Deportations. South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/5, Abbady) reports, "Juana Tomas resolved to forget the ghosts of San Miguel Acatán. … She fled her native Guatemalan village, tucked in the rural highlands where civil war raged, and headed north in 1991." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "In the United States, Tomas sought political asylum. She was 17. Adolescence turned into adulthood. She gave birth to two sons and made a home for them in Lake Worth, joining a large, Qanjobal-speaking community of Mayan farm workers and day laborers in Palm Beach County. Raising her children and working in a nursery, she waited for a response from the government. … Fifteen years later in 2006, Tomas, now 33, learned that federal authorities denied her asylum claim. An immigration judge recently ordered her deported to Guatemala, a country still reeling from the effects of a war that ended a decade ago. Advocates say she is one of roughly 250,000 Guatemalans whose asylum claims from the 1990s U.S. authorities rejected. All could be deported." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "U.S. officials say Guatemalans no longer qualify for political asylum because their country's civil war ended in 1996. Due to a massive backlog, the government only last year began notifying applicants that they must leave the country, immigration lawyers say. … During her long wait, Tomas took refuge in her new home and put the war behind her. A childhood memory of the great-aunt she saw dragged and decapitated slowly faded. So did the image of a neighbor whose body she found hanging from a tree one night while gathering firewood with her father. Every year, she renewed her work permit, raised her sons, and had little idea that her newfangled American life was built on borrowed time. … Now Tomas finds herself challenging the government whose protection she sought. She and other exiles in Florida, home to 28,650 Guatemalans, plan to join a California lawsuit against the Justice Department, said her attorney, Aileen Josephs. … Attorneys for the nonprofit group Casa de Cultura de Guatemala in Los Angeles are preparing a lawsuit demanding a halt to pending deportations of Guatemalans who entered the United States before the end of the civil war. The suit, which will seek class-action status, also will ask for legal status for Guatemalans who applied for asylum after 1990 but before that country's 1996 peace accords. Those who applied in the 1980s are protected under a federal program. … South Florida Guatemalan activists also have mobilized. Members of the Miami-based Coalition of Guatemalan Immigrants in the United States met with representatives of Congress in late January to press for a moratorium on deportations."

TAX:

DOJ Seeks To Revoke Marion Barry's Probation In Tax Case. The Washington Times (2/5, McElhatton) reports, "Federal prosecutors want to revoke D.C. Council member Marion Barry's probation in a criminal tax case because he has failed to pay 2005 federal and D.C. income taxes." The Times continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorneys James Cooper and Thomas Zeno said in a court memo Friday that Mr. Barry, a former D.C. mayor, has shown 'unworthiness to reap the benefits of a lenient sanction.' Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying his income taxes, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office." The Times adds, "Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying taxes for five years, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office. A spokesman declined to comment on the development. … 'The court's patience should be at an end,' the prosecutors wrote. 'A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own return for six years.' … Mr. Barry, a Ward 8 Democrat and four-term mayor, also has not made arrangements to pay taxes on more than $500,000 he earned in previous years, officials said." The Times notes, "The prosecutors call Mr. Barry's failure to file 2005 tax returns the latest in a series of 'willful acts in defiance of the tax laws.' They also say Mr. Barry's actions puts him in violation of an express condition of his release."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Nominate Friedrich To DC Court. The Legal Times (2/5, Schwartz) reports, "President George W. Bush is expected to nominate former White House insider Dabney Friedrich to fill the recently vacated seat on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, two sources familiar with the process say." The Times continues, "The White House is in the final stages of finalizing her nomination to replace Judge Gladys Kessler, who took senior status last month." The Times adds, "Friedrich, 39, was appointed to the U.S. Sentencing Commission in December. Before that she spent three years as an associate counsel in the White House, where she oversaw judicial nominations, including nominations for the Supreme Court. … A Yale Law School graduate, Friedrich began her career as a clerk on the District Court to now-Chief Judge Thomas Hogan. In 1994, she joined Latham & Watkins in San Diego. A year later she became a prosecutor in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, where she worked with now-U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Jeffrey Taylor. … In 1998, she moved to the Eastern District of Virginia, where she served until 2002. That year, Friedrich was hired as a staffer for the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. … She is married to Matthew Friedrich, former Enron task force prosecutor and now counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales."

Bush Budget Projects 2012 Surplus, Sharply Boosts Defense Spending. The Washington Post (2/5, A3, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "The budget that President Bush will submit to Congress today shows the federal deficit falling in each of the next four years and would produce a $61 billion surplus in 2012, administration officials said. But to get there, Bush is counting on strong economic growth, diminishing costs in the Iraq war and tight domestic spending to offset the cost of his tax cuts." Democrats "yesterday criticized the five-year budget plan as overly optimistic, and predicted that extending the tax cuts past their 2010 expiration date would dig the nation deeper into debt rather than produce a budget surplus. Republicans countered that the tax cuts are critical to maintaining a healthy economy and that a balanced budget is not possible without them." Republicans "hope to make the tax cuts a central feature of this year's budget debate."

The Washington Times/AP (2/5) reports that to balance the budget, Bush "would allow only modest growth in the government programs outside of defense and homeland security. He is proposing eliminations or sharp reductions in 141 government programs, for a savings over five years of $12 billion, although Congress has rejected many of the same proposals over the past two years." Bush also "will seek to trim spending on farm subsidies by $18 billion over five years, mainly by reducing payments to wealthier farmers, an effort certain to spark resistance among farm-state lawmakers."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Spiegel, 850K) reports, "When the Bush administration unveils its annual spending request Monday, it is expected to ask for a defense budget of $481 billion -- near historic highs, even when adjusted for inflation." It will also ask for "additional funding for Iraq and Afghanistan, taking the cost of those conflicts this year to close to $165 billion, and will present estimates for next year's costs that will push war spending above the total cost of Vietnam." But "if the military's top officers have their way, today's proposal may be only a precursor to a future of even larger defense budgets." The chiefs of the Army, the Navy and the Air Force "are gearing up for a long-term campaign to convince Congress and the public that the growing demands of the Iraq war -- plus the administration's aggressive global security ambitions -- require tens of billions more each year to meet the nation's defense needs."

USA Today (2/5, Wolf, Jackson, 2.27M) says Bush "presents a $2.9 trillion budget to Congress Monday amid a charm offensive intended to woo Democrats. His speech Saturday at a House Democratic retreat was the latest effort to reach out to opposing party members, who felt widely ignored during six years of GOP dominance. It was his first visit to the annual retreat since 2001." Bush "said he understood Democrats' doubts about White House cooperation, but 'in order to do big things, we're going to have to do it together.'" USA Today also points to other "signs of outreach" from Bush.

Portman Says 2008 Budget Includes "More Transparency." White House budget director Rob Portman, on CNN's Late Edition (2/4, Blitzer) said, "Our '08 projection, frankly, is just sort of a straight-line projection. We're assuming that the Iraq military operations will continue pretty much as they are. We, of course, hope that that's not the case. … We're giving Congress exactly what Congress asked for on a bipartisan basis, more transparency as to our costs and more information."

National Parks Would See Increased Spending. USA Today (2/5, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "National parks would be a big winner under…Bush's 2008 budget, and a plan to match up to $100 million annually in private donations could guarantee increases for a decade. Bush's budget, being unveiled today, would give the National Park Service $2.4 billion next year, administration officials told USA TODAY." That "includes a $258 million increase for daily operations, up 14.5%. Since 2002, those funds have risen 1.5% above inflation. The president proposes adding at least $100 million a year for the next 10 years. The funds would be used to hire 3,000 seasonal park rangers, guides and maintenance workers each summer, an increase of more than 50%. In addition, more than 1 million children could be enrolled in youth programs."

Bush To Fund Federal Program To Ease Traffic Congestion. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A6, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports, "With much of his domestic agenda stalled by Congress…Bush is embracing a new cause he is hoping will cross party lines and leave him with an end-of-term accomplishment: easing rush-hour traffic." In his budget, Bush "intends to showcase a highway 'congestion initiative,' according to White House documents, with grants for state and local governments to experiment with anti-jam strategies." In "a surprise that could foreshadow how Mr. Bush might reach out to Democrats -- and disappoint conservatives -- for the rest of his term, the centerpiece of the traffic plan involves an initiative that some critics say amounts to a tax, a plan depicted by administration officials as 'congestion pricing.' The administration will award $130 million in grants starting this spring to help cities and states build electronic toll systems that would charge drivers fees for traveling in and out of big cities during peak traffic times. The money also could go to other congestion strategies such as expanded telecommuting, but administration officials make it clear they think congestion pricing is the most powerful tool they have. The White House will seek an additional $175 million for congestion initiatives in next year's budget."

Analysis Predicts "Bonanza" Underpinning Bush Budgets, Strong Economy "Must" End. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A1, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that since he became president, Bush has "boosted annual defense spending by 50% -- including $500 billion over five years for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan -- and doubled spending on homeland security. At the same time, he's cut taxes, expanded Medicare to cover prescription drugs, approved $100 billion to clean up after Gulf Coast hurricanes, and signed bills that spend a little more each year on domestic programs. For years, critics said it couldn't last, backed by some historical precedent: President Johnson is blamed by many for triggering inflation in the 1970s by spending on both guns and butter." But "this time, it's been nearly painless. Inflation is in check. The federal budget deficit is down from its 2004 peak, and rests near its historical average of 2% of gross domestic product, a measure of the nation's total output. Long-term interest rates are relatively low. What's Mr. Bush's secret?" The Journal adds, "Ingredient one: strong revenue growth driven by an economy distinguished by surging profits and rising incomes at the top, which are taxed more heavily than incomes at the bottom. Ingredient two: tax cuts and spending increases, which arrived when the US economy needed a boost. Ingredient three, and perhaps the most significant: the willingness of foreigners to lend to the US, which finances the budget deficit without pushing up interest rates at a time when Americans don't save very much. … No one knows when this bonanza might end, although end it must. … For now, the budget the president will offer today essentially counts on continued good luck."

Democrats Hope To Finance Agenda By Cracking Down On "Tax Gap." The New York Times (2/5, Andrews, 1.16M) reports congressional Democrats, "hoping to finance an ambitious agenda without raising taxes, are on a collision course with the Bush administration about pursuing the potentially vast amount of money that people hide from the Internal Revenue Service." House and Senate Democrats "say the government could collect as much as $100 billion more a year by whittling the tax gap — the unpaid taxes, mostly on unreported earnings, that the I.R.S. estimated was about $300 billion a year." But the Treasury Department, "which oversees the I.R.S., says it cannot realistically recover one-tenth as much as Democrats suggest." On Monday, "as part of President Bush's budget proposal, the Treasury Department will unveil more than a dozen proposals to pursue tax cheats. But officials said those ideas would bring in less than $10 billion a year in extra revenue." The issue "may have new urgency with the Democrats now in power and driving the considerable momentum behind it." Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel "has cited the tax gap as a top priority for increasing revenue, ahead of any discussion about rolling back President Bush's tax cuts. Democrats badly want the money because they have adopted strict 'pay as you go' budgeting rules that require Congress to pay for any new programs or tax cuts with revenue from other areas."

Advocates Complain That Fewer Low-Income Seniors Get Free Drugs. USA Today (2/5, 5B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Eight months after Congress implored pharmaceutical companies to restore programs offering free drugs to needy Medicare recipients, advocacy groups say that some patients are still having trouble. 'Before the Medicare program, we had close to 4,000 seniors getting free drugs,' says Patricia White, executive director of the West Virginia Health Right clinic in Charleston, W.Va. 'We're probably down to 400 now.'" The issue "arose after many drug companies halted their assistance programs for Medicare-eligible patients once Medicare's drug benefit began last year. The drug companies feared running afoul of federal anti-kickback rules if they did not. Since then, Medicare officials and other regulators have said such programs can be set up in a way to avoid violating any laws. Currently, some drug companies, including AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline, Merck, Pfizer and Wyeth, offer help to Medicare members. Income limits and other rules vary, as do which drugs are covered. Dozens of other drugmakers, however, bar Medicare-eligible patients from assistance programs."

Bush Reportedly Looking To Truman As Model. Newsweek (2/12, Bailey, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article titled, "Inside Bush's Fixation With Harry Truman," reports that in a meeting with congressional Democrats after the midterm elections President Bush "compared his situation to the crisis Harry Truman faced in the early days of the cold war. Then, as now, Bush said, the United States confronted a dangerous ideological foe. Truman had answered with the Truman Doctrine, a vow to protect free peoples wherever they were threatened with communist domination. Truman's policies had been unpopular in their time, but 'history showed he was right,' said Bush, according to Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate. The Truman comparison didn't seem quite right to Durbin. … Bush's grasp of history may have been a little shaky, but there is no doubting the force of his conviction. Bush wants his legacy to be the long-term defeat of Islamic extremism."

"Resentment" Said To Drive Some Negative Media Coverage Of Bush. In his Washington Post "Media Notes" column (2/5, C1), Howard Kurtz writes, "These days, many in the media seem to be writing off President Bush." Are "pundits giving us the unvarnished truth, that we are witnessing the historic collapse of a presidency? Or is this the triumph of quick-draw, poll-driven journalism? … Some of the journalists who are especially aggressive in their coverage of Bush like him in private settings, where the president has a joshing manner and enjoys handing out nicknames. But professional resentment may still be behind some of the increasingly negative coverage," stemming from "Iraq, where the media fell down on the WMD debate," and "to Bush's 2000 campaign persona as a compassionate conservative." On both respects, "many journalists now believe they were led astray," and "that has given an extra edge to their stories and columns."

Top International-Policy Advisor At Treasury To Resign. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, Price, 2.04M) reports, "The US Treasury Department's top international-policy adviser, Timothy Adams, is resigning after seven years with the Bush administration. … In his resignation letter, Mr. Adams said his responsibilities to his wife and three young children were 'incompatible' with the job's demands. Since becoming undersecretary for international affairs in 2005, Mr. Adams has spent much of his time traveling to more than 40 countries. He previously was chief of staff to former Treasury Secretaries John Snow and Paul O'Neill."

DOD To Furnish Pelosi With Jet For Coast-To-Coast Flights. Roll Call (2/5, Van Dongen) reports, "The Defense Department has agreed to furnish House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) with a jet big enough to fly nonstop coast-to-coast, despite complaints from some Republicans that the request was causing friction at the Pentagon." Drew Hammill, a spokesman for the Speaker, "said Friday that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for 'clarification' on rules governing her use of military planes. After Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker was granted access to military transport for additional security, given the person in that job is third in the line of succession to the presidency." The plane "used by former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for frequent trips back to his Illinois home was a small, Lear-type jet, according to a Republican leadership aide. But that plane needs to refuel every 2,000 miles and could not make the nonstop haul to California."

Federal Government Faces Retirement "Brain Drain." The Financial Times (2/5, Knight) reports the US Federal Government "faces a massive talent drain in the coming years as many senior government officials reach retirement age and fewer bright young people opt for careers in public service." About "90 per cent of senior managers in federal government are eligible to retire in 10 years, and more than 40 per cent of all federal employees will be eligible for retirement by 2010, according to the Council for Excellence in Government, a non-partisan research group." At the same time, "fewer young people are choosing to work for the federal government. Many top US colleges and public policy schools report that the number of graduating students going into public service has decreased."

Aging Workforce Prompts DOD's Recent Job Shadow Recruitment Day. The Washington Post's (2/5, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that during the recent Information Technology Job Shadow Day at the Defense Department, "The first questions were right to the point: Is there a lot of paperwork in applying for a federal job? What's the easiest way to get a security clearance?" The Post adds, "Like other" agencies DOD "is concerned about its aging workforce. The department has about 69,000 technology professionals in its civil service ranks, and officials estimate that 10,000 will be eligible to retire at the end of this year. Not all of them will leave, of course, but Defense officials are looking to the future and want to make sure that teenagers understand the importance of math, science and English courses as building blocks for technology careers. For the job shadow day, the Pentagon revved up briefings and tours worthy of visiting dignitaries." The Post adds, "Tour stops for the students included the National Military Command Center, which links the defense secretary to other top government leaders during emergencies; the office of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates (who was not in); the Pentagon courtyard; and the 9/11 Memorial Chapel. One group of students started their Pentagon day with a "talk show" segment taped by the Pentagon Channel, the in-house TV and Web broadcast service."

Krugman Says White House Has Built "Patronage Machine." In his New York Times column (2/5), Paul Krugman says, "Under the guise of promoting a conservative agenda, the Bush administration has created a supersized version of the 19th-century spoils system." The "blueprint for Bush-era governance was laid out in a January 2001 manifesto from the Heritage Foundation, titled 'Taking Charge of Federal Personnel.'" Heritage "demanded that politics take precedence over know-how: the new administration 'must make appointment decisions based on loyalty first and expertise second.' Second, Heritage called for a big increase in outsourcing — 'contracting out as a management strategy.' This would supposedly reduce costs, but it would also have the desirable effect of reducing the total number of civil servants." The "ostensible reason for politicizing and privatizing was to promote the conservative ideal of smaller, more efficient government. But the small-government rhetoric was never sincere: from Day 1, the administration set out to create a vast new patronage machine."

Requiring Banks To Bid For Student Loans Proposed. Michael Dannenberg and Phillip Longman, both of the New America Foundation, argue in the Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K) that student loan interest rates and subsidies for banks could likely be "a lot" lower if Congress would "make lenders bid for the right to sell federally guaranteed student loans." Banks "could compete by offering the highest bid for the right to sell guaranteed student loans to designated schools or by agreeing to accept the lowest amount of subsidy." The experience of Missouri's recent sale of some student loans "suggests that taxpayers could save $15 billion to $20 billion over the next five years if Washington relied on market mechanisms instead of backroom politics to establish subsidy rates."

Consensus Grows That Census' Race Categories Should Be Dropped. In the New York Times' editorial observer (2/5), Brent Staples says, "A growing number of demographers and historians who are fully sympathetic to the civil rights struggle would probably be happy to see the word 'race' disappear from the census as well. There seems to be an emerging consensus that the system of racial classification that has dominated national politics and the census for nearly two centuries is so fraught with imprecision — and so tainted by racist ideas that have been disproved by science — that it should eventually be dropped altogether." This view "has been percolating among census historians for years. But it has gained traction since the 1990s, when there was a pitched battle over a proposal that would have added a 'multiracial' category to the 2000 census. A compromise allowed people to check more than one box for race. But that change only fueled the debate by revealing a conflict between the fixed racial categories that have long dominated American life and a different sense of identity that's clearly on the rise among younger Americans."

WSJournal Says Bush Trade Policy Benefits Exporters. The Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "President Bush's trade promotion authority expires in a few months, and along with it the ability to strike new free-trade deals. So it's worth highlighting that some of the fastest-growing destinations for American products are the countries with which we've signed trade-opening accords." According to the US Trade Representative's office, "U.S. goods exports have climbed by some 26% among the 10 countries with which the U.S. has signed accords since 2001. Meanwhile, goods exports to the rest of the world have only grown by 13% across the same period. The differential is even larger over the 12 months through November 2006 for new free-trade partners Australia, Chile, Jordan and Singapore. U.S. exports to those nations rose at a rate of 40.5%, compared with 14.4% to the rest of the world. No doubt this reflects the commodity (copper) boom in Chile, where, for example, Caterpillar has been able to double its exports of heavy equipment." The "new trade 'populists' in Congress like to claim that US exporters are getting a raw deal from Bush trade policy. As the export facts show, the truth is precisely the opposite."

NYTimes Says FDA News More Drug Regulatory Power. The New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) reports the Food and Drug Administration "is making encouraging moves to strengthen its regulation of drugs that are already on the market. But the changes fall far short of what's needed to protect millions of unsuspecting patients whose adverse effects may show up only after years of use." The FDA had "already been moving to strengthen its safety assessments but now has developed a more comprehensive approach." Even so, Congress "needs to give the agency more money and more teeth: including explicit powers to impose conditions on drugs that begin to look risky, to require additional testing and even to yank drugs from the market."

Democrats Urged To Back Teacher Accountability Standards. Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (2/12) writes, "It's time to move from identifying failing schools to identifying failing teachers. Sounds obvious, but it hasn't happened in American education. … Each political party is about half right. Republicans are right about the need for strict performance standards and wrong in believing that enduring change is possible without lots more money from Washington. Democrats are right about the need to pay teachers more but wrong to kiss up to teachers unions bent on preventing accountability. As President Bush's flawed (but landmark) No Child Left Behind (NCLB) program comes up for reauthorization this year, the onus is on Democrats. Will they cave to their party's biggest special interest -- or do what most of them acknowledge in private is essential?"

OTHER NEWS:

"Vibrant Economic Boom" Provides Rare Good New For Bush. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Pethokoukis, 2.03M), in an article titled, "A Bounce For Bush Steady interest rates and an expanding economy give the president some good news, for a change," reports, "It's not really too surprising that George W. Bush's visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange last week marked only the second time that a sitting president had made such an appearance. … After all, most politicians probably think it's better to be seen as a representative of the common man and Main Street than of shiny-suited financiers and Wall Street. But Bush's big problem right now is that instead of Main Street or Wall Street, he might be more associated with Haifa Street." According to US News, "Wall Street's not a bad alternative for an embattled president dealing with a foreign policy nightmare, especially when he can talk up what's turning out to be a vibrant economic boom."

Analysts Say Housing Slump Not Yet Over. USA Today (2/5, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Housing is proving to be one of the biggest wild cards in the economy in 2007 as analysts are deeply divided about whether the worst in the downturn is over or there is much more pain to go. Only 9% of economists say the housing decline ended in 2006, according to a USA TODAY survey of 55 economists taken Jan. 18-24. Another 42% said the downturn will end in the first half of the year, and 45% said housing will bottom out in the second half." USA Today adds, "When housing bottoms out is key for the economy. Thus far, the fallout has been small. The economy grew at a faster pace in 2006 than in 2005 even though sales of previously owned homes fell 8.2%, the biggest drop in 17 years, the National Association of Realtors says."

On its front page, USA Today (2/5, 1A, Knox, 2.27M) also reports, "Renters be warned: Landlords are expected to raise apartment rents for a third-straight year in 2007, forcing tenants to turn over a growing chunk of their pay and making it harder to save for a home, a report to be issued today by Marcus & Millichap finds."

House Democrats Expect Wave Of GOP Retirements In 2008. Roll Call (2/5, Duran) reports, "The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is watching more than two dozen House Republicans for signs they are ready to call it quits in 2008. The Democrats believe a wave of Republican departures can help them cement their House majority. … Given the GOP's new minority status in the House, Democratic strategists think some veteran Republicans will head into retirement while some younger Members will opt to run for other offices. Democrats also believe that ethics scrapes could force a handful of GOP incumbents from office." For 2008, "even though many of the 27 districts in question are notable for their Republican tilt, House Democratic strategists, emboldened by wins in the previous cycle in Republican territory such as Kansas and close calls in GOP bastions such as Wyoming, believe they can put many open seats in play."

Rothenberg Analyzes House GOP Prospects In 2008. Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (2/5), "Most surge elections, during which one party makes sweeping gains in the House of Representatives at the expense of the opposition, have been followed by a surge back toward the other party two years later. Will the 2006 elections produce the same snapback, with substantial Republican gains, or can Democrats minimize their losses, securing their control of the House after next year's presidential election? … Former Republican Congressmen Charles Bass (N.H.), Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Jim Leach (Iowa), Anne Northup (Ky.), Rob Simmons (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.) didn't lose because they were terrible candidates. They lost because they were in marginal seats or in districts carried by Al Gore in 2000 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. It will be very difficult (though obviously not impossible) for the GOP to retake those districts." It also "seems unlikely that GOP open seats that went Democratic in November in Iowa, Colorado, New York and Arizona suddenly will snapback to the Republicans." Republican "chances of reclaiming seats lost in 2006 undoubtedly are strongest in fundamentally Republican and conservative districts. That means that Democratic House freshmen such as Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Nick Lampson (Texas), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and possibly Jerry McNerney (Calif.) are at greatest risk. In addition, a couple of Democratic incumbents who almost lost despite the strong wind at their backs -- Georgia Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall -- surely have to consider themselves at considerable risk."

in the minority. The seven-page document was hand distributed to Congressional offices Jan. 17, and responses were culled and presented at the annual GOP retreat at the end of January." Roll Call "obtained a copy of the original survey last week, prompting Garrett's office to agree to review the results of the poll Friday. Sixty-one Members, or 30 percent of the Republican Conference, responded to the questionnaire. All responses were anonymous. The most overwhelming response was that more than 80 percent of respondents said they believed the GOP could win a majority in the 2008 elections."

Cole Says NRCC Won't Take Sides In Primaries. Roll Call (2/5, Drucker) reports, "The National Republican Congressional Committee will not take sides in any House GOP primaries this cycle, NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) said in an interview Friday." Cole also "said that he will refrain from doling out personal endorsements and campaign contributions in primaries while he is chairman." Cole's decision "partly is due to the wishes of House Republicans, who in a recent closed-door meeting were fairly unified — and vocal — in their desire that the NRCC avoid playing kingmaker in contested primaries." But Cole also "attributed his policy to a belief that candidates who navigate a primary without help or anointing from Washington, DC, insiders emerge battle-tested for the general election and in a better position to secure the support of grass-roots Republicans."

Snow Encouraged To Run For Senate, President. The Washington Times (2/5, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "American Spectator senior editor Quin Hillyer thinks Tony Snow should consider a run for the US Senate" or for president in "2012 or even 2016 (he's only 51 right now)." Hillyer adds that "if Snow can't exactly pull off a race for president in 2008, there is another public office he ought to consider. Virginia's senior US Sen. John W. Warner will be just shy of 82 when the next election rolls around." The "notion piqued the interest of U.S. News & World Report's Paul Bedard, who went right to the source yesterday, asking Mr. Snow if he intended to pursue office. 'I am absolutely Shermanesque,' came the reply. 'After this job, the best I am likely ever to have, I'm going to do something that will enable me to spend much more time with the family.'"

McCain Said To Pass GOP "Tax Litmus Test" This Time Around. In his column in the Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K), Robert Novak says Sen. McCain, "who echoed Teddy Kennedy on taxes when he ran for president in 2000, sounds more like Jack Kemp as a 2008 candidate. 'I've never voted for a tax increase in 24 years,' he told me last week. 'Never, ever, not under any president, including President Reagan, and I will never vote for a tax increase, nor support a tax increase.'" McCain "wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent. ('If I didn't vote to make those tax cuts permanent, it would have the effect of a tax increase.') He supports radically scaling back the estate tax and does not now favor upper-income increases in the Social Security tax. McCain gets tax policy advice from conservatives, including supply-side founding father Arthur Laffer. 'I may have changed some of my views,' the senator said. 'You learn over 24 years.'" Novak adds, "Thus, McCain passes the Republican tax litmus test, as he did not in 2000. That may be why McCain has lost liberal journalists and other non-Republicans entranced by his campaign against George W. Bush."

McCain Defends New Aides Despite Past Clashes, Criticism. The New York Times (2/5, Times, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday that several aides brought on to his presidential campaign were 'good people,' despite his own past criticisms of their work for others in the past." Appearing on "This Week" on ABC, McCain was "asked about a front-page article in The New York Times on Sunday noting that Mr. McCain's political team includes advisers who tried to skewer him in the 2000 primary against George W. Bush. And Mr. McCain has brought on members of the team that produced the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement in 2004 questioning the Vietnam War service record of Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, which Mr. McCain had criticized." McCain said, "These are good people who were doing as they were instructed. They are people who shape the message, don't dictate it."

Giuliani's Position On Judges Said To Mollify To Conservatives. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (2/4, Wallace) said he thinks former New York city Mayor Rudy Giuliani will run for president and that the "conventional wisdom is well, once he gets in the race and everyone learns that he's pro-choice, and has a different view on gay rights and has been pro-gun control, that his support will collapse. I'm not so sure. This is a war election. The Democrats are going to be the anti- war party. … I think if Giuliani is conservative on judges, if Giuliani says look, 'I served in the Reagan Justice Department with John Roberts and Samuel Alito, they're the kinds of judges I'll put on the court, I might vote differently as a legislator on abortion, but let's not have the federal courts resolve these issues, let's give them back to the democratic processes in the states' -- if he makes that a very key part of his campaign -- his conservative view on judges -- I think he has a chance to overcome social conservative concerns." Kristol added, "But most social conservatives want to fight the war against jihadist Islam. If they think Giuliani can do that, they'll be open to him."

Hagel Says He Would Not Be An "Antiwar" Presidential Candidate. Asked on ABC's This Week (2/4, Stephanopoulos) if intends to run for president, Sen. Chuck Hagel responded, "I'll make that decision as time develops. But last point on this: I'm not an anti-war candidate. … Every member of the Congress should be engaged here, and their people that they represent should know where they stand. If they want to continue to send young men and women to fight and die in Iraq, then they should step forward and explain that position and why. If they don't, explain that. But to have a different position than the president's on a war doesn't qualify anyone to be an anti-war candidate."

Edwards Says His Healthcare Plan Would Raise Taxes. The AP (2/5) reports John Edwards "said Sunday his plan for universal health care would require higher taxes and cost up to $120 billion year." Edwards said, "The bottom line is we're asking everybody to share in the responsibility of making health care work in this country. Employers, those who are in the medical insurance business, employees, the American people -- everyone will have to contribute in order to make this work." Edwards added, "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes. The only way you can pay for a health care plan that costs anywhere from $90 (billion) to $120 billion is there has to be a revenue source." Edwards said "his plan would aim to provide health care coverage for the 47 million people who currently lack it and reduce the cost of health care coverage for middle-class families, partly by making health care programs more efficient."

Edwards Says Vote On Iraq War Was Mistake. The Washington Post (2/5, A4, Mosk, 690K) reports that of the "2008 Democratic presidential contenders who voted to give President Bush authority to wage war in Iraq, only one," John Edwards, "will have no chance to make a very public U-turn when resolutions opposing the president's new war plan come before Congress in the coming days." But Edwards "showed again yesterday that he will find other venues to parlay his Senate vote into an extended mea culpa." On NBC's "Meet the Press," Edwards said, "It wasn't just the weapons of mass destruction I was wrong about. It's become absolutely clear -- and I'm very critical of myself for this -- become absolutely clear, looking back, that I should not have given the president this authority." The Post adds Edwards's 'nationally televised admission was just the start of a lengthy public dissection of the errors he said he made in casting the most important vote of his Senate tenure."

Edwards was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/4, Russert) if Sen. Hillary Clinton is "morally bound to admit the war was wrong," Edwards answered, "If she believes that her vote was wrong, then, yes, she should say so. If she believes that her vote was right, then she should defend it. … If we believe it is morally wrong to escalate this war and it is strategically wrong to escalate this war, what I have said is it is not enough to give speeches, to talk to political pundits, to pass nonbinding resolutions. … I actually believe that what the president and Cheney are counting on is that what we'll do is we'll talk about it, we'll complain about it, we'll talk about how bad the escalation is, but at the end of the day, we'll go along. We cannot go along. We cannot enable this president to make another in a terrible series of bad mistakes." Asked he believes Clinton "has been open and honest about her support of the war," Edwards responded, "I don't know the answer to that question, honestly. I don't know what's inside her head and her heart about this. I can't tell whether there are political calculations going on. I just don't know."

Edwards Admits Obama Was Right To Oppose The Iraq War In 2002. Later in his Meet the Press interview Edwards admitted that Sen. Barack Obama was correct in opposing the Iraq war from the start but contended Obama wasn't "burdened like a lot of us with the information that we were receiving on the Intelligence Committee and as members of the United States Senate. We were getting very intimate, detailed information about what was actually happening in Iraq. … I was wrong" and "should be held accountable for that. But I do think it matters when you are willing to be open and honest with voters about what you've done."

Edwards Taking Sharper Tone In Second Race. The New York Times (2/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports Edwards, "faced with what he always knew would be a tough race against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination and now the challenge of convincing his party that he is also a better alternative than Senator Barack Obama," is "trying to muscle his way past them and the rest of the field, in part by staking out early and provocative positions on the big issues." On Iraq, Edwards "not only came out for a complete withdrawal within 12 to 18 months, but he also challenged his Democratic rivals who are still in government to confront President Bush more directly. And on Monday, Mr. Edwards will set out a plan to provide health insurance to the 46.6 million Americans who do not have it, stealing a march on Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats on what is shaping up to be one of the biggest domestic issues of the presidential race." Edwards "has taken on a sharper tone since that campaign ended in defeat. He is campaigning as a harder-edged economic populist now, which he says represents more a change in tone than in substance. He says he is both more electable and more authentic than Mrs. Clinton, and more experienced than Mr. Obama." In the "battle to be the most credible alternative to Mrs. Clinton in the Democratic primaries, Mr. Edwards has built some early advantages. He has avidly pursued labor support."

Edwards Setting The Standard For Negative Campaigning Thus Far. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (2/12) writes, "Speaking to the Democratic National Committee after Sen. Barack Obama and before Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, [Sen. John Edwards] accused Senate Democrats (that is, Obama and Clinton) of caving in to President Bush's Iraq escalation policy. … Isn't it a little early to start calling your opponents cowards, even if you don't do it by name? Not this time: nasty is in season already. One reason is the insane money scramble, which literally raises the stakes. And with such a demographically diverse field, chances for emotional collisions abound." Fineman adds, "Going 'negative' on the war is tricky for Obama, who says he wants to walk the high road. … Edwards embodies the darker tone."

Obama Campaign Focusing On Message, Not Viability. The Washington Post (2/5, A1, Kornblut, 690K) reports in a front page story that in the "nearly three weeks since Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) made his unofficial debut as a presidential candidate, his senior advisers have been holed up in a temporary office on Connecticut Avenue NW, feverishly working to translate the huge excitement about his candidacy into a political strategy." For all "the buzz about his running, Obama did not enter the race with the conventional weapons of a presidential candidate -- a deep database of donors, a tactical road map for winning primaries or even a sign marking the entrance to his ad hoc campaign headquarters. Obama is only now starting to build a political infrastructure that matches his growing support." But the "challenge for Obama is not just assembling the nuts and bolts of a national campaign on the fly. He must, his advisers believe, do so in a way that reflects the distinct, next-generation message of his candidacy, or at least avoids making him look like every other politician in the race." In "contrast to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who spent the first two weeks of her official candidacy trying to project strength and inevitability, Obama will seek a more pared-down image that focuses on the substance of his message ('the audacity of hope,' as his book title put it) rather than on proving his ability to win a general election."

Supporter Urges African Americans To Back Obama. The Politico (2/5, Smith) reports a "key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians." The comments "by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists." Speaking to "more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC," Jones said, "How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" The Politico adds Jones, "a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like 'crabs in a barrel' the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community."

Gore Resisting Pressure To Seek Presidency Again. The Washington Times (2/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Al Gore is "basking in the global spotlight for nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar, but a growing number of Democrats want him to make another bid for the presidency." Gore said he is "interested in a 'different kind of campaign to try to change enough minds' to solve the global-warming problem, but that doesn't stop people from asking." On Friday, Gore "spoke to 1,500 Silicon Valley leaders gathered…for the annual 'State of the Valley' conference, hosted by Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network. The audience sent the Democrat questions via text-messaging during the speech. The first on the list, projected on jumbo screens to Mr. Gore's left and right: 'Will you run for president?'" Gore said, "I don't have any plans to run for president, but I appreciate the request.'" The Times adds, "Not everyone is convinced, and 'Draft Gore' movements are sprouting across the country." The "problem is that Mr. Gore doesn't seem to want to renew his political career, and nothing about his lifestyle suggests that he'll mount a bid. His friends and former advisers say privately that he is happy with his life as a somewhat regular -- albeit wealthy -- public figure."

Thompson, Vilsack Discuss National Issues. USA Today (2/5, Page, 2.27M) interviewed former Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Tommy Thompson of Wisconsin. Asked if they would vote for a Senate resolution in opposition to President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq, Thompson said, "I would vote against the resolution. President Bush was asked by the (Iraq) Study Committee, by the American public, by the electorate to try something different in Iraq. … We should give this opportunity a chance to work." Vilsack said, "The president's escalation plan is about to make a big mistake even bigger." Asked if the US should negotiate directly with Iran and Syria, Thompson said, "I believe strongly that the United States should take the leadership — not alone, but in conjunction with all the European countries that support our philosophy, our way of government, Japan and our allies. (We should) have a conference, have a summit and develop a unified position. America cannot do it alone." Vilsack said, "We have made a mistake over the course of the last several years in not having direct discussions with Syria, Iran, and North Korea.

We in all areas have made situations that were quite dangerous be more dangerous." Asked if they "support providing a way for illegal immigrants to gain legal status while remaining in the USA," Vilsack said, "I think these folks should have to pay a fine. I think they should have to pay back taxes, because that's only fair to the rest of us. I think they should be put at the back of the line, given no preference, and be given the opportunity to earn their way to citizenship." Thompson said, "They have to go back to their country and apply. They've got to go to the back of the line and allow those individuals who come into this country legally really to have preference."

Romney Still Dogged By Questions About His Stands On Social Issues. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "In his stump speech…Mitt Romney makes no mention of hot-button issues like abortion or the role of religion in politics. But when the speech is finished, the Republican presidential hopeful is swarmed by reporters asking only hot-button questions: Will conservative voters believe that the formerly pro-choice ex-governor of Massachusetts is now antiabortion? How did he make the conversion? Will evangelical Christians back a devout Mormon like Romney? Romney…insists that voters are more concerned with other issues, like 'How are we going to beat the jihadists? How are we going to be competitive with Asia? How to improve our schools and healthcare.' And yet answering those hotter-button questions may hold the key to whether Romney has a shot at winning the Republican nomination."

Kerry Seen As Lingering In Disappointment Over 2004 Loss. The New York Times (2/5, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports a "Senate loner for 22 years," John Kerry "seems all the more isolated now as he darts past the media hordes around the next set of presidential seekers, colleagues that include Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama." Even in the "best of times, Mr. Kerry's face hung droopy and funereal, one of the most weary in American politics. Today, Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the exit poll president-elect for a few hours in November 2004, endures the peculiar pariah status that his party reserves for its losing nominees." As the 2008 campaign "begins in earnest, Mr. Kerry has been forced to adapt to something resembling a normal Senate life. This has been no small challenge for a man whose identity has long been steeped in becoming president, or trying to." The Times adds, "Yet to many eyes, Mr. Kerry will always be trapped in yesterday's news and lingering disappointment. He is a member of the tiny club that knows what it is like to lose an election to George W. Bush — to blow an election, by some accounts."

Clinton's Lifelong Ties To Minister Explored. Newsweek (2/12, Meadows, 3.12M) reports, "If Hillary Clinton and George W. Bush have anything in common, it is a deeply rooted wariness of outsiders. Both the president and the woman who hopes to succeed him have always relied on a small, closed circle of friends and advisers who have been with them for years. … There is another person on Hillary's shortlist of confidants who goes back farther than any of them, but whom you've probably never heard of. The Rev. Don Jones, a Methodist minister who is now 75, was perhaps Hillary's earliest spiritual and political mentor. She has written of her 'lifelong friendship' with him. It was Jones who first awakened young Hillary to the civil-rights movement and counseled her on questions of faith. They continued to be in touch as Hillary became a national figure. Years later, he helped her through the darkest period in her life, the aftermath of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky."

Clinton's Attempt To "Soften Up Her Image" Analyzed. U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (2/12) writes, "On her first foray into Iowa as a presidential candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton was clearly trying to soften up her image. 'I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience,' she said. 'The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom is part of who I am.' Wow. Could this be the same Hillary Clinton who told voters way back in her husband's first run for the White House that she wasn't just going to stay home and bake cookies? … The Clintons are a great reflection of the national zeitgeist. So don't take Hillary's appearance in Iowa in pastels lightly: It may mean we've come full circle, baby."

WPost Criticizes Clinton Campaign's Bundling Plan. The Washington Post (2/5, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "As she launches her presidential fundraising juggernaut," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) "is tasking her biggest financial backers to bring in $1 million or more for her campaign, the New York Times reported. Truth be told, for a fundraiser with a fat Rolodex of rich friends, this isn't quite as daunting as it sounds." While "the senator's not to blame for this state of affairs, the audacity of the $1 million target does evoke distasteful memories of the Lincoln Bedroom rake-it-all-in mentality of the Clinton presidential years. And the unwillingness of her campaign to commit to listing its big bundlers -- as President Bush did during both of his campaigns -- is appalling."

Schwarzenegger Complains About Lawmakers In New Recordings. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Nicholas, 850K) reports recordings "of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger bantering with aides in closed-door meetings reveal him complaining about lawmakers from both parties, casting some as obstructionist and two-faced." The recordings, "newly obtained by The Times, also feature him chatting about American resentment of illegal immigrants, about his taste for gas-hungry Hummers and about his wife's habit of tinkering with his speeches." The recordings "offer a rare window onto the governor's operation and a more complex portrait of Schwarzenegger than typically emerges in public, where his appearances are carefully stage-managed." In the "latest recordings, the Republican governor describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) as a 'very sick man' and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) as 'a political operator coming from the union background' who evinces no real 'passion' about issues. And he worries that a federal plan to build a fence along the Mexican border will send a troubling message."

Bush Rhetoric On Iran Echoes Iraq Stance. In an analysis, the AP (2/5, Raum) says President Bush's "tough new stance on Iran and his military buildup in the Persian Gulf recall some of the drumbeats that preceded the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. As then, the Bush administration is making allegations about Iran without providing proof." While Bush "insists he has no plans to invade Iran, only to protect US troops in Iraq," in recent days Bush "raised the US naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region; The administration confirmed that Bush has authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian agents who are plotting attacks on US forces; [and] the administration has armed Iran's Arab neighbors with Patriot missiles." Bush's "saber-rattling," the AP writes, "rather than reaching out to Iran and Syria diplomatically as recommended by the Iraq Study group and many in Congress -- is a risky strategy" and has lead "many national security professionals [to] suggest this approach could lead to wider conflict."

Report Warns Military Action Against Iran Would Be "Highly Dangerous." The Financial Times (2/5, Smyth) reports military action in response to Iran's atomic program would be "highly dangerous" with "diplomacy still an option," according to a report published today by Crisis Action, a group of British non-governmental organizations, think-tanks and trade unions. The report warns that "US or Israeli attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could lead to civilian deaths, radioactive contamination, heightened conflict in neighboring Iraq and Afghanistan, al-Qaeda attacks stemming from intensified anti-western feeling, higher oil prices and an acceleration of Tehran's nuclear program." Among those endorsing the report is Sir Richard Dalton, UK ambassador to Iran from 2003 to 2006, who said the report was "wagging a finger" to remind the British government that military action should be "a last resort in self-defense or to prevent an imminent threat."

Iranian Official Criticizes Administration For "Disinformation." In a letter to the editor of the New York Times (2/5, 1.16M), M. A. Mohammadi, press secretary for Iran's mission to the United Nations, writes, "The United States has now resorted to the soft power of disinformation about Iran by leveling false charges regarding Iran's behavior toward Iraq." Instead, he says that while Iran has "fully supported the new government in Iraq and has signed various trade and energy agreements with Baghdad, the United States government continues to demonize Iran and blame it for America's own failures." Mohammadi goes on to say that Iran "favors a strong, unified Iraq whose sovereignty is not constantly trampled upon by the intrusive Western powers. To this effect, Iran has responded favorably to Iraq's call for a regional forum to discuss the country's dangerous crisis."

Experts Urges Congress To Avert War With Iran. Leonard Weiss of the Center for International Security and Cooperation at Stanford University and Larry Diamond of Stanford's Hoover Institution write in a Los Angeles Times (2/5, 850K) op-ed, "Despite anguish and anger over the Bush administration's decision to escalate its failing war in Iraq, Congress is unlikely to cut off funding. … But nothing prevents Congress from using its power of the purse to prevent an American attack on Iran." They concede that Iran is "not innocent of dangerous and provocative behavior," but says "war is not yet justified, except in the minds of those who have been lobbying for it for years." Therefore, Weiss and Diamond urge Congress to pass "a law preventing the expenditure of any funds for a military attack on Iran unless Congress has either declared war with that country or has otherwise authorized military action under the War Powers Act."

India Faces "Delicate Diplomacy" In Talks This Week. AFP (2/5) reports India will engage in "delicate diplomacy this week during talks with Washington on a crucial civilian nuclear deal and with nuclear renegade Iran over energy and regional issues," analysts said. Energy cooperation will be "high" on Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee's agenda when he visits Tehran this week "amid growing US pressure on countries for tougher sanctions" against Iran. The two countries are "expected to discuss two multi-billion dollar gas deals including a pipeline that would cross Pakistan to help meet demand in energy-hungry India." Meanwhile in Washington, India's special envoy on the US nuclear deal, Shyam Saran, "is expected to conclude a deal that lifts three decades of US sanctions barring the transfer of civilian nuclear technology and equipment to India." However, US ambassador to New Delhi, David C. Mulford, last week warned that Washington "would be following Mukherjee's Iran visit."

Cohen Says Strong US-Indian Relations Should Include Military Cooperation. Former Secretary of Defense William Cohen writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) that the US-India relationship "emanates from shared values, interests and objectives," which "demonstrate that India and the US are ideal partners in exerting a positive influence in the 21st century." The "healthy relationship" between the two, he says, "serves as a working example of cooperation between countries of divergent history and composition." Specifically, Cohen writes that the recent US-India civilian nuclear initiative "has the potential to engender goodwill and partnership" and "finally removes the cinder from the eye, ending decades of misunderstanding and distrust about India's nuclear intent and capabilities." The "increasing strategic connections" between the US and India, he concludes, therefore "should progress to closer military coordination -- and cooperation."

Europeans Rethink Relations With US Amid Changes Of Leadership. The Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Marquand, 59K) reports Germans and the media "solidly" backed the decision to indict 13 CIA last week for "kidnapping a German of Lebanese descent and interrogating him in Afghanistan." The "solidarity" in Germany "underscores a shifting tone in Europe. As changes of leadership loom in Britain and France, and capitals contemplate relations with a post-Bush US, Uncle Sam may expect stronger 'pushbacks' from Europe, experts here say." Public disapproval of the US-led "war on terror" is "also growing, spurring the change." For example, Gordon Brown, who is shortly expected to take over as prime minister in Great Britain, "opposed the Iraq war from the start, and has made no secret that he plans to carve out an independent line on the venerable 'special relationship' with the US." Meanwhile, also "boosting this sentiment is Europeans' recognition that the US is also in flux with an election season starting up, and that President Bush's term appears to be winding down with the United States in a vulnerable position overseas."

Merkel Seen As Europe's "Most Commanding" Leader. The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Fleishman, 850K) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel "can work a room, turning pragmatism into an erudite, diplomatic charm that has made her Europe's most commanding leader." Merkel is "rising in stature as British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac are set to leave office," and has "improved ties with the Bush administration even though Merkel has refused to send troops to Iraq and has criticized the treatment of terrorism suspects in US custody." Her government is also "attempting to revive Middle East peace talks, negotiate an end to the crisis over Iran's uranium enrichment program, improve links with China and build a unified Europe less driven by the traditional German-French axis."

Palestinian Truce Begins Taking Hold. The Washington Times/AP (2/5, Laub) reports on Sunday night "efforts were underway to restore a truce" between Palestinian factions as "gunmen pulled back from their positions" in Gaza and "both sides began to exchange hostages." Meanwhile in the West Bank, "a strategy session by Fatah leaders ended in a shouting match, with some participants demanding Abbas' party take a tougher stand against Hamas in the struggle for control of the Palestinian government, and others pushing to give a mediation effort by Saudi Arabia a chance." The AP says the "infighting among Palestinians has overshadowed new efforts to restart the peace process with Israel," with Israeli Deputy Premier Shimon Peres Sunday saying Israel must "leave Gaza to the Gazans."

The New York Times (2/5, A9, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the "fierce internal clashes between Palestinian factions have shocked many Palestinians and Arab governments, who fear that the continuing bloodshed is damaging the Palestinian image before the world, Palestinians say." Even as the Bush administration has moved recently "to try for significant progress toward peace, Palestinians say their own infighting is making it too easy for Israel to argue that the time is not right to promote a Palestinian state."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (2/5, Mitnick, 59K) warns the violence between Fatah and Hamas "is threatening to spill over, as Fatah militants in cities such as Nablus embark on a series of kidnappings as a counterpunch to Hamas gains in Gaza." A "new West Bank battle front," it says, "would expose nearly twice as many Palestinians to the daily skirmishes that have kept Gazans shuttered indoors, and threaten to drag Israeli forces into the fray."

Saudi Shiites Fear Crackdown On Rights. The New York Times (2/5, Fattah, Al-Samh, 1.16M) reports, "With sectarian tensions rising between Sunnis and Shiites throughout the Middle East, and pressure growing on the Saudi government by the country's Sunni leadership, Saudi Shiites, who have made great strides in recent years, are worried that those gains will be rolled back." Despite recent advances, the Shiites' "hard-won rights have yet to be enshrined into law, meaning they could be rescinded at short notice." More recently, Sunni clerics have "stepped up their preaching against Shiites recently, declaring them again to be infidels. And earlier this week King Abdullah, speaking of rumors that Shiites are seeking to convert Sunnis, said that such attempts would fail, and that Sunnis would always make up a majority of the world's Muslims."

No Confirmation Of Al-Qaeda Casualties In Somalia Strike. The Financial Times (2/5, Wallis) reports Ethiopia is "working closely with the US to identify Islamist combatants killed in neighboring Somalia, but there has been no confirmation yet of the death of targeted al-Qaeda suspects," according Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi.

Meles said the US had been "assisting with DNA testing on suspects killed in recent fighting," but "we do not have definite information on a number of the key al-Qaeda targets. There are reports that one or two of them might have died but we have no confirmation."

New North Korea Nuclear Weapons Talks Inspire Little Optimism. U.S. News and World Report (2/12, Omestead, 2.03M) reports, "Like any good diplomat, Christopher Hill knows how to dampen expectations before sitting down to hash out a deal. But more than most envoys, Hill, the top U.S. negotiator in talks resuming in Beijing this week over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs, has ample reason to let some skepticism show. Fifty-two frustrating months into a confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear weapons programs, the six-nation talks established to rein in Pyongyang's atomic breakout have, so far, netted nothing. … Even advocates for negotiations increasingly suspect that, despite its decision to rejoin talks, the North has made a strategic choice to stick with nuclear weapons as the ultimate deterrent to any effort to dislodge Asia's most secretive and anti-American regime. Time, it seems, has been working against Hill and others seeking a deal: With Pyongyang's nuclear buildup and its seeming judgment that the administration is tied down by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may believe that he can wait out President Bush."

US Negotiator Says Pyongyang Must Live Up To Pledge. The AP (2/5, Lim) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Sunday said Pyongyang "must live up to its pledge to fully dismantle its nuclear program," as Japanese news reports suggested it "may be willing to shut down a key reactor." Hill, who was meeting with South Korean officials in Seoul to discuss negotiating strategies before the six-party talks resume in Beijing Thursday, said, "Frankly, we cannot accept anything less than 100 percent implementation of the September statement. The ultimate task for us is to complete denuclearization."

WSJournal Warns Against Releasing Frozen North Korean Funds. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/5, A16, 2.04M) writes Beijing "rolls out the welcome mat" for Kim Jong-nam, the eldest son of dictator Kim Jong Il, who has been "living the high life at five-star hotels, gambling at Macau's famous casinos." His residence in Macau is "a reminder of another Macau-North Korea connection that Beijing would like to forget -- the laundering of ill-gotten North Korean money at Macau's Banco Delta Asia." As six-party talks resume Thursday in Beijing, Pyongyang "is demanding that the US lift sanctions on Banco Delta Asia and hand over the $24 million." Doing so, the Journal warns, "would only encourage Kim Jong Il in the pursuit of the illicit activities that make it possible for him to pay off the generals who sustain his regime -- and keep his son living it up in Macau."

Satellite Downing Complicates China's Effort To Reach The Moon. Newsweek (2/12, Liu, Carmichael, 3.12M) reports, "Western analysts still can't say what Beijing was thinking when it shot down one of its aging weather satellites. True, the recent test was a fine show of marksmanship, destroying a refrigerator-size target sailing at orbital speed 500 miles up (as high as U.S. spy satellites). But was it worth risking a new arms race? Was it even worth the mess it caused? … The drifting wreckage is a danger not only to other countries' spacecraft but to China's own ambitions for the heavens -- which go far beyond blinding the U.S. military. Beijing put its first man into orbit less than four years ago. Today the Chinese are reaching for the moon."

New UN Chief Off To "Rocky Start." The Washington Times (2/5, A1, Pisik, 88K) reports on its front page Ban Ki-moon is "off to a rocky start after one month as U.N. secretary-general, with diplomats complaining that his transition is progressing far too slowly and member states resisting his early proposals for restructuring." U.N. insiders have "questioned his early appointments, saying he is not striking out boldly with his own team, but relying too much on insiders from predecessor Kofi Annan's tenure." Such criticisms "have frustrated members of the transition team and worried Mr. Ban's early supporters."

UK Seeks To Contain Europe's Largest Bird Flu Outbreak. NBC Nightly News (2/4, story 7, 0:25, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "In Britain, nearly 160,000 turkeys are being destroyed in an effort to contain an outbreak of the deadly strain of bird flu. Health officials say about 2,500 turkeys died of the virus on a commercial farm northeast of London" owned by the country's largest producer.

The Financial Times (2/5, Cookson, Aglionby) says a "biosecurity zone has also been set up around" the farm "as a precaution against the deadly virus spreading." Brussels said Sunday that the UK had "followed the correct procedures in dealing with the outbreak and had informed it in good time." Meanwhile, the European Commission Monday will formally endorse the security cordon established by the UK, while an EU spokeswoman said she did not expect any internal or external pressure for a trade ban.

Survey Shows French Blacks Face Discrimination. The Washington Times (2/5, A1, Bryant, 88K) reports on its front page that France's "comfortable image of itself as a colorblind society -- already weakened by race riots in 2005 -- received a further blow last week when a new survey found that a majority of French blacks believe they face discrimination in daily life." Coinciding with a

"disturbing television documentary about living as a black person in France," the survey by the TNS-Sofres polling agency is "the first of its kind and is galvanizing public debate just weeks before presidential election." The Times notes that French politicians in this year's presidential and legislative races "are beginning to grasp the potential power of the minority vote, particularly since a voter-registration drive has been stunningly successful in many low-income areas where minorities live."

Author Says Qaddafi "Deserves Sole Credit" For Policy U-Turn. Author Hisham Matar writes in the New York Times (2/5, 1.16M) that since 2003 Libyan diplomats "have been hard at work convincing the West that Libya is no longer interested in amassing weapons of mass destruction, blowing up Western airplanes or covertly financing armed movements abroad." Presenting this "new face," he says, "has been largely effective: sanctions, in place since 1982, have been lifted; Libya has been removed from the United States roster of terrorist nations; and the list of international trade agreements continues to grow." According to Matar, Colonel Qaddafi "deserves sole credit for Libya's foreign policy U-turn. He has never found it necessary to devote himself to a single political ideology; his only consistent policy has been to guard his personal political survival." The United States and Britain, Matar concludes, "understand this, but have only exploited it for their own myopic objectives, forgetting that Libya's political development can lie only with its people."

Mallaby Criticizes Chinese Ties With Sudan. The Washington Post's (2/5, A15) Sebastian Mallaby writes, "Last week China's leader, Hu Jintao, provided Sudan with an interest-free loan to build a presidential palace. With that gesture, Hu demonstrated his contempt for the Western understanding of the world -- and for Western policy toward his own country." By pursuing commercial ties with Sudan, Mallaby says Hu was "implicitly saying that economic development comes first and that political development is unimportant." This Chinese understanding of development, he continues, "threatens to undermine the Western one. Western development aid is increasingly linked to measures of good governance, and investment from Western corporations and banks comes with conditions designed to ensure that ordinary people benefit. This promising advance cannot succeed if African dictators can ignore Western conditions with Chinese assistance."

Aid Groups Urged To Put Pressure On Bangladesh. C. Christine Fair, managing editor of India Review, and Sumit Ganguly, a professor of political science at Indiana University in Bloomington, write in a Wall Street Journal (2/5, A17, 2.04M) op-ed, "With the world's attention focused on whether accountable government can take root in Iraq, the democratic life blood of a much larger Muslim country -- Bangladesh -- is seeping away with hardly a murmur from the international community." Bangladesh, which they say is becoming "a de facto military-controlled state," is also "responsive to public exhortation and receives significant international aid." Donor countries, they argue, "can achieve leverage if they coordinate and render some forms of assistance conditional." The country's army "must be reminded of this to discourage any extraconstitutional action -- and to teach it that the suppression of democracy cannot be a cost-free business."

New Russian Migrant Laws Criticized. The Washington Post (2/5, A15, 690K) op-ed contributor Masha Lipman writes the Russian government "recently outlawed foreign migrant workers at Russian retail markets as of April 1. A similar restriction cuts out middlemen by requiring that at least half of all salespeople sell their own produce. The official rationale is that this legislation protects domestic producers. But this politically motivated, hasty decision is more likely to harm Russian consumers and further exacerbate the situation of migrant workers." However, Lipman says, "Such actions corrode what respect for law and lawmaking is left here. Local officials will probably think of ways around the restrictions, and some are sure to take advantage of new opportunities for graft. Still others expect that the absurdity of some provisions and the damage the law is inflicting on consumers will lead to its revision."

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Another CIA Abduction, Germany Has An Uneasy Role (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

HAMBURG -- The decision by Munich prosecutors to press charges against CIA counterterrorism operatives for kidnapping a German citizen, Khaled el-Masri, won widespread applause last week from German politicians and the public. "The great ally is not allowed to simply send its thugs out into Europe's streets," lectured the Munich newspaper Sueddeutsche Zeitung.

But there has been an awkward silence and no prosecutions in the parallel case of another German citizen, Mohammed Haydar Zammar, who was also covertly abducted in a CIA-sponsored mission after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The difference: German agents were directly involved in the Zammar case, providing crucial information to the CIA about his travels and making a secret trip to Syria to interrogate him after he landed in prison there.

Zammar vanished from public view five years ago but resurfaced last fall in a Syrian courtroom, where he stands accused of training in al-Qaeda camps and faces the death penalty. After insisting for years that they couldn't confirm his whereabouts, German diplomats in Damascus have scrambled to provide him with a defense attorney and consular assistance.

Unlike Masri, a car salesman from Bavaria who was grabbed in an apparent case of mistaken identity, Zammar had previously drawn scrutiny from German and U.S. investigators for his role in the Hamburg cell that planned the Sept. 11 hijackings. German authorities have never assembled enough evidence to charge him with a crime. But given his association with the Hamburg group, few people in Germany have been willing to take up his cause or question the legality of how he was abducted.

"He's seen as being in a different category because there's the impression that he's a bad guy, and he's not around to defend himself," said Cem Ozdemir, a German legislator in the European Parliament and member of a committee that has investigated CIA activities in Europe. "Even if he is a bad guy, he doesn't deserve to be tortured."

Details of the German role in Zammar's disappearance have emerged gradually in recent months as legislative panels in Berlin and Brussels have conducted investigations into CIA counterterrorism operations in Europe.

German officials have said that they were not directly involved in Zammar's seizure and did not know where he had been taken until June 2002, when The Washington Post first reported that he had been arrested in Morocco and secretly transferred to Syria at the behest of the CIA. But the legislative probes have revealed that German federal police made the abduction possible by forwarding details of Zammar's travel plans to U.S. agents.

In addition, German officials have admitted that several German intelligence operatives and investigators went on a secret mission to Damascus in November 2002 to interrogate Zammar. According to lawmakers in Berlin who are reviewing the case, the Germans gained access to Zammar only after cutting a deal with the Syrian government to drop a criminal investigation into a suspected Syrian espionage ring based in southern Germany.

German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble defended the interrogation of Zammar as proper and legitimate. But he drew heavy criticism from other lawmakers when he suggested that German intelligence agents might use information shared by other countries, such as Syria, even if it was obtained as a result of torture.

Guel Pinar, a Hamburg lawyer who has represented Zammar and his family, said it was apparent German officials knew in advance that the CIA had targeted him for "extraordinary rendition," an extralegal tactic under which Islamic radicals have been abducted and interrogated at secret sites overseas.

"Clearly, the Germans at the very least were guilty of being an accessory in terms of his rendition to Syria," Pinar said in an interview. "They knew what they were doing when they gave his travel dates to the Americans. Why else would they do that?"

German prosecutors have not announced any criminal inquiries into Zammar's disappearance, even though his family reported him missing five years ago. Pinar said she has drafted a civil lawsuit on his behalf against the German government. But she said his wife, Rabab Banhaoui, has decided against filing it, for fear it would worsen his situation in Syria.

German authorities have made few statements about the case. The German Foreign Ministry did not respond to several requests for an interview. The German Embassy in Damascus, which has been monitoring Zammar's closed-door trial, declined to comment.

Zammar reemerged last October, when a European Union official monitoring trials in Damascus saw him in a state security court and notified the German Embassy. If not for the chance encounter, Zammar might have remained out of sight forever, Pinar said. "No one in the world would have known," she said.

A spokeswoman for the European Commission delegation in Syria declined to comment, calling the case a "highly sensitive subject."

Zammar, 45, was born in Syria but emigrated to Germany in 1972 and obtained citizenship there. Syrian authorities have charged him with membership in the Muslim Brotherhood, a fundamentalist group that is banned in the country, and with visiting al-Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan. It is unclear whether he is charged with committing any crimes in Syria.

A parliamentary committee is expected to review the German government's handling of Zammar's case later this month. One question is whether information obtained by German interrogators is being used against him in court by Syrian prosecutors, a particularly sensitive issue since he faces the death penalty, which is banned in Germany.

"It is a big problem, I believe, for Germany and the federal government," said Hans-Christian Stroebele, a member of the committee from the Greens party. "It's the duty of a state to help its citizens. But clearly in Zammar's case, the state did not do this."

Former inmates in Syria, including Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who was similarly targeted for rendition by the CIA but later released, have said that Zammar was kept in a tiny cell in a special prison wing. They said prisoners were regularly tortured, and that Zammar -- who tipped the scales at 300 pounds when he lived in Hamburg -- had lost about a third of his weight.

Congress, Spying & The Rule Of Law (PHDN)

By Shayana Kadidal & Ari Melber

Philadelphia Daily News, February 5, 2007

AFTER illegally spying on Americans without the required warrants for several years, the Bush administration is claiming a sudden change of heart.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recently announced that the administration's domestic-spying program will stop bypassing judicial oversight. Instead, it will submit domestic surveillance to review by a federal intelligence court, as required by law.

But before anyone celebrates the "good news" of an attorney general saying he will stop breaking the law, Congress must confront the administration's record of illegal spying and ensure that surveillance is truly back within the rule of law.

This is a big challenge because the administration spent the last six years undermining the traditional tools Congress uses to supervise intelligence by ignoring the law, stalling court oversight and declaring that warrantless spying would continue.

For Congress, that means there is little point in passing another law to restate rules that the administration is openly defying. Public hearings would also be ineffective for reforming or exposing the classified program. So what can the new Congress do?

The only way to bring spying back under the rule of law is for Congress to strengthen the branch of government that makes the law work: the courts.

Unfortunately, the courts, with their traditional deference to the political branches, have been slow to tackle this problem.

There are more than 70 spying lawsuits pending against the National Security Agency or phone companies, but few results so far. One federal district court did rule on the NSA program in August, finding it unconstitutional and issuing an injunction to ban it. But the administration has aggressively appealed and stalled all these cases - and the injunction was stayed on appeal.

Several other leading cases were transferred at the 11th hour into a new court, wiping out almost a year of work. (Justice Department officials claim the cases are "moot" because of the attorney general's announcement. But even if warrantless spying has ceased, plaintiffs are suing for harm caused by past conduct.)

At this rate, the domestic spying program may not even reach the Supreme Court before President Bush leaves office. That's probably no accident.

Yet there is much Congress can do to ensure swift and meaningful judicial oversight. First, there is precedent for providing fast-track review for important cases. Congress can require that the pending cases get accelerated review by either the appeals courts or the Supreme Court. Although the Supreme Court usually gets to choose whether to hear a case, Congress can make the right of appeal mandatory.

Of all the lawsuits, only one offers evidence that the NSA listened to the plaintiffs' calls. But that's because the government has tried to classify and conceal all potential evidence, and then claim that because plaintiffs do not have proof that their own calls were illegally intercepted, the suits are "frivolous" and should be dismissed.

But many challengers reasonably argue that they were harmed by being forced to change their behavior by the news of the NSA's warrantless spying program. (Government whistleblowers won't call reporters, for example, once they know the government is listening to calls with no court oversight.)

Congress can address this problem by making it clear that Americans who were compelled to change their activities because of past illegal surveillance have standing to sue. Guaranteeing a day in court for such challenges would ensure that the NSA doesn't get off the hook on a technicality.

Finally, the new Congress must grapple with the administration's expansive assertions of the "state secrets privilege" to pre-empt legal challenges.

Most spying challengers had to spend months fighting the administration's demand that every case be dismissed without any court proceedings because the program was supposedly "too secret" for judges to consider - even in a closed setting. At least one court has already dismissed a challenge to the NSA program on those grounds.

But today the courts are well-equipped to hear cases with classified information - they routinely do so during criminal trials of former spies. Yet the Bush administration has invoked the secrets claim more than any other administration in history.

To ensure that the courts actually hear the spying cases, Congress should pass a statute curtailing the "state secrets privilege" with precise boundaries to prevent further misuse.

OUR SYSTEM OF checks and balances is supposed to enable each branch of government to assert itself by checking the others. Yet to check President Bush's spying, Congress cannot simply repeat itself by passing another wiretapping statute, or hope the administration's latest announcement will end the abuse.

Congress must strive for the higher ambition of protecting the rule of law itself by empowering the courts to swiftly enforce the laws Congress passed - and review the conduct of the president who broke them.

Wrong On Habeas Corpus (WT)

By Nat Hentoff

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Considering the state of the world, and the divisiveness in this nation, I am seldom startled these days by news from Washington. But an exception was the appearance of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a Jan. 18 hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee in which he stated: "There is no express grant of habeas (corpus) in the Constitution… The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States is hereby guaranteed or assured the right of habeas corpus... there's (only) a prohibition against taking it away."

This is an astonishing dismissal by our chief law enforcement officer of the oldest fundamental right in Anglo-Saxon law that even precedes the Magna Carta of 1215.

Alberto Gonzales is dead wrong.

The Magna Carta has resonated for centuries and states: "No free man shall be taken or imprisoned... except by... the law of the land." In 1679, Parliament passed the Habeas Corpus Act that also extended the "Great Writ" to any citizen arbitrarily imprisoned "beyond the seas." In our country, as the Constitution was being proposed and debated, Thomas Jefferson, then our envoy to Paris, wrote to James Madison insisting that habeas corpus be imbedded in the body of the Constitution as it was. Jefferson even objected that habeas could be suspended during an insurrection or invasion. He didn't want any tampering with habeas corpus. He lost on that clause.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist Papers, wrote that "the practice of arbitrary imprisonments, have been, in all ages, the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny." Hamilton cited the 18th-century English jurist, William Blackstone, whose commentaries are still referred to in courses on the law: "Confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten... is a... dangerous engine of arbitrary government," said Blackstone.

Hamilton was convinced that habeas corpus was such a strong anchor of our rights that he claimed a separate Bill of Rights (the first 10 amendments to the Constitution) would not be necessary. Madison and George Mason overruled him on that.

I would recommend urgently that Mr. Gonzales read the chapter on habeas corpus in professor Leonard W. Levy's "Origins of the Bill of Rights" (Yale University Press, 2001). For many years, Mr. Levy's many books and articles gave given me a continuing graduate-school course on why we are Americans. In "Origins," he also summonsSir William Blackstone into the 21st century, noting that in his 18th-century "Commentaries": "Blackstonedescribed habeas corpus as 'the most celebrated writ in the English law' and available to 'every subject of the kingdom that superseded all other proceedings and should not be evaded or delayed.' " Surely, Mr. Gonzales must have heard of Blackstone during his law-school years as well as our celebrated Chief Justice John Marshall, who rooted habeas corpus into American law. In the 1807 case, Ex Parte Bollman, Marshall congratulated Congress for enacting a system of federal courts that thereby gave judges the authority to issue writs of habeas corpus "this great constitutional privilege." It could be that Mr. Gonzales is critical of Justice Marshall as "an activist judge" because he established the power of the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional through judicial review. But Justice Marshall's opinions on this and habeas corpus remain the law of the land. Accordingly, habeas is indeed guaranteed to every individual in the United States, contrary to the attorney general's statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

I would also suggest to Mr. Gonzales that he look into the chapter on habeas corpus in the four-volume "Encyclopedia of the American Constitution" (Macmillan 1986) of which Leonard Levy was the editor in chief. The chapter emphasizes that "a measure of the state of liberty in the United States is that so much of our constitutional liberties can be taken for granted." It continues: An essential definition of our freedom "from arbitrary authority" is habeas corpus and "the existence of the Great Writ precisely in its taken-for-granted quality plays a major role in supporting and reinforcing the conditions of freedom."

It is a pity that the chief law-enforcement officer of the United States not only does not take habeas corpus for granted, but says that it is not guaranteed to all of us. If our attorney general doesn't know that, consider how many students throughout our school systems may also be uneducated in the Great Writ -- and its history. How would the president do in an unannounced quiz on habeas corpus?

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rebellion Growing As States Challenge A Federal Law To Standardize Driver's Licenses (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Opposition among state officials is turning into an open revolt against a federal law calling for the creation of standardized driver's licenses nationwide that are meant to be less vulnerable to fraud.

Maine legislators started off the rebellion late last month by passing a nonbinding resolution that rejected the law, called the Real ID Act, which Congress passed in 2005. They said that it would cost the state $185 million to put into place and that instead of making Maine's residents more secure, it would leave them more vulnerable to identity theft.

Since then, legislatures in five states — Georgia, Montana, New Mexico, Washington and Wyoming — have voted in committee or on the floor of one chamber to move similar legislation ahead. The bill adopted in a 99-to-1 vote by the Montana House of Representatives would go furthest, ordering state officials there to ignore the federal law.

Unless the federal law is revised, any state that defies it will risk causing major inconvenience for its residents, as noncompliant licenses will not be accepted as a proof of identification at airports, federal buildings or when applying for federal benefits.

What state officials are hoping is that Congress will repeal or modify the law, or at least provide some of the billions of dollars the states claim it will cost to establish the new licensing system nationwide.

The campaign features an odd mix of liberal Democrats, offended by a measure in the law that would effectively block illegal immigrants from getting federally compliant driver's licenses, and conservative Republicans, who see the law as an affront to civil liberties and to states' rights.

"This is a frontal assault on our freedoms," said State Representative Jim Guest of Missouri, a Republican who said he was working with more than two dozen states to pass laws opposing the federal statute. "One state standing alone is not enough. But we are already gaining strong momentum here."

Some states are not going as far as others. Vermont passed a law that would not defy the federal statute but called for more federal financial assistance in carrying it out.

Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, who led the effort in Congress to pass the 2005 law, as well as top officials at the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, said they were disturbed by the growing signs of a revolt.

"Certainly, it is a threat," Mr. Sensenbrenner said Saturday in an interview.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, wrote a letter last week to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking him what would happen to the federal program if individual states opted out.

Mr. Sensenbrenner attributed the growing resistance to the department's tardiness in publishing rules telling the states what they must do under the law, which calls for new licenses to be issued starting in May 2008. He said that had led to misconceptions about the program's costs and vulnerabilities. Mr. Sensenbrenner estimated that the real costs for states nationwide would not exceed about $100 million.

Federal officials acknowledge that with the final regulations not coming out until this summer, it is likely that some states will not be ready to begin issuing licenses on schedule.

The Real ID Act requires states to confirm that documents submitted to get driver's licenses — like a birth certificate or a passport — are legitimate and that the applicants are in the United States legally. States will also have to check a linked database of state licensing data to make sure that applicants do not already have a license in another state and that they have not been banned from driving elsewhere.

The law effectively requires that all existing licenses be replaced by 2013.

The push to pass the law grew out of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, when some of the hijackers used driver's licenses as identification when they checked in for their flights.

Stewart A. Baker, an assistant secretary of homeland security, said opponents of the new law should remember this recent history.

"I understand there is a sense that states are being asked to do something and not being given the resources by the federal government," Mr. Baker said. "But people are forgetting that this was a 9/11 commission recommendation and a recommendation for a very good reason."

But Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union said the states were raising legitimate issues. The law sets a national standard for machine-readability, most likely using bar-code-like strips where information about the owner can be scanned. This may tempt merchants to collect the data and use it for marketing purposes, Mr. Steinhardt said. The linked national database of all licensing information will also be a target for identity theft, he said.

"Real ID is a real nightmare on a number of fronts," Mr. Steinhardt said.

Lawrence Halloran, deputy minority staff director at the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the growing protests were a way for states to try to force more federal aid for the cost of issuing the new licenses.

"They are saying, 'Pay me,' " he said.

Senators Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, and John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, introduced a bill in December calling for the repeal of the Real ID Act.

The bill has yet to be reintroduced in the new session, with a spokesman for Mr. Akaka saying last week that he was likely to wait to see the draft rules that the Homeland Security Department publishes for public comment before deciding whether to push the cause.

Homeland Security Attracts More Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a move last summer that wasn't made public, the Department of Homeland Security was tapped to join an elite group of seven agencies that would form the heart of America's spy network.

It was a surprise choice by John Negroponte, then National Intelligence director, who selected DHS to join the Intelligence Program Managers Group over more-established entities such as the Army and State Department. That decision perhaps had less to do with the department's mission and capabilities than with the reputation of its chief intelligence officer, Charles E. Allen.

Many officials say Mr. Allen has made progress in trying to transform the 22 squabbling agencies that comprise DHS into better data collectors. But as the intelligence system comes under scrutiny with the expected appointment of a new Director of National Intelligence, DHS and Mr. Allen's efforts there are coming in for a hard look.

Mr. Allen's nearly five decades at the CIA earned him the nickname "The Legend." But his experience has yet to turn DHS and its constituent agencies into top-notch intelligence collectors or analysts, say both DHS's congressional overseers and officials in the department. Since taking over in 2005, he has faced problems such as turf battles with other agencies, staffing issues and pushback from some of his agents.

Mr. Allen's success or failure will be pivotal in determining whether the department, created after the 9/11 attacks, will be a counterterrorist bulwark or a bureaucratic backwater.

Security officials who know Mr. Allen, 74 years old, said it is hard for anyone with experience in the business to dismiss him. "Most of the people he deals with today were trained and shaped by him," said Cresencio Arcos, a retired U.S. ambassador and a former director of international affairs for DHS.

Mr. Allen's career spanned most of the Cold War, in every aspect of the Central Intelligence Agency, from case manager to agent. He also worked as a senior intelligence official on Iraq, Iran and North Korea.

His vision is to turn the department into the prime source of border intelligence, critical infrastructure information and global supply-chain data, and into the conduit through which the government shares information with state and local authorities.

One of his innovations has been sending intelligence officers to state and local "fusion centers." These centers, in 43 locations around the U.S., seek to blend law-enforcement information and intelligence analysis collected at the local level to share with federal officials. He now has officers stationed in 12 centers and expects to have a presence in the remaining centers by the end of next year.

He also established an initiative on the nation's southwest border, sending intelligence officers to El Paso, Texas, to support border and customs agents, and local law-enforcement agencies.

Last week, Rep. Bennie Thompson (D., Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, took Mr. Allen and the department to task for allegedly trying to exclude state and local police from participating in a new federal intelligence unit called the Interagency Threat Assessment and Coordination Group. The group would be based outside DHS at the National Counterterrorism Center and would share information about possible terrorist threats to the country -- a job now done exclusively by DHS.

A number of state officials as well as police officers say that until now Mr. Allen has been working more to control their involvement than to include it. For months, big-city police chiefs have stressed that they are on the frontlines of counterterrorism efforts, needing access to real-time threat information to be able to respond to the possibility of an attack. Acting Washington D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier told senators two weeks ago that DHS policy of not sharing threat information unless the threat is "imminent" does not work because imminent is "too late."

Intelligence officials say Mr. Allen sees DHS representing the interests of state and local officials and that including them in the unit would undermine DHS, by making the department's input redundant or unnecessary. Mr. Allen says he isn't opposed to including police in the unit, which is due to start work today, after it becomes better established.

DHS has faced tension with other agencies since its creation. Senior counterterrorism officials from rival agencies routinely criticize DHS intelligence about terrorist threats and suspicious activities in the U.S.

Mr. Allen agrees that DHS intelligence reports have relied heavily on information from other agencies but that his focus recently on core areas such as border security is beginning to result in more unique DHS information making its way into the president's daily briefings.

Last week, Mr. Allen met with Mike McConnell, the retired admiral chosen by President Bush to succeed Mr. Negroponte as the country's spy chief, to explain why the department deserved a seat in the Intelligence Program Managers Group. The group meets weekly with the director of National Intelligence to discuss strategy and chart the direction of foreign and domestic intelligence operations. The other members are the CIA, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the National Security Administration, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the National Reconnaissance Office and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency.

Adm. McConnell, who couldn't be reached to comment, was taking stock of institutions he was inheriting. Mr. Allen said he argued that the department -- which has fewer than 1,000 intelligence officers and a budget smaller than most local-police departments -- has a unique mission to prepare for terrorism. That, and the fact the some of the country's oldest and most experienced law-enforcement agencies, like the Secret Service and Customs and Border Protection, led Homeland Security's efforts were more than enough reason to keep DHS in the group, he said.

"Where I am throwing down my marker is, I do not want the other members of the national community working without my knowledge with DHS components without me being briefed and knowing what they are doing," Mr. Allen said.

John Gannon, a former CIA deputy director of intelligence and former colleague of Mr. Allen's, said Congress and the White House haven't given Mr. Allen the resources or authority to make his department work. In some cases, the White House ended up creating other entities, like the National Counterterrorism Center, that undermined DHS's intelligence efforts by giving it the responsibility for threat analysis that DHS was created to do but failed because it was spending its energy trying to knit 22 agencies into a new department.

Until recently, DHS had problems attracting analysts and agents with intelligence clearances. For those who joined, the department sometimes didn't have desks or computers for them because of funding shortfalls. (Its budget is secret.)

Some law-enforcement agencies inside the DHS have been openly resisting efforts by Mr. Allen to get more involved in their operations, trying to direct their collection efforts and get them to report directly to him rather than to their agency heads. One senior intelligence official at U.S. Customs and Border Protection said the direction that Mr. Allen is pushing the department ultimately will improve its ability to detect and thwart terrorism and turn it into a major intelligence player. But that still appears to be a long way off, the official said.

WAR NEWS:

Senate To Challenge Bush's Iraq Plan (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The Senate will on Monday-challenge President George W. Bush's proposed Iraq strategy with a debate on a non-binding resolution opposing the plan to send additional troops. However, several senators from both parties on Sunday warned it was unlikely to win the 60 votes needed for approval.

Republicans loyal to Mr Bush have attempted to undercut any political fallout from a resolution that would put on record the depth of cross-party dissent on the Iraq strategy. Their tactics include threats to filibuster a vote on the resolution and a "divide and conquer" strategy to allow votes on alternative resolutions.

Senator Lindsay Graham, a Bush loyalist, has proposed a competing resolution that lists benchmarks for the Iraqi government to achieve but supports the troop surge. He on Sunday said on Fox News: "A non-binding resolution is a political exercise that does nothing but harm to the war effort and it's a small moment for the Senate."

The debate comes as the Bush administration is preparing on Monday to submit a budget seeking an additional $100bn to pay for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, and an additional $145bn in 2008, Rob Portman, director of the office of management and budget confirmed yesterday.

Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, on CNN accused Republicans of "obstructionism" and warned that if the resolution was blocked, "a month or so down the pike there will be much stronger action".

There are dangers of a more serious confrontation with the White House if Congress chooses to exert its constitutional power over government spending and cuts off funds, as it did during the Vietnam war.

Republican John McCain, who is co-sponsor of the resolution with Mr Graham, criticised those who backed the bipartisan, non-binding resolution – including several Republican senators. He said it was more honest to vote to cut off funds than to pursue a vote of disapproval, "which is fundamentally a vote of no confidence in the troops".

The White House sought to address congressional unease ahead of the debate. Mr Bush on Saturday attended the annual retreat for Democrats for the first time since 2001. He said he welcomed "debate in a time of war" but mollified critics by noting that disagreements did not mean they were unpatriotic.

In Senate, Passage Of Iraq Resolution Uncertain (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

As the Senate launches a historic debate Monday over whether to oppose President Bush's new strategy for the Iraq war, the outcome may well turn on a few votes on both sides of the aisle.

Though not binding on the president, a vote in favor of a resolution to reject his plan to add 21,500 US forces in Iraq would be Congress's first against the war since it authorized the use of force in 2002.

Some backers of a compromise resolution worked out by Sens. John Warner (R) of Virginia and Carl Levin (D) of Michigan say it would be a first step toward pushing for more forceful moves, such as curbing war funds or setting a timetable for troop withdrawal. Opponents, including most Republican senators, say it would send a message of disunity to US friends and foes abroad and undermine prospects for success.

Both sides are weighing the risks of action – or inaction.

It may seem like an easy decision for Democrats, because polls show both the war and the president to be unpopular, says John Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "But if they succeed in hastening the withdrawal, and disaster results, they could wind up with some of the blame, so that's tempering the move to put some teeth in the resolution," he says. "If they put teeth in the resolution, they may be the ones to get bitten."

The risks for Republicans are different but no less sharp. "Association with an unpopular war is hurtful, as they saw in 2006 election," notes Mr. Pitney. "But if they're seen as abandoning President Bush, they could alienate a lot of primary voters and look like flip-floppers. For Republicans, it could become a character issue."

The Warner-Levin resolution calls for shifting responsibility to the Iraq government for dealing with sectarian conflict, but also specifies that nothing in the resolution should not be interpreted as "precipitating any immediate reduction in, or withdrawal of, the present level of forces." About 140,000 American troops were serving in Iraq before Mr. Bush laid out his plan on Jan. 10 to send 21,500 more.

The measure also rules out "the elimination or reduction of funds" because it could "endanger United States military forces in the field."

On the eve of debate, at least 12 Republicans were backing the Warner-Levin measure or were inclined to support it.

For Democrats, there is pressure to produce a bipartisan vote against the president's plan. But their own Sens. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut say they will oppose the resolution because it isn't strong enough.

DOJ_NMG_0126919

A competing resolution – sponsored by Sens. John McCain (R) of Arizona, Joseph Lieberman (I) of Connecticut, and Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina – calls on Congress to provide "the full support necessary" to carry out the US mission in Iraq, including 11 benchmarks it says the Iraqis must meet.

"This debate is just beginning, and we intend to make a strong case that we believe that this mission ... can succeed," said Senator McCain at a briefing last week.

Senator Lieberman, who during his reelection campaign last year lost the Democratic primary largely over his support of the Iraq war, says a nonbinding resolution against the surge "will have no effect on what is happening on the ground, will discourage our troops and encourage those they are fighting."

Despite disagreement over the endgame in Iraq, consensus is growing on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue regarding benchmarks the Iraqi government should be required to meet. These include a commitment to send additional Iraqi security forces to Baghdad and a fair distribution of government resources, including oil revenues, regardless of sect or ethnicity.

"They've got to pass an oil law. They've got to amend their constitution so that all segments of that society feel that the government is for them," Bush said Saturday at an issues conference in Williamsburg, Va., to applause from House Democrats in attendance.

Back on Capitol Hill, more than a dozen Republican senators have expressed doubts about Bush's plan to add to forces in Iraq. But GOP leaders said Friday that all 49 Republican senators will block the move to a vote on the Warner-Levin resolution – including Senator Warner – unless Democrats allow votes on three other resolutions, including one that opposes a cap on troop levels and curbs on war funding.

In the run-up to Monday's debate, lawmakers have two new pieces of information. One concerns the cost of the war. Monday, Bush is expected to ask Congress to approve $245 billion for war costs through fiscal year 2008 (October 2007 through September 2008), in addition to the $70 billion already approved for the current fiscal year – higher than many senators had expected.

The other is a long-awaited report by US intelligence agencies, which concludes that prospects for success in Iraq are "daunting" even if new moves do stem violence. Given the "current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene," Iraqis will be "hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation" in the next 12 to 18 months, according to unclassified conclusions of the National Intelligence Estimate released Friday.

Moreover, the Congressional Budget Office predicts that the cost of putting the additional troops in Iraq will be greater than the White House estimate of $6 billion. A CBO report released Thursday put the cost at between $9 billion and $13 billion for a four-month deployment, and between $20 billion and $27 billion for a 12-month deployment. A two-year deployment would cost about $49 billion, the report said.

GOP Threatens To Block Vote On Iraq Resolution (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A debate over President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq is set to begin in the Senate today, but it's not clear whether there will be a vote.

Republicans are threatening to use the filibuster, a parliamentary blocking maneuver, to prevent a vote on a resolution that expresses disapproval of the troop increase.

It may be the only way for Bush supporters to prevent a bipartisan vote of no confidence after the release of an intelligence report that painted a grim picture of the situation in Iraq. Further darkening the mood: continuing violence, including a car bomb explosion Saturday that killed 137 in Baghdad.

On CNN's Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, predicted Sunday that Republicans would filibuster the non-binding resolution, which he called "inconsequential." Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, on the same program, accused Republicans of "obstructionism."

"Debate is going on in every schoolyard, in every state, in every city of this nation. It should go on in the Senate of the United States as well," she said.

Democrats say there are enough votes to put the Senate on record in opposition to the troop increase. "There is a bipartisan majority of the U.S. Senate opposed to the president's plan to deepen our military involvement in Iraq," Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, said Sunday.

Reid does not have the 60 votes it would take to overcome a filibuster. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, can block a vote. A test vote is scheduled for this afternoon. At issue are how many resolutions the Senate will consider and how many votes it will take to pass them.

McConnell wants votes on three resolutions: one opposing the president's policy; one offering qualified support; and one putting the Senate on record as opposing cuts in funding for troops in Iraq. Reid does not want to put the Senate on record opposing funding cuts if he cannot pass the resolution opposing the president's policy. McConnell, however, is insisting that 60 votes be required for approval.

Some Democrats, such as Sens. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, don't want a vote that could keep Congress from later using the power of the purse to force an end to the war in Iraq.

Opponents of the troop increase, including Nebraska Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel, argue that a diplomatic effort involving Iraq's neighbors is the only solution for the escalating violence. "We are not going to change the outcome in Iraq by putting American troops into the middle of a civil war," Hagel, a sponsor of the resolution of disapproval, said on ABC's This Week.

Republican Sen. John McCain, who co-authored the resolution backing the president, said on the program that more troops will give the Iraqis breathing room to build up their own troop strength. "I'm not saying this is going to succeed," he said. "I believe it has a good chance, but I know the consequences of failure."

Another supporter of the president's plan was less sanguine. "It's a long shot," Lugar said.

Critical Senate Resolution: Symbolic But Significant (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Not a single American soldier will do anything differently this week if the Senate approves a resolution criticizing President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq.

The nonbinding resolution would have no more force of law than the one approved Thursday commending the Miss America organization for its commitment to "the character of women in the United States."

Yet the immense symbolism of what may be the first formal rebuke of Bush's war strategy has produced the most passionate war debate on Capitol Hill since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago.

At its core is a furious argument over what the challenge really means -- not just to the president, but to the military, to the Iraqi government and to America's enemies and allies in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Several of the resolution's sponsors bill the eight-page document as little more than a polite suggestion to the country's chief executive, offering alternatives to Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops, mainly in Baghdad, to contain sectarian violence.

Other advocates, including Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill, cast it as a first step in an escalating congressional campaign to bring the war to an end.

Some of the war's most passionate opponents, complaining about the resolution's nonbinding nature, dismiss it as a meaningless exercise.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and its supporters in Congress warn of the dangerous message that approval would send to U.S. troops and to other Middle East countries.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is leading the push for an alternate resolution expressing congressional support for the mission, and Bush has said repeatedly that he will ignore any resolution challenging his plans.

The debate over the message is hardly unprecedented; Congress similarly wrestled with how to express itself when President Clinton was contemplating military involvement in the Balkans in the mid-1990s.

And when the House of Representatives ultimately passed a nonbinding resolution expressing "serious concerns and opposition" to the commitment of troops to enforce the Bosnian peace treaty, lawmakers were careful to declare their confidence that U.S. troops "will perform their responsibilities with professional excellence."

In the current debate, senators critical of the White House's Iraq policy also have assiduously insisted that they do not intend to undermine U.S. forces.

"I think it is important that we thank them for their service and that we make it very clear that this resolution does not impair their ability to move forward in their command," Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., said last week. He is a cosponsor of the resolution stating that the Senate "disagrees" with the troop increase.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., the resolution's main sponsor, has gone further, stressing that he does not intend to be "confrontational" with the White House or even to change the fundamental U.S. involvement in Iraq.

"The purpose of this resolution is not to cut our forces at the current level or to set any timetables for withdrawal," he said when he announced his resolution two weeks ago.

Last week, he added language explicitly stating that "Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

That addition sparked opposition from such anti-war lawmakers as Sens. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., who have said Congress should not surrender its authority to limit funding as a means to force an end to the war.

Warner's amendment also did not mollify McCain and other critics of the resolution, who continue to call it an attack on the military. Senate Republican leaders are threatening to block any debate of the resolution Monday when it faces its first procedural vote in the Senate.

"This is a vote of no-confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there," McCain said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

The military audience watching the debate is hardly unified.

Iraq war veterans have come to Capitol Hill several times in recent weeks to urge opposition to the president's plans. And surveys by the Military Times newspapers, though unscientific, have suggested growing opposition to the war among active-duty personnel.

But retired Army Lt. Col. James H. Willbanks, who heads the department of military history at the Army's Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., said Congress should be careful how far it goes.

"I don't necessarily subscribe to the `stab in the back' theory," he said, referring to the contention that congressional opposition to the Vietnam war doomed the U.S. effort.

But Willbanks, a Vietnam veteran who recently completed a book on the fall of South Vietnam, noted that congressional limitations made it increasingly difficult for U.S. forces to fight in Southeast Asia. "That's the worst-case scenario," he said.

Critics of the resolution have also warned that the debate may embolden America's enemies and, as Sen. Richard G. Lugar, R-Ind., said at a recent Foreign Relations Committee hearing, "confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray."

There may be some truth to that, said Phebe Marr, a retired professor at the National Defense University and author of "The Modern History of Iraq."

"The bad guys are certainly going to be happy about this," said Marr, who was among several historians consulted by the Iraq Study Group last year.

But, she noted, the resolution also may push the Iraqi government to take more aggressive steps to reach political settlements that will diminish sectarian violence. "It is going to play both ways in Iraq," she said.

David L. Mack, deputy assistant secretary of State for Near Eastern affairs under President George H.W. Bush, said the resolution may actually help reassure some in the Middle East that the United States is remaining engaged.

"I think they will read that correctly, as they read the election, as a loss of support for Bush administration -- but not necessarily as a lack of interest in Iraq in the long term," said Mack, who heads the Washington-based Middle East Institute.

Indeed, if there is one audience that most observers agree will get an unambiguous message, it is the White House.

"A sense-of-Senate resolution that opposes the surge, no matter how delicately and respectfully worded, puts a bipartisan Senate on record that it has lost trust in presidential leadership," said Louis Fisher, a specialist on constitutional law at the Library of Congress who has written extensively about struggles between the White House and Congress over war powers.

"It's not just a vote against a surge, it's a vote against this administration," he said.

McCain: War Detractors Offer No Ideas (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain sought to weaken support for a resolution opposing President Bush's Iraq war strategy Sunday, saying proponents are intellectually dishonest.

On the eve of a possible congressional showdown on Iraq strategy, McCain contended the bipartisan proposal amounted to a demoralizing "vote of no confidence" in the U.S. military.

The measure criticizes Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops in Iraq yet offers no concrete alternatives, he said.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," said McCain, top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate from Arizona.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., called GOP efforts to block a vote on the resolution "obstructionism." Neither a Senate majority nor voters, she said, will tolerate such a delaying tactic.

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there's going to be much stronger legislation," she said.

The Senate, where Democrats hold a 51-49 working majority, has tentatively set an early test vote for Monday on the nonbinding resolution by Sen. John Warner, R-Va.

In a bid to attract more GOP support, Warner added a provision pledging to protect money for troops in combat.

That compromise drew the ire of some Democrats who said it leaned too far in endorsing the status quo. They want to see binding legislation to cap troop levels, force a new vote to authorize the war or begin bringing troops home.

McCain is sponsoring a resolution expressing support for a troop increase and setting benchmark goals for the Iraqi government. He sought to capitalize on some of the Democratic division.

"I do believe that if you really believe that this is doomed to failure and is going to cost American lives, then you should do what's necessary to prevent it from happening rather than a vote of 'disapproval,'" McCain said.

"This is a vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there," he said, noting the proposal does not seek to cut off money for troops.

A fellow Vietnam veteran, GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, disagreed with McCain's assessment. Hagel said the resolution would make clear the Senate's belief that Bush's policy is misguided.

Hagel said the proposal also lays out alternatives such as moving troops away from the sectarian violence and closer to the Iraq border to provide "territorial integrity."

"We can't change the outcome of Iraq by putting American troops in the middle of a civil war," said Hagel, who is considering a run for the White House in 2008.

Republican leaders are working to block a vote on Warner's resolution. They insisted that at least two other GOP proposals also be considered — McCain's and one focused on maintaining money for troops in the field. Such a strategy could dilute support for Warner's measure and make it tougher for any measure to pass.

Democrats want to limit debate to just the Warner and McCain proposals.

Two Republicans who oppose Warner's proposal, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Richard Lugar of Indiana, said Sunday they were uncertain the Warner resolution would get the support of 60 senators.

"Even if there is, it's nonbinding, and has in my judgment no consequence," Lugar said.

Hagel said Warner's resolution strikes a careful balance for a majority of senators who oppose a troop buildup but differ on the appropriate response.

He called McCain's proposal meaningless because it offers benchmarks but does not spell out what the U.S. government will do if the Iraqi officials fail to meet them.

"What are the consequences? Are we then going to pull out?" Hagel asked. "Are we going to cut funding? Now, that falls more in the intellectually dishonest category."

The resolution debate comes as the White House and congressional Democrats prepared to square off over war spending.

Bush's new budget on Monday will ask for $100 billion more for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan this year — on top of $70 billion already approved by Congress for the current year. The budget will call for $145 billion in war spending for 2008.

The spending request covers Bush's new war strategy, including the increase in troops, White House budget director Rob Portman said Sunday.

"It's extremely important that we support our troops," Portman said. He described the requested money as the amount needed "to be sure our troops have the equipment they need, that they are taken care of well."

Hagel and McCain appeared on ABC's "This Week," Graham was on "Fox News Sunday," and Feinstein, Lugar and Portman spoke on "Late Edition" on CNN.

McCain Questions Honesty Of Push For Resolution (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain yesterday said his colleagues who support a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop surge in Iraq are "intellectually dishonest," an apparent bid to rally Republican opposition to the resolution, which could have its first test vote today.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," the Arizona Republican said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "In other words, this is a vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there."

Most polls show Mr. McCain in a statistical tie with former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani for the lead in the 2008 Republican presidential primary. The Democratic National Committee has issued several press releases targeting Mr. McCain for his support of a troop surge.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, was asked on "This Week" about Mr. McCain's charge of intellectual dishonesty. "I don't agree with that," he said.

Both Vietnam combat veterans, Mr. Hagel and Mr. McCain said they remain close friends despite their political differences on Iraq.

"What this resolution is about is, first, disagreeing with the president's position on increasing our military involvement in Iraq," said Mr. Hagel, who is considering his own presidential campaign. "The other thing about it is this is not a cut-and-run resolution. This is not a withdrawal resolution. This is not a resolution that talks about timelines."

The Senate is scheduled for a test vote today on the nonbinding resolution by Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, and Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. It contains a provision that pledges to protect money for combat troops.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, warned Republicans yesterday that any efforts to block a vote on the resolution would be "obstructionism."

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike there's going to be much stronger legislation," she said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said critics of the troop increase were not being honest about its significance.

"[Lieutenant General David] Petraeus' plan is not more people doing the same. And if anybody says that, they're not listening to General Petraeus," Mr. Graham told "Fox News Sunday." The surge of 21,500 troops "would double the combat capability of the American military to hold areas cleared."

Despite his vocal support for the strategy, Mr. McCain acknowledged he has doubts.

"I'm worried. I'm also worried about the [Iraqi] government's ability to really do what we want," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0126924

"They've been showing a lot of weakness in the past. I'm worried that this is not enough troops. But I looked General Petraeus in the eye and I said, 'Do you have enough troops?' He said, 'If I think I need more, I'll ask for them.' And he also said if he thought the mission was going to fail, he would tell the president and us."

Sunday Shows Preview Historic Senate Debate (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Politico, February 5, 2007

The day before the Senate is set to begin its historic debate on Iraq, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., tried to rally support for President Bush's new troop surge strategy, warning that proposed resolutions of disapproval would demoralize U.S. forces. McCain, one of the leading supporters of the troop boost within an increasingly fractured GOP Senate caucus, also contended that the resolutions opposing Bush's plan lack the teeth to really change anything.

Speaking Sunday on ABC's "This Week," McCain, the top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate, said opponents should take broader action rather than simply voting to condemn Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by an additional 21,500.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," McCain said. "If you really believe that this is doomed to failure and going to cost American lives, then you should do what's necessary to prevent it from happening, rather than a vote of, quote, 'disapproval,' which is fundamentally a vote of no confidence in the troops and their mission."

The Senate, where Democrats hold a 51-49 working majority, has tentatively set an early test vote for Monday on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's strategy sponsored by Sen. John Warner, R-Va.,

McCain said Bush's plan has "a good chance of success." "I'm not guaranteeing it. But I am guaranteeing the consequences of failure," he said. If troops are withdrawn, McCain said, "You'll see a bloodletting in Baghdad that makes Srebrenica look like a Sunday school picnic . . . It'll be a chaotic situation that is in our national security interest to not see take place."

Reflecting the strain the issue is putting on the GOP, Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., usually a McCain ally on national security issues, appeared after him to make the opposite case. Hagel argued that the military "can't change the outcome of Iraq by putting American troops in the middle of a civil war," and maintained: "This is not a cut and run resolution."

Hagel called McCain's proposal to place benchmarks on the Iraqi government "disingenuous," because he feels it fails to hold Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki accountable. "If the benchmarks are not met by the Maliki government, "are we then going to bring our troops home?" Hagel asked. "Are we going to cut funding? Now, that falls more in the intellectually dishonest category."

Asked if he's going to run for president, Hagel said: "I'll make that decision as time develops. .. I'm not an anti-war candidate...To have a different position than the president's on a war doesn't qualify anyone to be an anti-war candidate."

During the segment with McCain, host George Stephanopoulos asked if an independent presidential bid would cripple Republican chances of winning the White House in 2008. "I don't know," McCain replied. "It is a fact that independent voter registration is rising all over the country, including my home state of Arizona ... I think that if we get back on our message, get back to the principles, philosophies and message of Ronald Reagan and others, I think we'll do just fine. But first, we've got to get over our state of denial."

Edwards On "Meet The Press"

On NBC's "Meet the Press," Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards tried to make the case that he can be the "straight-talk" Democrat, offering tough criticism of the war in Iraq and previewing a universal health care plan he will release Monday.

Moderator Tim Russert had Edwards as his guest for the full hour, and asked the former U.S. senator from North Carolina about remarks he made at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on Oct. 7, 2002: "My position is very clear: The time has come for decisive action to eliminate the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction ... Saddam Hussein's regime is a grave threat to America and our allies."

" 'A grave threat to America' -- do you still believe that?" Russert asked.

"No," Edwards replied.

Russert pressed: "Why were you so wrong?"

Edwards responded: "For the same reason a lot of people were wrong ... The intelligence information that we got was wrong."

Later, Russert noted that one of Edwards' competitors for the Democratic nomination, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, had opposed the Iraq war as a state senator. Russert asked: "Why shouldn't voters in Democratic primaries say, `On the big issue of the war, Obama was right, Edwards was wrong'?"

"I was wrong," Edwards conceded. "They should say that. And the question becomes, `Who's best suited to be president of the United States? Who has the depth, the maturity, the judgment to be president of the United States?' "

On his health care plan, Edwards acknowledged, "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes." He said the plan would cost between $90 billion and $120 billion a year once it's fully implemented.

Edwards' elaboration: "We take the 46 million, 47 million people who don't have health care coverage, we expand Medicaid, we provide subsidies for people who don't have coverage. We ask employers to play a bigger role, which means they either have to have coverage, or they have to buy into what we're calling health markets. We're going to create health markets all across the country, which will help, provide some of these efficiencies. One of the choices, by the way, available in these health markets is the government plan. So people who like the idea of a single-payer insurer health plan, that is actually one of the alternatives that people can choose."

Edwards got destroyed on Meet The Press by his on words and clear understanding that he doesnt fully understand the situation in Iraq. His domestic policy is borderline communism to me. I wouldnt vote him in charge of a canned food drive. Still remember that devil Chaney spanking him like a baby during the '04 debacle. Democrats better find someone electable. Hilary cant, Edwards cant, Biden cant. I like Obama and Richardson --if they were white men they would be your two options and way out ahead.

by sacksmb on 02.04.2007 at 05:42 PM

If we were going to elect "real people", we'd elect Joe Biden. He is the one who speaks off the cuff and is unabashedly found without handlers and PR flacks (probably the reason he has a reprutation for being long-winded). He is also, coincidentally, the one with the true depth of experience in foriegn policy on the Democratic side.

But, he says something about Obama, clearly meant to be complimentary, though admittedly awkwards, and gets eaten alive.

Americans want a real person, so long as they don't trip over their words. Unfortunately, real people mis-speak now and then.

by JSteele on 02.04.2007 at 05:10 PM

John Edwards is straight forward. This is what we need. No more "beat-around-the-Bush" politics! When was the last time we had a president that took responsibility for his actions? Edwards clearly defined himself and took responsibility for his vote on the war by stating it was mistake. He isn't defensive and trying to defend himself. America is tired of that kind of "bull* spin." Hopefully we will wake up and take control of OUR government by electing REAL people into office.

Lieberman Lives On Center Stage (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126926

When Senators go to the floor this week to debate the proposed Iraq troop surge, Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) will demonstrate once again to his Democratic colleagues that he is his own man. And while the Democratic leadership has made clear that Lieberman should be treated just as any other Caucus member, they cannot completely extinguish skepticism in their ranks about his long-term party loyalty.

Democratic Senators and aides said last week Lieberman's political posture hasn't changed much since winning re-election as an Independent Democrat. But in a narrow 51-49 seat majority, Democrats privately acknowledged they are still worried that as an Independent free from party peer pressure, Lieberman may cost them precious votes or even go so far as to join the GOP Senate minority.

"With a one-vote margin, there's no room for error," conceded one Senate Democratic aide. "But we have to take him at his word" that he is with the party.

"Of course there is some skepticism," added a senior Democratic Senate staffer. "He is the linchpin for the whole thing."

Democratic Senators and aides said that outwardly, Lieberman appears to be acting no differently in the first month of the 110th Congress than he did before he became an Independent last year after losing in the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont. Lieberman went on to win a resounding victory in the general election, but his campaign divided his allies in the Senate, many of who turned away from him to support Lamont as the Democratic nominee.

Sen. Mark Pryor (Ark.), one of the moderate Democrats who stood by Lieberman throughout his switch to run as an Independent, said Lieberman always has been a true Senate centrist — left leaning on key domestic items and conservative on national security matters. "He's always been willing to break with the party in what he thought was the right thing to do," Pryor said. "He hasn't changed."

As such, Pryor doesn't believe Senate Democrats approach Lieberman any differently these days, nor does he sense "any awkwardness" toward him from the Caucus. And, Pryor said, he doesn't believe Lieberman — even as one of the most conservative Democrats these days — would ever defect to the Republican Party.

"My sense is, looking at it, he lines up much better with the Democrats than the Republicans," Pryor said. "It's a personal decision for him to make, but I don't see any real advantage for him switching parties."

Undoubtedly, Republicans would love to have Lieberman jump ship and tip the Senate to an even 50-50 split. Such a move would give the GOP the gavel since Vice President Cheney as the President of the Senate would get the tie-breaking vote.

Meantime, the GOP leadership will gladly accept Lieberman's support on the war as they confront opposition to President Bush's proposal to increase troops in Iraq by 21,500.

No other Democrat or Independent besides Lieberman has signaled support for the Bush proposal, which will face a hefty share of criticism from the well of the Senate during this week's multi-resolution debate.

Still, Lieberman makes no apologies for his Iraq War stance, and insists that his view on the surge is "consistent with the position I've taken over the last four years. That notwithstanding, I feel so deeply that we have an enormous stake in how Iraq comes out." Lieberman said he respects the disagreements among his colleagues over the war, and with the troop increase, but believes his position is the right course for a successful outcome to the conflict.

"I wish there were a few more Democrats that agreed with me," he said.

Lieberman appears completely at ease these days as an Independent, not only on his war positions but also with his political alliances. Lieberman has even flirted with the possibility of endorsing a Republican — most notably Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) — in the 2008 presidential contest.

Even so, sources say Democratic leaders have made clear that the veteran Connecticut Senator is still one of their own, and that while he deserves no special treatment, he should win equal favor from the Caucus. Lieberman holds a powerful slot as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this Congress, a position Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) insisted he would hold as long as the Connecticut lawmaker agreed to caucus with the Democrats during the 110th Congress.

"Sen. Reid treats him like any other chairman," said a knowledgeable Democratic Senate aide.

"He's treated equally," added a Democratic Senator, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "I don't see him getting special privileges beyond what any other chairman would get."

Lieberman continues to participate in Democratic Caucus functions, and attends regular party luncheons and meetings, Democratic sources say. Lieberman said last week that he "absolutely" continues to feel comfortable with the Democrats, and doesn't believe his colleagues approach him differently these days — even though many of them campaigned against him when he decided to run as an Independent.

Lieberman said he is trying to fashion himself similarly to the independent-minded Democrats of the 1960s — progressive on domestic affairs and strong on foreign policy. "At this point, I am feeling a sense of mission ... I am fighting for that tradition — that [Sens.] Kennedy, [Hubert] Humphrey (Minn.), Scoop Jackson (Wash.) tradition."

His position on Iraq is the most notable break from the Democrats, and certainly comes as no surprise within the party ranks. Still, some Senate Democrats say the jury is out on how Lieberman will posture himself over the next two years, and they remain uncertain about where his votes will fall when leaders need his support in a narrow majority.

The Senate Democrat said that even though many of his colleagues sided with Lamont in the November election, Lieberman has been "well received" since returning to the Senate in January. And while no Member appears outwardly worried, Lieberman undoubtedly presents a challenge for the party that must capture 60 votes to avoid a filibuster on any legislation of consequence. "With a slight majority of 51, when he's off with the president on a certain issue — that's a challenge," the Senator noted.

"But that would have been a challenge whether he was a D or an I," the Senator added.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) said "functionally nothing has changed" with how Democrats treat Lieberman or in how he positions himself on the issues. "Obviously, Sen. Lieberman's opinions are his. He's an independent thinker, we know that."

Support Is Honorable Route (USAT)

The president's plan for success in Iraq should be given a chance. Although critics have focused almost exclusively on the reinforcement of troops — the so-called surge — the president's strategy is a comprehensive approach to the security and political problems facing Iraq.

Under this plan, the Iraqi government has committed to lead the effort to defeat the militias and any other challenges to the government's monopoly on force. The new plan also relies on political and economic measures that will help to create a more unified government capable of providing essential services to its citizens.

Opponents of the new strategy apparently do not agree that a political solution depends on peace and stability in Iraq. But, as Gen. David Petraeus made clear in his Senate testimony in January, Iraqis need to feel that the government is capable of providing for their security before they can give up their reliance on sectarian militias.

While American troops work with Iraqi units to establish security in Baghdad, and in the al-Qaeda-dominated Anbar province, the Iraqi government will be expected to act on promised reconciliation initiatives.

The new plan is not guaranteed to work. But everyone agrees Iraq cannot yet handle security by itself. If the United States withdraws, Iraqis will be slaughtered, terrorists will be emboldened throughout the region, and Iran and Syria will step into the void. These severe consequences to our national security make it clear that withdrawal is not an option.

Although many have summarily criticized the new strategy, they have contributed no viable plan of their own. No one has any illusions about the challenges we face, but we will be more likely to succeed if we are unified.

As Osama bin Laden has said, "This war is for you or for us to win. If we win, it means your defeat and disgrace forever." The Senate should also consider the message a nonbinding, no-confidence resolution would send to our enemies, our allies and our troops. Such a resolution would tell Gen. Petraeus, whom the Senate recently confirmed as U.S. commander in Iraq, that we don't support his mission.

In a TV news interview, Tyler Johnson, a 21-year-old soldier serving in Iraq, appropriately summed up the message a no-confidence resolution would send to our forces: "Those people are dying. You know what I'm saying? You may support — 'Oh, we support the troops,' but you're not supporting what they do, what they share and sweat for, what they believe (in), what we die for. It just don't make sense to me."

Iraq Vote Could Resonate In 2008 (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

When Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) saw reporters approaching him last week, he took off in a sprint, determined to say as little as possible about a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's troop-escalation plan, which is expected to come before the Senate today.

"You know where I stand," the senator, who is considered politically vulnerable back home, said repeatedly as he fled down stairways at the Capitol. "I'm still looking."

The historic showdown to begin today represents the first bipartisan confrontation between Congress and the White House over the Iraq war since the invasion nearly four years ago. While the resolution will test the mettle of every member of the chamber, none will be challenged more than Sununu and the 19 other Senate Republicans facing reelection in 2008 -- many from states where voters are angry with Bush's war policy and want the troops to begin heading home.

Democrats won control of the Senate and House in November largely because of widespread opposition to the war, and the issue remains dangerous for the GOP heading into the 2008 campaign. Senate Republicans are torn between home-state voters eager for them to take a stand against a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 U.S. troops and has cost hundreds of billions of dollars, and Bush and other Republican leaders who warn that passage of the resolution would undermine chances of a successful conclusion to the war.

"It's inevitable that people want to ascribe political motives to this, but I just hope a majority of Oregonians understand when it comes to issues of war and peace, there's no issue of greater gravity on your heart and mind," said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who must stand for reelection next year in a swing state.

"Oregonians are patriots and want to fight the war on terror, but they don't like the way this war has mutated," added Smith, once a war supporter but now an anguished foe.

Republican senators are loath to say that political calculations could weigh on their votes, but to GOP leaders battling to prevent their members from supporting the resolution against the troop buildup, politics present an unavoidable obstacle.

"I'm sure with some of them, that's a factor," said Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.). "But this is a very, very serious matter," he pleaded. "There are some things more important than getting reelected. This is one of them."

The drama is to begin late this afternoon with a procedural vote on whether to move ahead with the debate. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) vowed Friday to try to block that, promising to rally his fractious party behind him.

The bipartisan resolution to be offered on the floor states that the Senate disagrees with the president's plan and urges Bush to consider all other options for achieving his strategic goals.

Should resolution supporters clear their first obstacle, the Senate will move to an anticipated long series of votes on amendments. The big ones to watch include a Republican call for the immediate withdrawal of all troops, intended to put Democrats on the spot, and attempts by antiwar Democrats to strike certain provisions, including one opposing the termination of funding for troops in the field.

The latter issue drew fire yesterday from John McCain (Ariz.), the top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," McCain said on ABC's "This Week."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) warned that it would be "a terrible mistake to prevent this debate."

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there's going to be much stronger legislation," Feinstein said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Supporters of the resolution include most Democrats and at least seven, and possibly as many as 11, Republicans, led by Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who assembled the compromise measure under consideration. The pro-resolution Republicans include five senators who will face voters in 2008: Warner, Smith, Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Hagel, who is considering running for president, initially supported a tougher resolution condemning Bush's war policy. Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) is the one declared GOP presidential candidate supporting the Warner bill.

The big unknown is what a handful of Republican fence-sitters such as Sununu will do. The GOP undecideds include Sens. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) and Larry E. Craig (Idaho), who are also up for reelection in 2008, along with Sens. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska) and Arlen Specter (Pa.), who are not.

For many Republicans, the scrutiny will be intense. A coalition of liberal activists, labor unions and antiwar veterans aired Super Bowl advertisements yesterday targeting Coleman and Collins. Other advertisements are running in Richmond and Manchester, N.H., to pressure Warner, Sununu and Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

Coleman said he found it "offensive" to suggest that senators' reelection concerns could influence their stand. But he conceded: "Certainly senators like myself and Collins and others are in tough states. Anything we do always gets measured against that."

Indeed, Coleman is under attack, first for opposing a tougher resolution approved last month by the Foreign Relations Committee, then for supporting Warner's resolution after standing by the president for so long.

"No matter what these guys do now, they're going to have to be held to account for the choices they made not to do oversight when they said we have to back the president no matter what," said Al Franken, a liberal comedian and talk-show host mulling a race against Coleman next year. "When he had the gavel, he gave the president a free pass."

Alexander insisted that political considerations are not his foremost concern, but he conceded that he is struggling to strike the right note. "I'm unhappy about the conduct of the war in Iraq, and I would like to express my support for the troops at the same time. I want to find an appropriate way to say that," said the first-term senator, who could draw a formidable opponent in 2008 as his state drifts increasingly Democratic.

Sununu, whose once Republican-dominated state leaned Democratic last year, has drawn four potential Democratic opponents for 2008. Collins could face one of the toughest battles two years out, given that Maine has supported Democrats in the past two presidential elections.

But even her likely opponent, Rep. Tom Allen, was reluctant to criticize her positioning on the debate. Although the six-term House Democrat said opposition to the war appears to be growing in Maine, there is no consensus among voters on a way forward. "It's such a complicated issue," Allen said. "The ideas of what to do range from cut the funding now to stay the course and give it a little more time."

Indeed, many political experts think the Iraq situation is far too fluid to anticipate how it might play in the next election. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the Senate Democrats' campaign chairman for 2006 and 2008, has warned party strategists and candidates not to expect Iraq to pack the political punch in the next cycle that it did last year.

But even the most seasoned veterans acknowledged that voters expect Congress to take a more active role in the war debate.

"There's just a general unrest in a lot of people," said Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who is expected to seek an eighth term in 2008. "We've had a lot of people over there. We've lost a lot of people from Alaska."

One of the strongest factions is a group of Republicans, including some up for reelection next year from solid red states, who have vowed to filibuster any resolution opposing Bush's troop policy. Kansas may be showing a glimmer of Democratic blue, with a Democratic governor and a newly elected House Democrat, Nancy Boyda, but Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the intelligence committee chairman at the outset of the war and for its first three years, called the various proposals "confetti resolutions" with no value.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) said he feels no political pressure, despite a looming reelection campaign that will be his first.

"Nobody likes war, but I come from a very military-oriented state," Chambliss said.

"They don't want to see us pour more people into a hopeless cause," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), another 2008 candidate, said of his home-state voters. "But they don't want us to leave if there's a realistic opportunity to be successful. I think they expect us to be smart and wise and do the right thing."

Democratic Sens. Russell Feingold (Wis.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) have announced that they will oppose the Warner resolution because they do not think it is tough enough, and they could bring a handful of Democrats with them. But those balking Democrats are expected to oppose Republican efforts to block the bill through parliamentary tactics.

Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) said he was reminding his colleagues that "you're not putting a stamp of approval" on the resolution by allowing the debate to proceed. "We should all remember the engine that's pulling this train -- disapproval of the escalation. All the problems we have, have nothing to do with that issue," Durbin said.

In Democratic Race, Iraq Frames Debate (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

In speech after speech, Democratic presidential candidates agreed on the issues of the day: Global warming must be stopped, universal healthcare is imperative, the crumbling American education system must be fixed.

And on the biggest issue – Iraq – all the prospective and declared Democratic hopefuls speaking to party activists last weekend were also in basic agreement: that the US must extricate itself from the Iraq war. Where they differed was over one question: How?

As the Senate begins debate Monday on competing resolutions on Iraq, the Democrats are fresh out of their own debate on a way forward in Iraq at the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York demonstrated the challenge inherent in being the early front-runner: As she seeks to win over enough of the party faithful to win the nomination, she is also looking ahead to the general election campaign, when a position too far to the left could hurt her chances among moderates.

"There are many people who wish we could do more," Senator Clinton told the crowd, as a handful of hecklers cried out. "But let me say that if we can get a large bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said, 'No!' to President Bush and begin to reverse his policies."

Clinton also stated that she "wants to go further," arguing that the US needs to "threaten" Iraq's government with reduced funding for Iraqi troops if it does not start fulfilling its promises. And "if we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will!" she asserted.

But to many Democratic candidates, a nonbinding resolution rejecting Mr. Bush's plan to send more US troops to Iraq isn't enough, even as a starting point. Clinton and another top challenger for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, face pressure from many of the other contenders to take a more forceful stand. Some of these other candidates have the luxury of not having to cast votes in Congress – most notably, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has carved out an Iraq position to the left of Clinton and Senator Obama.

The North Carolinian says senators should not support the bipartisan resolution rejecting Bush's surge, but rather cut off funding for the war. Mr. Edwards, who supported the war as a senator in 2002 and later repudiated his vote, is the most antiwar of the leading Democratic contenders – and commands a considerable following among Democrats affiliated with organized labor. He is also well-organized in Iowa, the first nominating state, and has the potential to stun the field next January.

"We cannot be satisfied with passing non-binding resolutions that we know this president will ignore," Edwards said. "We have the power to stop the escalation of this war."

Another candidate who still has a vote in the Senate, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, has also aligned himself with antiwar liberals by saying he will not support the nonbinding resolution. But his presidential aspirations are seen as a long shot. The question is whether his presence in the race, and ability to gain media attention for his views, will put pressure on Clinton and Obama to move leftward.

Obama took perhaps the most unusual approach in his speech to the DNC. Instead of going through the usual list of policy positions, he focused instead on the nature of public discourse – and about the need to overcome the cynicism he says has become a staple of modern politics.

"The campaigns shouldn't be about making each other look bad, they should be about figuring out how we can all do some good for this precious country of ours," Obama said. "That's our mission. And in this mission, our rivals won't be one another, and I would assert it won't even be the other party. It's going to be cynicism that we're fighting against."

Obama asserted that everyone in the race has a responsibility to put forth a plan for ending the war, but did not discuss his own proposal, released last week. Obama's legislation would begin redeployment of US forces out of Iraq by May 1, 2007, and calls for the removal of all combat brigades by March 31, 2008, a date he says is consistent with the expectation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

One candidate who did discuss his Iraq plan at length, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, first came up against the axiom, "You never get a second chance to make a first impression."

Last Wednesday, on the day he announced his presidential campaign, he faced a maelstrom of controversy over his attempt to compliment Obama. In calling him "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Biden inadvertently insulted all the black presidential candidates of the past, and spent the rest of the week apologizing.

During his cattle call appearance on Saturday, Biden began with a quip: "So, how was your week?" Then he apologized again. By then, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was ready to rip into what he called "the very deep hole" the Bush administration has dug the nation into in Iraq.

Senate Vote: Discomforting, Revealing, Not About Morale (USAT)

USA Today, February 5, 2007

John Warner first volunteered to fight for his country at age 17, when he left high school and joined the Navy during World War II. He served until 1946, and four years later, he left law school to volunteer for the Marines in the Korean War. He eventually went on to serve as President Nixon's secretary of the Navy, and after being elected a Republican senator from Virginia in 1978, he rose to chair the Senate Armed Services Committee.

That's not the profile of someone who is naive about war. But now, at age 79, Warner is a leader in the fight to have Congress pass a non-binding resolution against President Bush's troop "surge" in Iraq — an undertaking that Bush and others criticize as undermining the war effort.

The crucial part of Warner's measure says, "The Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges the president instead to consider all options and alternatives … ."

The Senate faces hard votes on Warner's resolution and competing measures this week. Despite the courage of American troops and many Iraqis, the war has gone badly, metastasizing into something critics feared and the administration never imagined. Almost four years in, there's no end in sight, growing frustration among voters and little support for Bush's leadership.

Now the question is what to do, and on that Congress and Americans are painfully divided.

Warner's resolution is not an easy call. Critics say it sends a dispiriting message to the troops, and there's no getting around that. But the administration diminishes its case by trying to imply that its critics are unpatriotic if they don't silently follow the president's lead. No American leader should need a sermon on the value of honest argument and dissent, even in wartime. Voters elected scores of new legislators in November with the demand they speak up. Lack of support for the war is driving the resolutions, not the other way around.

Many critics on both sides of the "surge" also deride an anti-war resolution as a worthless middle position, either because it's political posturing that undercuts the commander in chief, or a pointless gesture that avoids using Congress' power to cut off funding for the war. But that, too, misses the essential point.

All or nothing is not the responsible choice. The public is no more enthusiastic about abrupt withdrawal than it is about staying the current failing course, and even critics of Bush's strategy warn that abrupt withdrawal would backfire. If a resolution can be worded to draw bipartisan support, it might point a path to unity, not underscore division.

The Warner resolution, like other drafts, offers one, essentially the plan proposed by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group: Turn over most fighting to Iraqi forces while training them; help secure Iraq's borders; focus U.S. troops on fighting al-Qaeda; and engage Iraq's neighbors in diplomacy. Critics may not like that plan, but it's every bit as valid as Bush's. In fact, something similar is likely to follow Bush's troop surge whether the increase is effective or not.

The surge is underway, and nothing Congress can do in the short run will stop it. The resolutions are more about what happens next. Whether one passes or not — even whether they're a good idea or not — matters less than what the debate over them reveals: The Iraq war, with public support gone, is in its end game. What's being debated now is how best to get out.

A Bleak Assessment On Iraq (NYT)

There isn't much encouraging news in the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq. Ethnic and sectarian identities are hardening and violence is spiraling, as shown again in Saturday's horrific Baghdad market bombing. Iraq's new governing institutions are weak and leading politicians have a "winner-take-all attitude" that can only make matters even worse.

The intelligence agencies see "real improvements" in Iraqi security forces. But those gains are strictly relative and the report still finds those forces unlikely to be able to successfully battle Shiite militias in the next 12 to 18 months.

A good example of this problem can be found in the accounts of last week's battle between the Iraqi Army and a mysterious group of armed religious extremists outside the Shiite shrine city of Najaf. Najaf is supposed to be a showcase province for the American-trained Iraqi Army. The Pentagon chose it in December for the first symbolic handover of security responsibilities.

Barely a month later, in their first major battle, the Iraqis had to be bailed out by American air and ground forces. Hundreds of armed zealots had managed to set up a fortified encampment, complete with tunnels, trenches, blockades, 40 heavy machine guns and at least two antiaircraft weapons.

This happened just 10 miles northeast of the city at a time when hundreds of thousands of religious pilgrims and Iraq's leading Shiite clerics were headed there for annual holiday observances. A successful attack on top clerics and pilgrims in Najaf would have been disastrous.

The Iraqis' next mistake was sending only one army battalion and some police to raid this armed camp after its belated discovery. Government forces were quickly surrounded and called in American air support. Still pinned down, the Iraqis had to summon American ground support as well before they could advance on the camp.

This less-than-impressive performance by a supposedly top-of-the-line Iraqi Army division has grave implications for President Bush's new Baghdad security drive, in which an additional 17,000 or so American troops are supposed to work in tandem with a much larger Iraqi force.

Perhaps the Iraqi security forces will improve over the next 18 months. But as the intelligence estimate also makes clear, the only real hope for Iraq lies in a bold reversal of course by Iraqi politicians that puts national reconciliation ahead of sectarian advantage. Mr. Bush needs to get serious about demanding such a change, including enforceable deadlines for overdue steps like eliminating militia supporters from the police, ending vengeful anti-Baathist measures targeting the Sunni middle class, and guaranteeing the fair allocation of oil revenues.

Otherwise, Iraq seems headed over the cliff.

The Perils Of Partitioning Iraq (LAT)

Physically dividing Iraq in an attempt to quell ethnic violence would only lead to more heartache and killing.

JUST WHEN IT SEEMS THAT Iraq's death-spiral cannot get worse comes news that it has. The civilization that grew between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers was nourished for centuries by the mingling of myriad cultures and ethnicities. Now a vile "sectarian cleansing" in Baghdad threatens that civilization — and it is proceeding faster than anyone thought possible.

More than 540,000 Iraqis have fled their homes because of sectarian fighting in the last 11 months — 80% of them in Baghdad, according to a carefully documented report from International Medical Corps, a Santa Monica-based humanitarian group that has teams in 16 of Iraq's 18 provinces. The pace of flight is accelerating: The number of people displaced jumped by 43% in November alone, the group found.

Although there have been widespread reports of an Iraqi diaspora to other Middle Eastern countries, most of the displaced are inside Iraq. They've taken refuge in segregated Sunni or Shiite neighborhoods within Baghdad or moved to provinces where people of similar ethnicities predominate. Many are living with impoverished relatives, and some face malnutrition. If the violence continues, estimates are for 1 million more such "internally displaced persons" within Baghdad alone in the next few months. That amounts to more than 20% of the population of a capital the United States vowed not only to liberate but to remake.

This disaster has prompted calls — first from hawkish humanitarians on the left, now joined by some voices on the right — for some sort of partitioning of Iraq that might quell the violence.

It is tempting to try to separate Shiite and Sunni combatants before they further shred and bleed their country, Yugoslavia style. But partition is a dangerous idea, the merits of which do not improve even as other options look worse. First and most important, the Iraqis do not want it. Second, the biggest prize in the ethnic wars — Baghdad — may be ghettoized, but it cannot be easily divided. Third, not all the violence is between Shiites and Sunnis; Shiite sects battle each other for power, and other ethnic strife may yet erupt in the north. Across Iraq, partition would force multiethnic cities and mixed families to choose sides and identities, however artificial. And the agony of Baghdad might simply be repeated in Kirkuk, Basra or Nasiriya.

Advocates of a "soft" partition seek to avoid these awful outcomes by keeping Iraq intact but encouraging Iraqis to use their new constitution (when fully implemented in 18 months' time) to allow the highly autonomous provinces to confederate as they see fit.

But the Bush administration should stick to its position and refuse to endorse any sort of plan to divide Iraq. Soft or hard, partition would inevitably be seen as another Western plot to weaken Iraq and draw a new Middle East map to U.S. specifications. It would fuel violence by seeming to ratify the end result of the sectarian killing, and do nothing to stop violence against unfortunate Iraqis caught on the wrong side of the tracks in the future.

The War: 'Ambiguous' Intel On Iran's Meddling In Iraq (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

How solid is evidence that Iran is stoking the conflict in Iraq? The White House has ratcheted up rhetorical attacks, suggesting that Iranian government elements were supplying Iraqi Shia insurgents with deadly weapons technology. But the idea that Iran plays a key role in fomenting violence inside Iraq took a knock last week with the publication, by the U.S. intelligence czar's office, of a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. The NIE, representing the consensus view of all 16 U.S. intel agencies, says that because sectarian antagonisms among Iraqis themselves are so intense and "self-sustaining," Iranian or Syrian involvement is "not likely to be a major driver of violence."

U.S. officials still maintain that Iran is helping Iraqi Shia insurgents build bombs that are particularly deadly because they can penetrate armored vehicles. But three U.S. officials familiar with unpublished intel (unnamed when discussing sensitive info) said evidence of official Tehran involvement is "ambiguous," in the words of one of the officials. For example, U.S. troops have been attacked by homemade bombs triggered by infrared sensors (like ones used on American burglar alarms). U.S. agencies know Iranian purchasers have made bulk orders for the sensors—which cost as little as $1 each—from manufacturers in the Far East. Some analysts think most of the sensors are used for innocent purposes: they note that the devices are so widely available that would-be supporters of Iraqi militants could simply buy them in an Iranian store and smuggle them to Iraq; high-level government involvement wouldn't be necessary. (Another intel challenge: it's difficult for U.S. personnel to ID Iranian operatives among Iraqi Shiites or Iranian pilgrims who visit Shia shrines in Iraq.)

Last week U.S. military officials in Baghdad were set to brief reporters about evidence American forces had assembled about Iran's interference in Iraq. But the briefing was canceled; one of the U.S. officials suggested it had been put off because intel officials couldn't agree about the info.

Zakaria: The Road To Reformation (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Al Qaeda had hoped to rally the entire Muslim world against the West, but now it is in the middle of a dirty sectarian war within Islam.

For those in the West asking when Islam will have its Reformation, I have good news and bad news. The good news is that the process appears to have begun. The bad news is it's been marked by calumny, hatred and bloody violence. In this way it mirrors the Reformation itself, which we now remember in a highly sanitized way. During that era, Christians of differing sects massacred each other as they fought to own the true interpretation of their religion. No analogy is exact, but something similar seems to be happening within Islam. Here the divide is between the Sunnis, who make up 85 percent of the Muslim world, and the Shiites, who represent most of the other 15 percent.

The dominant new reality in the Middle East today is the growing schism between these two groups. Look at the daily sectarian killings in Iraq, listen to the dark warnings of Saudi and Jordanian leaders about a "Shia crescent," watch the power struggles in Lebanon. Islam's quiet cleavage has come out into the open. At a recent demonstration in the Palestinian territories, opponents of Hamas taunted the Sunni Islamists as "Shiites" because of their links to Iranian-backed Hizbullah.

We in the United States have spent much time asking what all this means for Iraq, for U.S. troops in the midst of this free-for-all and for America more generally. But think, for a moment, about what the trend means for Al Qaeda.

Osama bin Laden and Ayman Al-Zawahiri, both Sunnis, created Al Qaeda to be a Pan-Islamic organization, uniting all Muslims as it battled the West, Israel and Western-allied regimes like Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Neither Zawahiri nor bin Laden was animated by hatred of Shiites. In its original fatwas and other statements, Al Qaeda makes no mention of them, condemning only the "Crusaders" and "Jews."

But all ideologies change as they encounter reality. When bin Laden moved to Peshawar in the 1980s to fight the Russians in Afghanistan, he allied with radical Sunnis who had a long history of oppressing Afghanistan's Shiite minority, the Hazaras. (The novel "The Kite Runner" is about a young Hazara boy.) Even then, bin Laden didn't sanction anti-Shiite violence, nor did he add anti-Shiite accusations to his messages. But after the Sunni Taliban took power, Arab fighters under his command did support his hosts' anti-Shiite pogroms.

Iraq was the real turning point. The self-appointed leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, had a poisonous attitude toward Shiites. In a letter to bin Laden, written in February 2004, he described Iraq's Shiite majority as "the insurmountable obstacle, the lurking snake, the crafty and malicious scorpion, the spying enemy ... The danger from the Shia ... is greater ... than the Americans ... I come back and again say that the only solution is for us to strike the religious, military, and other cadres among the Shia with blow after blow until they bend to the Sunnis." Zarqawi was drawing on Wahhabi Islam—and its offshoot Deobandism in South Asia—in which there is a deep and oppressive strain of anti-Shiite ideology.

Bin Laden and Zawahiri were clearly uncomfortable with this new line, and the latter reproached Zarqawi directly. Bin Laden remained largely silent on the matter, but by the end of 2004, both had decided that Al Qaeda in Iraq was too strong to rebuke. And, rousing anti-Shiite feelings seemed the only way to mobilize Iraq's Sunni minority. It also, crucially, made them see Al Qaeda as an ally. The trouble for Al Qaeda is that as a practical matter, loathing Shiites works in only a few places: principally Iraq, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and some parts of the gulf. Most of the rest of the world's 1.3 billion Muslims are turned off by attacks on their co-religionists.

So, an organization that had hoped to rally the entire Muslim world to jihad against the West has been dragged instead into a dirty internal war within Islam. Bin Laden began his struggle hoping to topple the Saudi regime. He is now aligned with the Saudi monarchy as it organizes against Shiite domination. This necessarily limits Al Qaeda's broader appeal and complicates its basic anti-Western strategy.

These emerging divisions weaken Al Qaeda, but they will help most Muslims only if this story ends as the Reformation did. What is currently a war of sects must become a war of ideas. First, Islam must make space for differing views about what makes a good Muslim. Then it will be able to take the next step and accept the diversity among religions, each true in its own way.

The United States should avoid taking sides in this sectarian struggle and aim instead to move the debate to this broader plain. We should encourage the diversity within Islam, which has the potential to divide our enemies. But more important, we should encourage the emerging debate within it. In the end it was not murder but Martin Luther that made the Reformation matter.

Who's Stoking The Fires? (USNEWS)

By Mitchell Prothero

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

BEIRUT-The presence of balaclava-clad young men waving weapons from motorbikes is never a good sign. Even so, their arrival during a recent series of street clashes between Sunni Muslim supporters of the current Lebanese government and the Shiite followers of the Hezbollah-led opposition is particularly ominous given Lebanon's tragic history of sectarian violence and civil war.

For more than two months, Lebanon has teetered on the brink of chaos. Hezbollah and its allies have been demanding the American-backed government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora submit to the formation of a so-called national unity government-one that would tip the political balance in favor of the Shiite community. A series of escalating demonstrations finally exploded in late January into sectarian violence that left about 10 people dead and more than 200 wounded. There are concerns about further clashes next week if thousands of pro-government demonstrators turn out to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri.

This should be a parochial struggle among Lebanese in a tiny nation of 3.8 million where the mix of Sunnis, Shiites, and Christians is just diverse enough that no group can dominate. During Lebanon's 15-year civil war, which claimed some 100,000 lives and turned Beirut into a rubble-strewn battleground, the country mainly split between Christians and Muslims. Now, nearly two decades later, the conflict's defining characteristic is the rift within the Muslim community, a split that draws in on opposing sides the region's two major powers, Sunni Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran. Lebanon is a testing ground for growing Iranian influence-and for Saudi Arabia's efforts to block it.

This has led to some unusual political twists. After war unexpectedly erupted last summer between Hezbollah and Israel, the major Sunni Arab states-Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Jordan-moved quickly to condemn the provocation by Hezbollah. For the first time, these Arab states essentially took Israel's side.

Lebanon's Sunni Muslims-who include much of Beirut's economic elite-tend to look to the Saudis for patronage. And with the prime minister slot open only to a Sunni (Lebanon's Christians get the presidency and the Shiites get the parliament speaker), Hezbollah's political attack on Siniora is widely perceived as part of an Iran-backed challenge to the Sunni Islam power structure around the region.

When Hezbollah began protesting in downtown Beirut's gleaming shopping district (most of which is owned by Saudi companies), it looked to the Saudis as if Lebanon risked tipping to Iranian control-just as Iraq transformed from a Sunni power under Saddam Hussein to an Iranian-friendly Shiite one.

Political sources say that within days of Hezbollah's initial protests, Siniora was told by Saudis to hold firm and they would pay any economic bill necessary. "It began last summer during the war, when the Arab League came to Siniora's defense," says Michael Young, opinion editor of Beirut's English-language newspaper, the Daily Star. "The Saudis promised him then anything he needed. Siniora does not stand for Siniora; he's a steadfast symbol of the Sunni Arab world and its political establishment. He is always someone who has fought for an Arab consensus to every problem. So to assail him is to assail the Sunni Arab world itself."

But then came a series of street clashes between Sunnis and Shiites that seemed to take everyone by surprise, apparently including Hezbollah itself. "Look, Hezbollah is a disciplined organization, maybe the most disciplined in the Arab world," says one security official, who cannot speak for attribution on this subject. "But it's not enough to control your fighters and officials. They clearly lost control of the kids and their allies, who aren't organized like they are. This really scared everyone involved."

Even, perhaps, officials in Saudi Arabia and Iran, who may have their own interests in not having their rivalry push Lebanon over the brink. Whether or not that is the case, Saudi and Iranian officials unexpectedly opened direct talks to calm the crisis. They need to hurry to keep Lebanon from again sliding into civil war.

It was on the eve of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, in March 2003, that Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton sent a letter to President Bush. "There is no doubt that our forces will be victorious in any conflict," he wrote. "But there is great potential," he warned, "for a ragged ending to a war as we deal with the aftermath." He noted that then Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld "frequently talks about the list he keeps of things that could go wrong in an Iraq war." Added Skelton: "I have kept my own list."

He went on to outline some possibilities that would prove eerily prescient: Shiites attacking Sunnis, forcing U.S. troops to protect them. "Stabilization and reconstruction prove more difficult than expected," Skelton wrote. "This puts pressure on troop rotations, reservists, their families ... and requires a dramatic increase in end-strength."

Nearly four years later, it is just such an increase in end-strength, meaning the overall size of the military, as well as the strain of repeated rotations on the Army and Marine Corps, that Skelton will confront as the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. In that role, this Democratic moderate figures to be a major player in examining America's wars on two fronts. As President Bush presses his case for sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq and details surface about wasted reconstruction aid (including Olympic-size swimming pools ordered up by Iraqi officials), Skelton summarizes the goals for his tenure with a word that has become his mantra: "Oversight. Oversight. Oversight."

No nonsense. That mantra is both a top item on his to-do list and a reminder of a lack of congressional supervision during critical phases of the Iraq war-and of the responsibility that Americans feel Capitol Hill should take up now. In a recent survey, nearly two thirds of Americans said that Congress has not been assertive enough in challenging the Bush administration's conduct of the war. "Oversight was nil," says Skelton. To that end, he has announced plans to revive the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation, disbanded when Republicans gained House control in 1994. Skelton's committee will take up topics including military readiness. "This causes me great heartburn, this chewing away at our armed forces," Skelton tells U.S. News. "Equipment is worn to a nubbin," he adds, noting that while Congress provided the military with $17 billion last year to make up for equipment wear and tear, units in America "still don't have a lot to train on-it's left over there for succeeding brigades. And what's left over there is often worn out."

A member of the committee since 1981-and its ranking Democrat since 1998-Skelton, 75, still describes himself as a simple country lawyer. Colleagues caution, however, that the moniker belies a gentle but no-nonsense questioning style that will set the committee's tone in the months to come.

Stricken with polio as a child, Skelton was unable to serve in combat but developed a voracious appetite for history books that he shares, he says, with military leaders. "That's my hobby. Some people bowl, some ski-I read history books." For that reason, says Robert Scales, the former president of the U.S. Army War College in Carlisle, Pa., "the strongest thing you can do when you talk with Ike is to come armed with those historical connections. He understands that for the military, the battlefield is our lab, our law library, our courtroom, our stock exchange. Soldiers do war so infrequently that if you're going to gain knowledge, you've got to go to the historical lab."

Iraq Battles A Shadowy Shiite Death Cult (NSWK)

By Babak Dehghanpisheh

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Dhia Abdul Zahra claimed he was the messiah. And on the eve of the holiest day in the Shiite calendar, Ashura, when believers beat themselves bloody with chains and swords, Zahra tried to deliver salvation. Hundreds of his followers, armed with heavy weapons, clashed with Iraqi and American soldiers northeast of the holy city of Najaf on Jan. 28. The Soldiers of Heaven, as the cultists called themselves, apparently planned to storm Najaf and assassinate top Shiite clerics. They fought fiercely: an American helicopter was shot down, killing two soldiers, and Iraqi forces called for reinforcements at least twice. Iraqi police say this was no ordinary enemy. Fighters repeatedly tapped into their radio frequency and repeated an ominous message, "Imam Mahdi is coming." The return of the Mahdi—the 12th and last Shiite saint, who, believers say, vanished in the ninth century—signals the end of times.

It would be easy to write off the thirtysomething Zahra, who was killed along with more than 250 others in the battle, as an Iraqi David Koresh and his followers as misguided zealots. But the Soldiers of Heaven are only one of dozens of Shiite factions, some of whom have similar millenarian ideas, that have sprung up across southern Iraq. Dominated as it is by one sect, the south has generally been thought remote from the civil war that has engulfed Baghdad and its environs. The Iraqi Army took over security in Najaf from the Americans in late December; few if any of the 20,000 new U.S. troops heading to Iraq will be sent to the region. But as the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq released last week points out, the country is plagued by four overlapping battles—Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on Americans, sectarian killings and Shia-on-Shia violence in the south. If left unchecked, that factional fighting could grow into as great a threat to Iraq's stability as the ethnic cleansing farther north. "The collapse of authority in southern Iraq could be devastating for both the United States and for Iraq," says Vali Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival."

Under Saddam Hussein, the Shiite south was viewed as a hotbed of Iranian intrigues and deliberately neglected. Its infrastructure is noticeably worse than other parts of the country: roads are full of potholes, and open sewers are common. And, despite millions of dollars pumped into projects since 2003, most recently under the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad, the situation hasn't improved significantly. Unemployment in some areas is as high as 60 percent, and Iraq's five poorest provinces are all in the south. Many reconstruction projects have been abandoned because of corruption, kidnappings and killings.

The two biggest players in the region are Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, run by cleric Abdul Aziz al-Hakim. But in Basra alone, whose oilfields account for about 90 percent of Iraq's budgetary revenue, at least half a dozen parties are competing for power—often violently. Basra's murder rate tripled in the first half of last year. "Security is bad in the Shiite south and may be getting worse," says Juan Cole, a professor of history at the University of Michigan and an expert on Iraq's Shiites.

In this chaotic environment, talk of the dhuhoor, or appearance of the Mahdi, has been growing. "The decrease of the things people need—electricity, water, a salary, peace of mind—makes them want to find something like a miracle," says Salama Khafaji, a former member of the Iraqi Governing Council from Najaf. Sadr has astutely tapped into this longing for a better world; loyalists have hinted that he may be the Mahdi himself. Fringe groups that take the Mahdi more literally—and that rail against a Shiite leadership who are doing nothing to hasten his return—are also growing, says Khafaji. "When you have the complete collapse of society is exactly when you get these pretenders who combine social anxiety, political frustration and fear with millenarian expectations," says Nasr.

Senior clerics familiar with Zahra say the Soldiers of Heaven was an offshoot of the Sadrist movement and had few friends among the Najaf establishment. "They were against the marjaiya [senior clerics], against the government, against the Americans," says Sheik Fatih Kashif al-Ghitta, a senior cleric from Najaf. On more than one occasion, Ghitta says, Zahra's followers had fought pitched battles against the Mahdi Army. They were particularly well entrenched in Zarqa, a village about 10 miles northeast of Najaf. The group had dug six-foot-deep trenches around their property and set up defensive sand berms. Weapons were buried underground or covered with palm leaves. Iraqi troops later found sniper rifles, heavy machine guns and even antiaircraft guns around the property. But the Soldiers of Heaven is hardly the only heavily armed faction in the south: gunmen from another Sadrist offshoot, the Fadhila Party, control Basra's oilfields. Baghdad security officials worry that even more Shiite fighters will soon flood into the area to avoid the "surge" of U.S. troops in the capital.

If Zarqa is any indication, that could spell trouble. Although President George W. Bush praised Iraqi forces after the battle ("The Iraqis are beginning to show me something," he said), in fact the Iraqis were nearly overrun. At one point, Col. Ahmad Silawi, the director of Najaf intelligence, and Abdul Hussein Abtan, the deputy governor of Najaf, were pinned down. "Help us! There's heavy shooting!" Abtan cried over the radio. Silawi later told NEWSWEEK he'd recited the shahada, the traditional prayer before death. Only repeated U.S. airstrikes crushed the cultists.

Ironically, Iran—which U.S. military officials have blamed for fueling attacks against American soldiers in the south—probably has more influence in the region than the Coalition. "If, after this attack, the Americans haven't realized that they need our help to stabilize Iraq, I don't know when they're going to learn anything," says a Tehran official who has close ties to the senior Iranian leadership and asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject. If he's expecting Washington to ask for help in the south, though, he may as well wait for the Mahdi, too.

Sandra Day O'Connor On Postcourt Life (NSWK)

By Debra Rosenberg

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Walk down the hallway on the second floor of the Supreme Court, through the part of the massive marble building the public never gets to see, just past the chambers of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and you might think you've stumbled into a gallery. The walls of the long corridor are lined with artwork: there's a Georgia O'Keeffe print, a photograph of a Navajo woman (taken by Barry Goldwater) and a framed editorial cartoon of Lady Justice celebrating the first woman named to the Supreme Court. Turn the corner, and you'll find that woman, retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. "It wouldn't fit in my chambers," she says, pointing at the collection. When she left the court last January, she had to turn over her spacious digs to her replacement, Justice Samuel Alito. But a year later, nestled in a cozy corner office, O'Connor is still hard at work.

After her surprise announcement in July 2005 that she was leaving the court, O'Connor seemed likely to follow most of her former colleagues into a quiet private life. But America's first female justice is blazing a new path in retirement, too. At 76, O'Connor is still physically and mentally fit. Her current schedule—packed with appeals-court hearings, law-school lectures, speechmaking and book writing—can make her days on the court look practically languorous. And these commitments don't include her recent work with the Iraq Study Group (or her aerobics classes). She divides her time between Washington, where she maintains her chambers, and Phoenix, where she cares for her husband, John, who suffers from Alzheimer's. "She just put it in third gear and went on," says her brother, H. Alan Day.

Before she stepped down, O'Connor seemed dismissive of the life of an ex-justice. She once told her brother: "When you retire from the court, you become a nobody." Though Justice Potter Stewart, whose seat O'Connor filled, was an advocate of stepping down in your prime, O'Connor wasn't sure whether she'd one day follow his lead. "Most of them get ill and are really in bad shape, which I would've done at the end of the day myself, I suppose, except my husband was ill and I needed to take action there," she told NEWSWEEK recently in a rare interview in her chambers.

O'Connor carefully weighed when to quit the bench. In the spring of 2005, with Chief Justice William Rehnquist publicly battling thyroid cancer, the two justices discussed timing. "We talked a little bit," O'Connor recalls. "I was concerned about whether he had an intention to step down since his plans might have altered my own. It's hard for the nation to grapple with two [retirements] at once," she says. "He indicated he didn't want to step down." So she realized she had to go first.

After O'Connor left, she'd planned to spend time with her husband—but she couldn't predict the cruel trajectory of his disease. John, a lawyer, and O'Connor had long been fixtures on the Washington social circuit, known for their ballroom dancing. "Here you have this magnificent man full of Irish humor and tales and then suddenly the fog rolled in," says former Wyoming senator Alan Simpson, a family friend. In earlier stages of John's illness, O'Connor would take him to the court with her because he couldn't be left alone.

After O'Connor was freed from her daily duties at the court—it took six months before Alito took her seat—John's condition deteriorated. Last summer she reluctantly placed him in a care center near their home in Phoenix; she visits him often. "It's such a miserable disease. It's so sad. It's so hard. I did the best I could," she says. "He wants me there all the time." It's been a difficult transition, says Simpson. "It's tough to go home at night and no longer have this warm, witty guy there."

The void created by John's illness may help explain O'Connor's refusal to retire to Arizona and instead keep herself immersed in work. Now, she says, she's rethinking her earlier prediction of becoming a "nobody." "I think there is a fairly narrow margin of time in which the voice can still be heard," she says. Because O'Connor chose to retire rather than resign, she's still considered an active judge and draws a salary. So she has responsibilities as an officer of the court to fill in as a judge on appeals courts—a task that requires copious preparation. Even the most mundane duties of judgeship do not escape her: last month she spent two days swearing in public officials in Arizona. Being a judge also means O'Connor can't cash in on any of the speeches or public appearances she makes. That would change if she resigned. But then, she wouldn't have an office at the court. Maybe then she would be a nobody. "I'd be on my own," she says. "I have chosen a different route."

That route has led her to speak out on a handful of causes, like the importance of an independent judiciary and teaching civics. She's also waded into one of the nation's most difficult problems: what to do in Iraq. When James Baker first asked her to join the Iraq Study Group, O'Connor was baffled. "I wasn't sure I should do it," she recalls. "It was so out of my field of judging. I don't know anything about the military." Though the project was more grueling and time-consuming than she'd imagined, she found it fascinating.

Later, O'Connor had little patience when the media wanted to turn the commission members into celebrities. At one meeting, recalls Alan Simpson, also a study-group member, famed photographer Annie Leibovitz arrived to take a group portrait for Men's Vogue. "We all sat there, no one said anything," says Simpson. "Then she said, 'Not me. That's not what I'm here for. This is not about our pictures going out somewhere,' and the rest of us piped up to agree." (Baker and co-chair Lee Hamilton sat for the portrait.) Lately, some study-group members have expressed frustration that President George W. Bush has not embraced their recommendations, but O'Connor—still unwilling to plunge into politics—demurs. "There are probably no perfect answers," she says.

While O'Connor's been busy charting a new course, the court she left behind is changing, too. She's often said she's disappointed that her replacement was not a woman. But gender balance isn't the court's only shift. O'Connor gained a reputation as the swing vote on issues like abortion, affirmative action and school prayer—a designation she's always chafed against. Still, she acknowledges some decisions could change without her. "I'm sure there will be some sense that in some instances, had I been on the court, my vote might have differed from some of the new members," she says. "But that's all right. That's the way things go."

A year after her departure, O'Connor admits she misses the court. "Occasionally I'll see one [upcoming case] and say, 'Well, I wonder what they're going to do to my old writing in Case X'," she says. But O'Connor seems to live by the motto stitched into a needlepoint pillow on her couch: MAYBE IN ERROR BUT NEVER IN DOUBT. She says she has no regrets about leaving the bench. And she refuses to second-guess any old votes. "I don't look back and say, 'Oh, gee.' There's no use living that way. Do the best you can and look forward," she says. Even in retirement, O'Connor sees the road ahead.

Why We Can't Leave (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

Our hyperactive president's walkabouts, radio talks, interviews, conferences on energy, the economy, and obesity-and his recent State of the Union address-find him looking well and speaking well, but rather in the manner of the Wizard of Oz. When the curtain is drawn back on the big flashing pronouncements, the Wizard is revealed not as a powerful magician but someone who can't even dispossess a wicked witch of her broomstick without the help of a young girl, her little dog, a scarecrow, a toothless lion, and a tin man. (Cast those characters yourself!) The only thing that is melting before the wizard's eyes is not the wicked witch but the wizard's own support in the country, in the Congress, and within his own party.

George W. Bush bet his presidency on Iraq. And now he's betting his party's future on it. If the new troop "surge" fails, it will destroy the Republicans' reputation on national security for at least a generation.

The president said, "Nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America to succeed in the Middle East, to succeed in Iraq." He's right. Abandoning Iraq would plunge the country we went to war to save into a grim horror movie. The Iraqi government cannot stop sectarian killing when it is able to call on the world's most powerful military. Who can expect it to do so if the Americans leave? Indeed, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi professionals-physicians, academics, and the like-have divined the answer and fled to other countries.

Unbelievable horrors. Of course, most Americans believe the nightmare in Iraq simply cannot get much worse. Wrong-it most certainly could. Advocates of a "phased" withdrawal of our troops must reckon with the certainty of a serial disaster: a full-blown civil war spreading a contagion of violence across the region, with Iran virtually uncontainable. Our enemies, as the president said, would emerge with new safe havens, new recruits, and new resources. The head of the CIA, Michael Hayden, put it starkly: "An al Qaeda victory in Iraq would mean a fundamentalist state that shelters jihadists and serves as a launching pad for terrorist operations throughout the region and against our own homeland." A premature pullout would condemn Iraq and the region to unbelievable horrors. It would be a historic victory for our Islamic enemies. If America is defeated in Iraq, a victory in the broader war on terror will be impossible. And unlike what happened after Vietnam, the enemy will undoubtedly follow America home.

How the president must rue his idealized concept of the war, and his obstinacy in persisting with the "too little, too late" way it was conducted. The desire for democracy in Iraq is a noble one, but democracy is not achieved by a single election. It was exhilarating to see so many Iraqis proudly raising their inky voting fingers in the face of threats, but installing democracy is different from organizing an election. Democracy requires security. It requires civil institutions, of which Iraq had none, except for the mosque where Islamists organized to the detriment of dreams of a secular state. It requires respect for the rule of law, for which the Shiite and Sunni extremists have only contempt. It requires tolerance for minorities, but in Iraq today people are murdered daily because of their name or the street where they live. Indeed, those elections had counterintuitive consequences for they divided the country into three sectarian communities and hardened the differences among them.

U.S. Threatens Crushing Offensive To Calm Baghdad (WT)

From combined dispatches

BAGHDAD -- A U.S.-Iraqi offensive against militants in Baghdad will begin within days and take place on a scale never seen during four years of war, American officers said yesterday.

A military spokesman, meanwhile, acknowledged for the first time that hostile fire was probably to blame for the crashes of four helicopters in the past two weeks, and said the U.S. command has ordered changes in flight operations.

Briefing a small group of foreign reporters, three American colonels who are senior advisers to the Iraqi army and police in Baghdad said a command center overseeing the crackdown in the capital would be activated today.

"The expectation is the plan will be implemented very soon thereafter," a senior adviser to the 9th Iraqi army division said at a U.S. military base in Baghdad.

"It's going to be an operation unlike anything this city has seen," Col. Doug Heckman added. "It's a multiple-order magnitude of difference, not just a 30 percent, I mean a couple hundred percent" larger than previous offensives.

The job of stabilizing Baghdad had become increasingly urgent after a wave of violence that, an Interior Ministry official said, claimed nearly 1,000 lives in the past week alone -- about135 of them in a single truck bombing on Saturday. At least 103 persons were killed or found dead yesterday, most of them in Baghdad, police reported.

The officers said the new security operation will be headed by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, a Shi'ite in his early 60s who was named to the post under pressure from the U.S. military. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki initially had selected Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji for the job.

The plan will involve U.S. and Iraqi forces sweeping the capital's neighborhoods for militants and illegal weapons and then holding cleared areas. But some analysts fear that as in previous crackdowns, militants will simply melt away and wait out the forces or strike in areas where they are not deployed.

The four helicopters that have gone down since Jan. 20 crashed after claims by insurgents that they have received new stocks of anti-aircraft weapons -- and a recent boast by Sunni militants that "God has granted new ways" to threaten U.S. aircraft.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters that the investigations into the crashes of three Army helicopters and one private copter were incomplete, but "it does appear they were all the result of some kind of anti-Iraqi ground fire."

Despite the losses, Gen. Caldwell said it was premature to conclude that the threat to U.S. aircraft posed by Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militiamen had increased dramatically.

"There has been an ongoing effort since we've been here to target our helicopters," Gen. Caldwell said. "Based on what we have seen, we're already making adjustments in our tactics and techniques and procedures as to how we employ our helicopters."

Gen. Caldwell did not elaborate, presumably for security reasons. In the past, defensive measures have included flying lower and faster, varying routes and using zigzag patterns over dangerous areas.

Three crashed in mostly Sunni areas and the fourth was shot down during fighting with members of a Shi'ite messianic cult near Najaf. U.S. officials have accused Iran of providing sophisticated weapons to Shi'ite militants.

In December, a spokesman for the late dictator Saddam Hussein's ousted Ba'ath Party, Khudair al-Murshidi, said in Damascus, Syria, that Sunni insurgents had received shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, and "we are going to surprise them," meaning U.S. forces.

Mr. al-Murshidi did not say when or how the missiles were obtained.

Insurgents have used SA-7s, a shoulder-fired missile with an infrared homing device, against U.S. and British aircraft since 2003.

U.S. military helicopters are equipped with long-range sensors and devices to jam radar and infrared technology, but they have proven vulnerable to intense gunfire, as well as rocket-propelled grenades.

Iraq's Sunni-Shiite Anguish Grows (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

CAIRO

When National Intelligence Director John Negroponte briefed the Senate last week on Iraq, he cautioned lawmakers that the hope for stability there rests on quelling unabated sectarian violence.

That view was reflected in a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), parts of which were declassified Friday, that describes an Iraq Army and police bedeviled by the sectarian allegiances of their members. The report deemed it unlikely that these forces will move effectively against militias in the next 18 months – particularly against the Shiite groups with ties to Iraq's ruling parties.

Indeed, US military officials cautioned patience – despite the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

"[That] will not turn the security situation overnight," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said in Baghdad. "Iraqi forces suffer deficiencies in leadership and logistics. It will take more than two months to solve these problems."

The urgent need to address the strife that flows in Baghdad's streets as well as its political corridors was painfully evident in a devastating weekend attack.

The deadliest single suicide bombing since the war began hit a crowded Shiite market on Saturday, leaving at least 135 Iraqis dead.

Overall, the assessment from the NIE, a report from the US intelligence community, was bleak, especially in its evaluation of the ability of Iraqi security forces to get its arms around the burgeoning violence.

The violence is also leading to even greater polarization of Iraqi society, both among the man on the street and the country's political leaders, the report found.

Also, it underscored what experts and US government analysts have been saying for some time – that the solution to Iraq's problems rests on the creation of a national compact that will involve compromise for the country's Shiites, Sunnis, and Kurds. It noted that the trend is in the other direction.

"Even if the violence is diminished, the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation" over the next 18 months, the term of the estimate, the report says.

Despite the report's downbeat assessment, it argues in line with the Bush administration that the situation would be worse if US troops were to withdraw now.

The report makes the argument that if the US withdrew "rapidly," Iraq's security force would be "unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution," that "massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable," and that outside countries "might" intervene directly in the conflict.

While the report finds that Iran provides support to Shiite militants, and says Syria isn't stopping the flow of foreign militants across its borders, it also argues that the solution to Iraq's problems does not lie in Damascus or Tehran.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence ... because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," notes the report.

In the same vein, the report stated that the term "civil war does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq" but that it "accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict."

As American forces start to move into Baghdad for the escalation of the US military presence there, there were also reminders of the growing sophistication of the country's insurgents.

General Caldwell, the top US military spokesman in Iraq, said Sunday that the three American helicopters that have crashed since mid-January, causing the loss of 16 US service members, were all shot down by ground fire. These three incidents constitute the most successful spate of insurgent attacks on US air power since the start of the war.

In the wake of Saturday's bombing, Shiite militia leaders blamed US efforts to curtail sectarian groups for the attack. Some said that joint US and Iraqi operations against them, which have recently netted scores militants, prevented them from securing their own neighborhoods.

There's little evidence that the militias do a better job of maintaining security than US and Iraqi forces – large-scale attacks have hit Shiite enclaves before. Such attacks have led average people to turn to the militias in frustration, and to blame the US for a security situation.

On Saturday, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most respected religious figure broke more than three months of self-imposed silence, issuing a statement urging Shiites and Sunnis to set aside their differences.

Ayatollah Sistani had been a major figure calling for moderation, particularly among his Shiite constituency, during the first two years of the war. But he has largely withdrawn from making public statements as the violence has escalated.

His new fatwa, or religious edict, said, "The Islamic nation is passing through difficult conditions and facing tremendous challenges that threaten its future. . . Everybody knows the necessity for us to stand together and reject the sectarian tension to avoid stirring sectarian differences."

Iraqis Fault Delayed U.S. Plan In Attack (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

BAGHDAD, Feb. 4 — A growing number of Iraqis blamed the United States on Sunday for creating conditions that led to the worst single suicide bombing in the war, which devastated a Shiite market in Baghdad the day before. They argued that the Americans had been slow in completing the vaunted new American security plan, making Shiite neighborhoods much more vulnerable to such horrific attacks.

The critics said the new plan, which the Americans have started to execute, had emasculated the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that is considered responsible for many attacks on Sunnis, but that many Shiites say had been the only effective deterrent against sectarian reprisal attacks in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhoods. Even some Iraqi supporters of the plan, like Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister who is a Kurd, said delays in carrying it out had caused great disappointment.

In advance of the plan, which would flood Baghdad with thousands of new American and Iraqi troops, many Mahdi Army checkpoints were dismantled and its leaders were either in hiding or under arrest, which was one of the plan's intended goals to reduce sectarian fighting. But with no immediate influx of new security forces to fill the void, Shiites say, Sunni militants and other anti-Shiite forces have been emboldened to plot the type of attack that obliterated the bustling Sadriya market on Saturday, killing at least 135 people and wounding more than 300 from a suicide driver's truck bomb.

"A long time has passed since the plan was announced," Basim Shareef, a Shiite member of Parliament, said Sunday. "But so far security has only deteriorated."

American officials have said the new plan will take time, but new concerns emerged Sunday about the readiness of Iraqi military units that are supposed to work with the roughly 17,000 additional American soldiers who will be stationed in Baghdad under the plan, which President Bush announced last month.

Iraqi and American military officials said the command structure of the Iraqi side had still not been resolved, although the plan is supposed to move forward this coming week.

Naeem al-Kabbi, the deputy mayor of Baghdad and a senior official loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the powerful cleric who heads the Mahdi Army, said he believed the plan had been delayed "because the Iraqi Army is not ready."

American military officials have not laid out a precise timeline for the security plan, and would not say if undermanned Iraqi units had delayed its start. But American officials have said Iraqi units arriving in Baghdad to fulfill their part of the new plan are only at 55 to 60 percent of their full strength.

With much of Baghdad devolving further into chaos, many Iraqis have begun to question whether the security plan has ambled along too slowly, setting up a situation in which American and Iraqi troops will be greeted with hostility rather than welcomed as protectors.

Concerns about the unintended consequences of the American security plan rippled through many levels of the Iraqi government.

"People's expectations went up," Mr. Zebari said. "They were hopeful, optimistic that this new surge, this new plan would provide a better life for them. And this daily killing — this bomb — they lose hope. Still the troops haven't arrived."

An American military official, responding to accusations that American efforts opened Shiite areas to attacks, said American checkpoints around eastern and central Baghdad last October seemed to reduce the number of car bombs until the checkpoints were removed because of objections from Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and Shiite officials loyal to Mr. Sadr. The official was not authorized to comment about the subject and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman in Iraq, called for patience as the new security plan rolls out. "Give the government and coalition forces a chance to fully implement it," he said in remarks carried by several news agencies.

His comments, however, came as more than a dozen mortar shells crashed on Adhamiya, a Sunni area of eastern Baghdad, in what appeared to be an act of retaliation by Shiites. At least 15 people were killed and more than 56 wounded, an Interior Ministry official said.

Clashes in western Baghdad between Sunni and Shiite militias left 7 dead and 11 wounded, and the authorities found 35 bodies throughout the city, many showing signs of torture.

Meanwhile in the streets of Sadriya, the poor, mostly Shiite area of central Baghdad where the bomb exploded on Saturday, merchants and residents struggled to contain their anger.

"I saw with my own eyes young children flying from the windows of the apartments on top of the shops when the explosion arrived," said Haydar Abdul Jabbar, 28, a car mechanic who was standing near a barber shop when the bomb exploded. "One woman threw herself out of the window when the fire came close to her."

Mr. Abdul Jabbar said he rushed to collapsed buildings trying to help the wounded, but found mainly hands, skulls and other body parts.

"The government is supposed to protect us, but they are not doing their job," he said. "I watch the TV and see the announcements on the imminent implementation of the security plan. Where is it, for God's sake?"

"I wish they would attack us with a nuclear bomb and kill us all," he added, "so we will rest and anybody who wants the oil — which is the core of the problem — can come and get it. We can not live this way anymore. We are dying slowly every day."

The truck exploded around dusk on Saturday at a market flush with crowded food stands. The crater from the blast was large enough to hold a sedan; the blast threw the truck's gnarled engine block more than 100 yards away.

As the sun rose on Sunday, the rescue effort continued with workers and relatives tugging at concrete pieces in a mad search for victims amid the piles of debris where apartments and offices once stood. Processions heavy with death moved through the area. Men lashed simple wood coffins to the top of minibuses for the long journey to cemeteries, while families in the backs of trucks wailed after collecting the bodies of relatives.

While the American military put out a statement saying that the Iraqi Army assisted at the scene, the area closest to the crater was controlled by the Mahdi Army. Between 8 and 15 men dressed in black and carrying AK-47s, waved reporters away on Sunday morning.

The scene was thick with anger directed at the Iraqi government and American military for letting the people down and allowing such a devastating attack. When asked about the "tragedy" of the blast, one Mahdi guard responded, "The only tragedy was when we voted for weak officials."

He then pointed toward the bombed-out buildings and added, "This is the result."

Later, when two American Humvees and an Iraqi patrol passed just after 1 p.m., one of the men in black called the soldiers "apes and cowards."

"They're the ones who brought us the catastrophe," one of them said. "If they were not here such a thing wouldn't happen to us."

Mr. Abdul Jabbar, the car mechanic, was one of many Iraqis who said that the American military would have been better off leaving the Mahdi Army in charge of Shiite neighborhoods.

Uday Ahmed, 31, a Sunni whose three restaurants at the market were obliterated by the blast, killing 20 of his workers, said that until a few weeks ago, Mahdi militiamen were more visible on the streets, checking vehicles, watching and offering to arbitrate disputes. After American and Iraqi officials arrested several top Mahdi commanders last month, he said, many of the Mahdi militants drifted into the shadows or fled.

He said their departure contributed to the recent spasm of violence in Shiite neighborhoods.

Some Shiites in the area said that the truck could have been stopped at a checkpoint, decreasing damage from its payload. Hussein Ali, 57, said Shiite militiamen might have recognized that the driver was not from the neighborhood.

"They don't have any system or apparatus to check the cars," he said. "But they know from looking at the faces who is supposed to come to Sadriya to bring vegetables or fruits. They have a relationship with the merchants."

Iraqi officials, after meeting with American military commanders, are expected to announce as early as Monday that they have agreed on some of the details of the command structure for the new security plan.

American military officials say that the Iraqi officer who will lead his forces participating in the new Baghdad security effort, Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar, will take command on Monday and that the Baghdad plan will be carried out soon.

McCain Criticizes War Resolution

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — On the eve of a Senate showdown over a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's war strategy in Iraq, Senator John McCain of Arizona, a leading Republican critic of the measure, accused its sponsors Sunday of intellectual dishonesty. He described the nonbinding resolution as a "vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there."

He said on the ABC News program "This Week" that if the sponsors wanted to block Mr. Bush's plans to expand the American troop presence in Iraq, they should be brave enough to vote to cut off financing.

A principal Republican backer of the resolution, Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, said on the same program that it was important for the Senate to make a clear stand against the troop building, which he said would produce only more turmoil.

Senator Dianne Feinstein of California, a Democratic supporter of the resolution, said she was frustrated that Republican leaders would try to filibuster to block a vote. "Look, debate is going on in every schoolyard, in every state, in every city of this nation," she said on CNN's "Late Edition," describing the proposed filibuster as "obstructionism."

U.S. Copters Were Shot Down (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 4 -- Four American helicopters that crashed in Iraq in the past two weeks were shot down, a U.S. military spokesman said Sunday, prompting officials to reevaluate how troops move around in an increasingly hostile war zone.

"There has been an ongoing effort to target our helicopters," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad, according to news services. "We have had four helicopters shot down. . . . It appears they were all the result of some kind of ground fire."

In the most recent crash, an Apache helicopter was downed Friday morning near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad, killing two crew members. An Iraqi police official said it was struck by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile.

A Sunni insurgent group backed by al-Qaeda, the Islamic State of Iraq, posted photographs and a video on its Web site Sunday that it said showed the downing of the helicopter. The group asserted responsibility for the attack and warned that Iraqi airspace will be inhospitable for U.S. forces.

In the video, a man is heard chanting "Allahu akbar" -- God is great -- as a helicopter is struck by what appears to be a missile. The aircraft catches fire and spirals down in a trail of smoke. The authenticity of the video could not be verified.

The deadliest helicopter crash this year occurred Jan. 20, when a Black Hawk was shot down northeast of Baghdad, killing 12 soldiers on board. On Jan. 28, two soldiers were killed when armed men shot down a helicopter en route to a farm area near Najaf to support Iraqi and U.S. troops in a clash with insurgents.

Five American private security contractors aboard two helicopters were killed Jan. 23 while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack in central Baghdad. One of the helicopters was shot down, killing four contractors on board, and a fifth contractor was shot aboard another helicopter that did not crash.

"Based on what we've seen, we are already adjusting our tactics and procedures in how we deploy our helicopters," Caldwell said during the session with Iraqi reporters in the fortified Green Zone.

Military helicopters in Iraq generally travel in pairs and fly at low altitude. Gunners at both sides of the craft scan the landscape for threats. Caldwell did not say which tactics would change.

Helicopters are widely used to shuttle soldiers and civilians around Iraq, where roadside bombings and attacks on convoys have made ground travel dangerous.

In other developments, deadly explosions and attacks were reported in Baghdad and elsewhere Sunday, a day after a massive bomb in a central Baghdad market killed more than 130 people.

Improvised explosive devices killed at least 11 people in Baghdad, according to Col. Sami Hassan, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. At least nine people were killed in shootings and mortar attacks, he said. News services reported scores of other deaths in Baghdad or elsewhere.

'Speed Bumps' Deadly On Iraqi Roads (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A type of homemade bomb that can include parts commonly found in Iraqi kitchens and that is easy to hide on desert roads has proliferated in Anbar province and spread to other parts of the country.

Troops in armored vehicles are endangered by the bomb, which U.S. military officials call a "speed bump." The weapon is formed by sandwiching plastic explosives between metal plates, such as baking trays, a Pentagon intelligence document shows. A detonator switch triggers the bomb when a vehicle rolls over it, ripping into the often-unarmored underside.

Homemade bombs, referred to by the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, cause 70% of U.S. deaths and wounds in Iraq, Defense Secretary Robert Gates has said. Explosive devices had killed 1,337 U.S. troops and wounded 11,871 in Iraq through Jan. 27, the Pentagon said.

The speed bump first appeared in Anbar province, Pentagon records show. Anbar is a hotbed of the Sunni insurgency and is the scene of some of the heaviest fighting.

The first devices were built with baking trays; now they're fashioned from various types of metal.

"The enemy's IED arsenal evolves as we succeed in defeating his methods of attack," said Brig. Gen. Dan Allyn of the Pentagon's anti-IED office.

Part of the speed bump's effectiveness springs from its ease of disguise. It's tough to detect on desert roads where it can be covered with dirt, according to the Pentagon document.

The military spent $3.5 billion last year to defeat IEDs. Some of that money was spent on armored vehicles with V-shaped hulls. Those hulls can deflect the force of a blast from a speed bump or other IED outward, sparing the troops inside the vehicle the worst of the impact.

The Marine Corps, which provides most of the U.S. troops in Anbar, does not release details on causes of servicemembers' deaths. Recent Marine contracts, however, indicate that the service is reacting to the scope of the speed bump IED problem:

•In January, the Marines placed an urgent, $9.4 million order to buy vehicles with V-shaped hulls for anti-IED work, according to Force Protection Inc. The South Carolina company produced Buffalo and Cougar combat vehicles with V-shaped hulls.

•In October, the Marines ordered $14 million worth of mine rollers — wheeled devices that travel in front of vehicles to detonate pressure-triggered IEDs.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the Pentagon had been slow to recognize the value of V-shaped-hull vehicles but is now buying them as quickly as they can be made.

"They've literally saved hundreds of lives," said Graham, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Hindered By Delays And Corruption, The Iraqi Air Force Is Flying Again, But Barely (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

TAJI MILITARY BASE, Iraq — The five droopy blades of a new Russian-made helicopter painted with the Iraqi flag began spinning and the aircraft hovered off the ground, purring like an oversize Cadillac.

“Sir, you have the controls,” an American in the co-pilot’s seat said late last month.

“I have the controls,” replied the Iraqi pilot.

The helicopter lifted, banked hard to the right over a junkyard, a palm grove and a series of warehouses, then soared toward the greenish waters of the Tigris River at the perimeter of this base.

It would be an unremarkable sequence in almost any country, but here it is significant: it means that the Iraqi Air Force is flying again.

Like everything involving the rebuilding of Iraq’s security forces, the return of the air force is fraught with ambiguity. In fact, there may be no better illustration of what is right, wrong and intensely frustrating about the Iraqi armed forces than the four new Russian helicopters, called MI-17s, that for the moment are restricted to flying over the Taji Military Base on training missions.

The Iraqi government originally ordered a fleet of Russian helicopters from a Polish contractor as part of $400 million in arms deals in 2004 and 2005 that turned out to be corrupt. Lt. Gen. Nasier Abadi, the deputy commander of the Iraqi Joint Forces, said in an interview that many of the helicopters in that deal were more than a quarter-century old and could never have been flown.

That deal, a serious embarrassment for both the United States and Iraq, has received wide publicity. But in an undisclosed development, General Abadi said, Iraq has renegotiated an arrangement that will now bring 28 new MI-17s to the air force. The four new helicopters at Taji, about 15 miles north of Baghdad, are part of that arrangement, he said.

The reason their use has been restricted is that the Iraqi military has so far been unable to purchase certain crucial onboard systems that the helicopters need to fly combat missions.

The Iraqi government’s failure to fully outfit the helicopters is a source of huge frustration to the American officers who are working with the Iraqis. “It’s painful,” said Col. Dan Groeschen of the United States Air Force, the deputy commander of the Coalition Air Force Transition Team. “Iraqis are itching to get going, to fly on a mission.”

The Iraqi Air Force once boasted more than 500 combat aircraft. Now it has around 20 helicopters and planes and has barely figured in discussions on rebuilding the Iraqi security forces.

There are no fighter planes in the current fleet and none are expected in the next few years at least, indicating that the United States will be responsible for air defenses here for some time to come.

“In that part of the world, what you call a territory without a couple hundred fighter planes is a protectorate,” said John Pike, the director of GlobalSecurity.org, a defense information organization in Alexandria, Va., which has studied the history of the Iraqi Air Force.

As with so much else in Iraq, the United States underestimated the difficulty of rebuilding the country’s air force, predicting that Iraqi helicopters would be flying by the summer of 2004.

No such thing happened, and Colonel Groeschen said the early effort was further slowed by a training crash in which four Americans and an Iraqi were killed. But the enterprise gradually made progress, and now 915 Iraqi Air Force personnel are tending, repairing and flying aircraft at American-run bases in Baghdad, Taji, Kirkuk and Basra.

Most of the aircraft are small reconnaissance planes and training helicopters with varying degrees of usefulness, although a set of multipurpose Huey helicopters is expected to arrive soon, after having been refurbished in the United States. For now, the pride of the fleet is a trio of 40-year-old C-130 cargo planes donated by the United States and flying out of the Baghdad airport.

Helping push the Iraqi effort along, Colonel Groeschen said, are 125 United States Air Force personnel on his transition team, a number that is expected to increase. Originally, most of the team lived and worked with the Iraqis as part of an ambitious countrywide program to embed American military personnel with Iraqis 24 hours a day as advisers and trainers.

But Colonel Groeschen said he was forced to put most of his team back in American quarters because the Iraqis refused to guard their camps carefully at night, failed to provide enough fuel for electrical generators and did not seem to be bothered by highly unsanitary conditions.

"I have a responsibility to take care of these guys, too," Colonel Groeschen said of his transition team. If the Iraqi side of the effort falls short, though, it will not be for lack of confidence on the part of its pilots. General S., a 52-year-old combat veteran who flew the MI-17 around Taji, and who asked that his name not be used for security reasons, said Iraqi pilots "are ready for any mission" and were already prepared to go beyond the training flights.

General S. compared himself to a fish that cannot live without water. "I cannot live without flying," he said.

A tour of the air base and compounds at Taji shows some of the progress that the program has made as well as the deep challenges it faces.

Near a hangar in one part of the base, a group of American and Iraqi mechanics clustered around a small American-made helicopter, a Jet Ranger with a damaged rear rotor. The American officers there said the Iraqi mechanics, like the pilots, had good technical skills but suffered from an inability to make decisions on their own, a legacy of the centralized, command-and-control style of the old Iraqi military.

That is why when it comes to the pilots, Colonel Groeschen said, the mission is not teaching them how to fly but "teaching them how to think." The United States plans to start a pilot school in the fall to end its reliance on officers who are products of the old military tradition, he said.

With so much history to overcome and so much uncertainty about the future, a simple flight on the MI-17, even just a training run, palpably eases the tension all around. After all, said Major Paul, an American who asked that only his first name be used, they are all pilots.

"The only thing that we look at and they look at is the ability to fly," Major Paul said. "There is that mutual respect, and it's independent of age or background or anything like that."

He stood back and let General S., wearing a green flight suit and a black aviator's scarf, do his preflight inspection of the big helicopter, checking for cracks in the rotor blades, damage to the fuel tanks, problems with the tires. And then they took off, passing the controls back and forth as they practiced landings and takeoffs.

"Very nice," Major Paul said after General S. set the helicopter down squarely in the center of a landing strip. "We'll see if I can do that."

Oversight Panel Ready To Dig Into U.S. Waste, Fraud (AJC)

By Julia Malone

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 5, 2007

Washington — After years of stockpiling findings and allegations, Rep. Henry Waxman will unleash four days of hearings this week aimed at exposing an array of "waste, fraud and abuse" in government.

The new Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform — who already has a reputation as the most feared congressional inquisitor — is set to begin Tuesday by digging into the Bush administration's program to rebuild war-torn Iraq.

Scheduled first is former Ambassador L. Paul Bremer, who oversaw the early reconstruction effort.

Waxman's outline for the hearing says Bremer will be asked about allegations that the reconstruction agency he ran "filled positions with unqualified staff who were politically connected."

The oversight panel also is set to focus on private contractors hired to provide supplies for the U.S. military effort in Iraq, especially subcontractors working for Halliburton, the corporate giant once led by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Another target later in the week is the Department of Homeland Security and its multibillion-dollar contracts to modernize the aging Coast Guard fleet and to install a Secure Border Initiative network, or SBInet, to protect the nation's borders with a system of technology, cameras and sensors.

By Friday, the last of the opening barrage of Waxman hearings is scheduled to examine whether the pharmaceutical industry is bilking federal health programs by overcharging for prescription drugs.

Among those set to testify Friday is Patrick O'Connell, the Texas assistant attorney general who mobilized a team of lawyers to sue drug manufacturers for overcharging the Medicaid program.

The packed week of hearings is the product of the California congressman's pent-up desire to perform oversight, which had been restrained by a dozen years of Republican control of the House.

Now, with a staff that doubled from 40 to 80 positions, Waxman controls the agenda, not to mention the potential power of the subpoena.

A senior Bush administration official appeared to welcome the scrutiny.

"There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government," Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, told The Associated Press last week.

He added that there is "very little real accountability" in federal operations.

Many government auditors regularly churn out critical reports on federal programs and contractors.

But those reports have little effect "unless the Congress takes them on and does something with it," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a private watchdog group.

She said that, for the most part, Congress has been ignoring government auditors, including inspectors general and the Defense Department's own contract agency.

She said she was hopeful that the new House would be stronger in oversight — largely because of the doggedness of Waxman.

"I don't see this as partisan," she said. "I do see this as Henry Waxman's strength."

Bremer Eager To Defend Record Overseeing Iraq (POL)

By Mike Allen

Pol – Bremer, Iraq legacy, February 3, 2007

L. Paul Bremer III, former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, plans to point to unexpectedly chaotic conditions in post-Saddam Baghdad as he defends his record at a hearing on Iraq spending before House Democrats on Tuesday, according to sources familiar with his testimony.

This is the first aggressive exploration of the administration's Iraq contracts since Democrats took control of Congress last month. Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has billed it as a "hearing on waste, fraud and abuse," one some administration officials have been dreading.

Bremer, the civilian in charge of all of Iraq from May 2003 to June 2004, told Politico he looks forward to committee members' questions, but also plans to give them a 5,000- to 6,000-word treatise in addition to his five-minute opening statement.

"I welcome the opportunity to go up and talk about it," he said in a telephone interview. "In the letter of invitation, the committee spoke about their interest in lessons learned. Given the difficulty that we've encountered in reconstruction in Iraq, I think it's helpful to look at lessons learned. That's a good approach to have. I look it as a constructive opportunity for me to do that."

Bremer calls his longer, written statement "a more extensive explanation of the circumstances we faced on the ground and how we tried to deal with those circumstances - how they complicated everything we did."

The questioning from Waxman's committee is likely to get rough, but Bremer seemed unfazed. "If they can come up with some ways to provide some lessons learned from the experiences we had in Iraq, or how we approach this kind of a problem in the future," he said, "that would be a very helpful contribution to American government."

The former ambassador to the Netherlands declined to preview the substance of his testimony, saying he wants to save it for the committee. But one of Bremer's former colleagues, who has been helping him prepare, suggested he will use the forum to correct misperceptions.

"Some of the decisions made during his time there have been the subject of major debate and often rather shallow debate," said the former colleague, speaking anonymously because Bremer has not yet appeared before Congress. "So, in some respects, hopefully this can be a forum for longer discussion."

Waxman will follow up Bremer's testimony with a session Wednesday on the administration's "reliance on private military contractors" for Iraq reconstruction. Bremer "has been requested to testify regarding reconstruction activities during his tenure at the CPA, as well as an audit report from January 2005 that concluded that more than $8.8 billion in cash under the CPA's control was disbursed without adequate financial controls or accountability," a committee statement said.

Bremer, who was awarded a Presidential Medal of Freedom for his work in Iraq, served on the personal staffs of six secretaries of state. He later was managing director of Kissinger Associates and chairman of the National Commission on Terrorism.

In preparing for his Capitol Hill appearance, Bremer said he has talked to lawmakers in both parties. He said they told him of "understandable frustration which has shown in all of the opinion polls about the overall situation in Iraq, and that does color any political considerations at this point."

"That didn't surprise me, but it was certainly there," he added.

Bremer said he has also reviewed CPA orders and other documents "to refresh my memory so that I can be responsive."

Asked if he believed committee members would be genuinely inquisitive, Bremer said: "Generally, congressmen try to do their job seriously, and I hope that will be what happens."

Another witness will be Stuart Bowen, the special inspector for Iraq reconstruction. In a letter appended to a report released by Bowen's office in 2005, Bremer offered a blistering response to Bowen's draft conclusions about the oversight of CPA funds, saying his report "does not meet the standards Americans have come to expect of the inspector general."

Bremer criticized "the authors' failure to understand and acknowledge the context in which the CPA was operating and their failure to recognize the major steps the CPA took to address the admitted weaknesses of the Iraqi budgeting system."

A third witness will be Timothy Carney, coordinator for Iraqi transitional assistance, a retired ambassador filling a new State Department position created as part of the president's "new way forward" in Iraq.

In his memoir, "My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope," Bremer writes that he believed even before he went to Iraq that the United States needed more troops there. But recalling conversations the president had with his military commanders, Bremer said: "There were times when he was very direct and said, 'If you need more troops, I'll send them to you.' I remember many times when they simply said, 'We have enough troops to accomplish our mission.' "

KBR Faces Hearings On War Contracts (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Executives from government contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan, including KBR and Compass of the UK, face a rocky ride in Washington this week as Henry Waxman, the congressman, begins hearings on allegations of “waste, fraud and abuse”.

The hearings, which begin on Tuesday, are expected to mark the beginning of a new phase in which contracting practices are subject to tougher oversight.

Mr Waxman chairs the chief investigative committee in the House of Representatives. He has been a dogged critic of the Bush administration’s handling of billions of dollars of US taxpayers’ money in Iraq re-construction contracts.

The committee has called on the chief executives of Blackwater, a security contractor, KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton, and Compass, food services group, among others, to answer questions.

The hearing will feature testimony of family members of four Blackwater employees who were killed in Falluja in 2004, and whose bodies were burned and dragged through the streets. The families are suing Blackwater for wrongful death.

Mr Waxman is likely to focus his line of inquiry on allegations that Halliburton wrongly entered into a subcontracting arrangement with ESS, a division of Compass that ran a dining facility in Iraq, which in turn used Blackwater to provide it with security services.

Halliburton controls a $16bn contract in Iraq, known as Logcap, which provides logistical support to US troops.

Under provisions of the contract, Halliburton can only rely on US military – not private security companies such as Blackwater – to provide armed protection.

In response to questions from Congress, the Department of Defense in July said that KBR had "no knowledge" of Blackwater having been hired by any of its -subcontractors.

But in a memo Mr Waxman subsequently received from Compass, the company admitted that ESS had used Blackwater and that the US security group had been deployed by other subcontractors.

Mr Waxman said in a letter to Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, in December that the security subcontract raised "serious questions" about the oversight exercised by Halliburton and the Pentagon regarding the tiering of subcontractors, and whether it was "proper" for Halliburton to bill the government for the services.

Compass said Steve Murray, the director of contracting at ESS, would testify at the hearing, scheduled for Wednesday, in spite of the fact that the committee had invited Compass chief executive Richard Cousins. Blackwater and KBR declined to answer questions about whether the chief executives of the groups would appear.

Iraq Accuses Syria Of Helping Rebels (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government on Sunday accused Syria of harboring insurgents fomenting violence here after a massive suicide bombing the previous day killed at least 130 people in a Shiite neighborhood of the capital.

The allegation strained relations with Iraq's neighbor just weeks after the two resumed diplomatic ties, and it led to squabbling among Iraqi politicians during a parliamentary session.

"I confirm that 50% of murders and bombings are by Arab extremists coming from Syria," government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said at a joint news conference with the top U.S. military spokesman inside Baghdad's heavily protected Green Zone. "They come from Syria, and we have evidence to prove it."

No such evidence was presented during the session with reporters.

Meanwhile, a Shiite Muslim lawmaker clashed with the Sunni Arab speaker of parliament, Mahmoud Mashadani, when he called for expelling Syrians and closing Iraq's entire border. "Be careful about what you say," Mashadani said, "because we have half a million Iraqis there."

After more heated arguments between Mashadani and Shiite lawmakers, the speaker abruptly ended the parliamentary session.

Syria is predominantly Sunni and since 2003 has been home to many Sunnis who have fled Iraq, including members of the Sunni-dominated regime of Saddam Hussein.

Iraq's current government, elected in the wake of the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Hussein, is largely Shiite.

The accusations drew angry responses from Syrian officials, who called them unsubstantiated.

"If they had just one piece of evidence, they would have presented it a long time ago," Mahdi Dakhlallah, Syria's former information minister, told Al Arabiya television.

Mohammed Habash, a Syrian lawmaker, said on the same program that the United States had put "40 million weapons" into the wrong hands by disbanding Iraq's army after it invaded.

"These weapons are now available on the black market in Iraq, sold by people with no conscience," he said.

"I would like to ask, is it believable that a tanker loaded with a … ton of explosives landed at Baghdad airport from Damascus?" Habash said. "Do you think [they] would need to import weapons from another place?"

DOJ_NMG_0126951

American soldiers on Saturday discovered more than 1,100 mortar rounds buried in a stash just south of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Sunday. Army Maj. Mark Aitken described it as a "supermarket-type cache," drawn upon by insurgents for multiple attacks.

The explosives, which could be made into roadside bombs, were detonated in a blast heard more than 20 miles away.

In the immediate aftermath of the March 2003 invasion, American troops left many Iraqi arms depots unguarded, and large quantities of weapons and munitions were stolen by looters.

Recently, U.S. officials have accused predominantly Shiite Iran of provoking instability in Iraq, but they have not produced evidence linking Tehran to attacks on American troops in Iraq.

There is "a gap between what we know and what we're willing to discuss," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a U.S. military spokesman, said at the news conference with Dabbagh.

The statements by Iraqi and American officials blaming Iraq's neighbors left many ordinary Iraqis unimpressed.

Ahmed Biden observed the death and destruction in the Sadriya neighborhood, where a truck filled with a ton of explosives detonated Saturday, leveling dozens of houses and shops.

"After what I saw, I swore that I would destroy the government," Biden said. "All they do is denounce and accuse countries like Syria and Iran for standing behind the violence. How long are we going to go on like this? We are fed up with denouncements."

A mother wept over her two dead sons. A cart held the severed limbs of victims. Tired men and women searched through the rubble, helped by Shiite militiamen affiliated with anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Biden watched, his eyes filling with tears, as residents pulled bodies from the heap of concrete and metal that was once a flourishing market.

At least 10 more bodies were found Sunday, three of them children, authorities said. That suggested an even higher death toll than 130, although officials said they could not confirm that.

Some residents became angry at a photographer, threatening to break his camera. Others defended him, saying he should take pictures "so that the world would see what had happened," Biden said.

Even as families buried their dead and overtaxed physicians labored throughout the day at Baghdad's main hospitals to treat the hundreds of wounded, new attacks Sunday brought more death to the capital and elsewhere in Iraq.

American officials at a base near Baghdad's airport said a new security plan for the capital would be implemented starting this week. An additional 21,500 U.S. troops are to be sent to Iraq under President Bush's plan. Most will deploy to Baghdad, where they will be based alongside Iraqi police and soldiers in small units in a number of yet-to-be-identified neighborhoods. An additional 8,000 to 10,000 Iraqi troops will also be brought to Baghdad from the south and north, authorities say.

Some troops have already arrived. Others are due in coming weeks, said Caldwell, who urged patience.

"It is important to acknowledge that it will not turn the security situation overnight," said the general, who also confirmed for the first time that all four American helicopters that have crashed in Iraq since Jan. 20 were brought down by "ground fire." He did not elaborate.

Twenty-one U.S. troops and private security contractors were killed in the crashes.

At least 3,098 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since March 2003, according to icasualties.org, which tracks military deaths.

By comparison, at least 1,000 Iraqis were killed in the last week alone, an Interior Ministry official told the Associated Press. In an average week, about 840 Iraqis are killed, according to the United Nations.

On Sunday, officials said bombings, assassinations and mortar rounds had killed at least 73 people.

Authorities recovered at least 33 bodies in various parts of Baghdad. In addition, a barrage of mortar shells fired at a Sunni neighborhood killed 15 people and injured 56.

In the capital's south, seven people died in a clash between Sunnis and Shiites before U.S. soldiers arrived.

A roadside bomb aimed at a police patrol killed four officers and injured two in central Baghdad. A similar bomb meant for police killed a civilian and injured three people.

A car bomb exploded at a minibus terminal in downtown Baghdad, killing four and injuring seven, all of them passengers inside a bus.

A car bomb went off near a cooking gas stall, killing two people. A bomb exploded near a bakery in south Baghdad, injuring five. Elsewhere, drive-by gunmen killed two people and wounded three.

South of the capital in Haswa, a bomb injured three women, and in Hillah, an Iraqi army colonel was found slain. In Wasit province, the body of an Iraqi soldier who had been beheaded and whose right hand was severed was fished out of the Tigris River.

Two other bodies were found floating in that part of the river, both men shot in the head and chest. Gunmen in Basra assassinated a prominent local Shiite leader affiliated with cleric Sadr.

Officers With PhDs Advising War Effort (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, is assembling a small band of warrior-intellectuals -- including a quirky Australian anthropologist, a Princeton economist who is the son of a former U.S. attorney general and a military expert on the Vietnam War sharply critical of its top commanders -- in an eleventh-hour effort to reverse the downward trend in the Iraq war.

Army officers tend to refer to the group as "Petraeus guys." They are smart colonels who have been noticed by Petraeus, and who make up one of the most selective clubs in the world: military officers with doctorates from top-flight universities and combat experience in Iraq.

Essentially, the Army is turning the war over to its dissidents, who have criticized the way the service has operated there the past three years, and is letting them try to wage the war their way.

"Their role is crucial if we are to reverse the effects of four years of conventional mind-set fighting an unconventional war," said a Special Forces colonel who knows some of the officers.

But there is widespread skepticism that even this unusual group, with its specialized knowledge of counterinsurgency methods, will be able to win the battle of Baghdad.

"Petraeus's 'brain trust' is an impressive bunch, but I think it's too late to salvage success in Iraq," said a professor at a military war college, who said he thinks that the general will still not have sufficient troops to implement a genuine counterinsurgency strategy and that the United States really has no solution for the sectarian violence tearing apart Iraq.

"It's too late to make a difference in Iraq," agreed Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University expert on terrorism who has advised the U.S. government on the war effort.Expanded Role for Academics

Having academic specialists advise top commanders is not new. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., Petraeus's predecessor, established a small panel of counterinsurgency experts, but it was limited to an advisory role. Also, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, created a "Red Team" to examine his operations from the enemy's perspective and to report directly to him.

Still, the team being assembled by Petraeus promises to be both larger and more influential than anything seen in the U.S. war effort so far, both making plans and helping to implement them. The group's members are very much in the high-energy mold of Petraeus, whose 2003-04 tour commanding the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, the biggest city in northern Iraq, gave the U.S. military one of its few notable success stories of the war. He also holds a PhD in international affairs from Princeton University.

"I cannot think of another case of so many highly educated officers advising a general," said Carter Malkasian, who has advised Marine Corps commanders in Iraq on counterinsurgency and himself holds an Oxford doctorate in the history of war.

As the U.S.-designed campaign to bring security to Baghdad unfolds, Petraeus's chief economic adviser, Col. Michael J. Meese, will coordinate security and reconstruction efforts, trying to ensure that "build" follows the "clear" and "hold" phases of action. Meese also holds a PhD from Princeton, where he studied how the Army historically handled budget cuts. He is the son of former attorney general Edwin Meese III, who was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose December critique helped push the Bush administration to shift its approach in Baghdad.

Petraeus, who along with the group's members declined to be interviewed for this article, has chosen as his chief adviser on counterinsurgency operations an outspoken officer in the Australian Army. Lt. Col. David Kilcullen holds a PhD in anthropology, for which he studied Islamic extremism in Indonesia.

Kilcullen has served in Cyprus, Papua New Guinea and East Timor and most recently was chief strategist for the State Department's counterterrorism office, lent by the Australian government. His 2006 essay "Twenty-Eight Articles: Fundamentals of Company-Level Counterinsurgency" was read by Petraeus, who sent it rocketing around the Army via e-mail. Among Kilcullen's dictums: "Rank is nothing: talent is everything" -- a subversive thought in an organization as hierarchical as the U.S. military.Veteran Strategists

The two most influential members of the brain trust are likely to be Col. Peter R. Mansoor and Col. H.R. McMaster, whose influence already outstrips their rank. Both men served on a secret panel convened last fall by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to review Iraq strategy. The panel's core conclusion, never released to the public but briefed to President Bush on Dec. 13, according to an officer on the Joint Staff, was that the U.S. government should "go long" in Iraq by shifting from a combat stance to a long-term training-and-advisory effort.

But to make that shift, the review also concluded, the U.S. military might first have to "spike" its presence by about 20,000 to 30,000 troops to curb sectarian violence and improve security in Baghdad. That is almost exactly what the U.S. government hopes to do over the next eight months.

Mansoor, who commanded a brigade of the 1st Armored Division in Baghdad in 2003-04, received a PhD at Ohio State for a dissertation on how U.S. Army infantry divisions were developed during World War II. He will be Petraeus's executive officer in Baghdad, a key figure in implementing the general's decisions.

McMaster's command of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in northwestern Iraq in 2005-06 provided one of the few bright spots for the U.S. military in Iraq over that year. In a patiently executed campaign, he took back the city of Tall Afar from a terrorist group, and he was so successful that Bush dedicated much of a speech to the operation. McMaster, author of the well-received book "Dereliction of Duty," about the failures of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the Vietnam War, is expected to operate for Petraeus as a long-distance adviser on strategy. He is based this year at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London think tank, but is likely to visit Iraq every month or two, according to a top U.S. military officer.

Beyond those senior officers is a larger ring of advisers whose views already are shaping planning for the coming operation in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Douglas A. Ollivant caught Petraeus's eye last year by winning first prize in an Army "counterinsurgency writing" competition, sponsored by the general, with an essay that scorned the U.S. military's reliance in Iraq on big "forward operating bases." "Having a fortress mentality simply isolates the counterinsurgent from the fight," he wrote.

Ollivant, a veteran of battles in Najaf and Fallujah who earned a political science PhD studying Thomas Jefferson, argued that U.S. forces should instead operate from patrol bases shared with Iraqi military and police units. That is exactly what Petraeus plans to do in the coming months in Baghdad, setting up about three dozen such outposts across the city -- which isn't surprising, considering Ollivant has become a top planner for the U.S. military in Baghdad.

Another adviser will be Ahmed S. Hashim, a professor of strategy at the Naval War College who served as a military intelligence officer in Iraq and then wrote a book sharply critical of how the U.S. military has operated there. Hashim, who holds a PhD from MIT, concluded his critique by arguing that the best course would be to partition the country along ethnic and sectarian lines.A Different Arena

Many military insiders are skeptical that the extra brainpower ultimately will make much difference, or that lessons learned by McMaster in Tall Afar or Petraeus in Mosul will be easily applied in the far larger arena of Baghdad.

The joke among some staff officers was that Petraeus operated in such a freewheeling manner in Iraq's north that he had his own foreign policy with Syria and Turkey. In Baghdad, by contrast, he will have to operate constantly with Iraqi officials, with the U.S. government bureaucracy, and in the global media spotlight. Also, experts agree that the basic problem in Iraq is political, not military, and that although a military campaign can create a breathing space for politicians, it cannot by itself reverse the dynamic driving Iraqis to fight a civil war.

"It wouldn't surprise me if Congress pulled the rug out or the Iraqis blocked major revisions in strategy," said Erin M. Simpson, a Harvard University counterinsurgency expert. "I think they're going to be a very frustrated group."

Kilcullen, the counterinsurgency adviser, wrote recently on the Web site Small Wars Journal, "All that the new strategy can do is give us a fighting chance of success, and it certainly does give us that."

Covert British Unit A 'Secret Weapon' In Iraq (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Deep inside the heart of the Green Zone, the heavily fortified administrative compound in Baghdad, lies one of the most carefully guarded secrets of the war in Iraq.

It is a cell from a small and anonymous British army unit that goes by the innocuous name of the Joint Support Group (JSG), and it has proved to be one of the coalition's most effective and deadly weapons in the fight against terror.

Its members -- servicemen and women of all ranks recruited from all three of the British armed forces -- are trained to turn hardened terrorists into coalition spies using methods developed on the streets of Northern Ireland, where the British Army managed to infiltrate the Irish Republican Army (IRA) at almost every level.

Since war broke out in Iraq in 2003, the cell has been responsible for running dozens of Iraqi double agents.

Working alongside the Special Air Service (SAS) and the American Delta Force as part of the Baghdad-based counterterrorist unit known as Task Force Black, the cell members have supplied intelligence that has saved hundreds of lives and resulted in some of the most notable successes against the myriad terror groups fighting in Iraq.

Last week, sources said, intelligence from the JSG led to a series of successful operations against Sunni militia groups in southern Baghdad.

Information obtained by the cell also is understood to have inspired one of the most successful operations carried out by Task Force Black, in November 2005, when SAS snipers fatally shot three would-be suicide bombers.

The killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaeda in Iraq until his death in June, came after intelligence obtained by the JSG, as did the rescue of kidnapped British peace campaigner, Norman Kember.

"The JSG is the coalition's secret weapon," said one defense source. "Their job is to recruit and run covert human intelligence sources or agents -- we never use the term informer. The Americans are in awe of the unit because they have nothing like them within their military."

During the long-running unrest in Northern Ireland, the JSG operated under the cover name of the Force Research Unit (FRU), which from the early 1980s to the late 1990s managed to penetrate the very heart of the IRA.

By targeting and then "turning" members of the paramilitary organization with a variety of "inducements," ranging from blackmail to bribes, the FRU operators developed agents at virtually every command level within the IRA.

The JSG recruits personnel up to age 42. Candidates who get through a rigorous pre-selection process spend four months in Britain being taught driving and close-quarter battle skills.

Most important, volunteers must be able to befriend people they actually may despise, win their trust and persuade them to become agents, which in some cases means getting them to inform on friends and relatives. Those who pass the course can expect to be posted to Iraq and Afghanistan.

JSG operators deal with dozens of Iraqis every week who are prepared, for a variety of reasons, to become informers.

"Some Iraqis come to us because they are simply fed up with the violence," one source said. "They may have had members of their families murdered, tortured or kidnapped.

"Unlike much of the middle class, which has already fled the country, they may be too poor to leave and so they come to us to see if they can make a difference."

To senior U.S. officers in Baghdad, the JSG is playing a vital role in the most important theater of the war on terror.

"In many respects, Afghanistan is a side issue, and that is something the Americans understand better than British politicians," a source said. "Ask any senior officer in Baghdad, given a choice, which war would they be prepared to lose and they will say the war in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0126955

"In many respects, the war in Iraq has redefined insurgent warfare. Think of the very worst of Northern Ireland combined with the very worst of the Balkans and you are coming close to life on a daily basis in Baghdad."

Officer Fights A Battle All His Own (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

Olympia, Wash. — The soldier stands in his living room eyeing all the cool soldier stuff he never got to use in a real fight. Like the helmet with not a single ding and the sleek body armor with not a scuff. The gear piles high on the carpet.

First Lt. Ehren Watada is giving it all back and, out of courtesy, packing it up. The Army had treated him with utmost respect until the moment it decided to court-martial him. It was nothing personal. The Army does what it has to do.

Just like Watada himself did what he felt he had to do seven months ago when he became the first — and only — commissioned officer in the United States to publicly refuse deployment to Iraq.

His conscience, he said, had overtaken him. He told the world what he had privately told his superiors months earlier: that he believed the war was illegal and immoral, and he would play no role in it.

Watada tried to resign; the Army respectfully denied him. He said he was willing to fight in Afghanistan; the Army refused him again: A soldier can't pick and choose where he fights. As his unit shipped off to Iraq, Watada stayed to face the consequences.

Thousands of GIs have gone AWOL or voiced opposition to the Iraq war, but when an officer says he won't go, the whole military machine must take note. It means dissent has crept up the chain of command, potentially undermining the war effort.

The Army felt compelled to respond forcefully, charging Watada, 28, with one count of failure to deploy and four (later reduced to two) counts of "conduct unbecoming" for making public statements against the war and against the Bush administration. His court-martial begins today at Ft. Lewis, 15 miles north of here.

Watada ponders the prospect of spending four years in military prison, and he muses on his spiral from exemplary military man to reviled antiwar poster boy.

"Life has been ... " He laughs nervously and shakes his head, searching for words. "A little abnormal."

His living room, like the rest of the apartment complex, feels boxy and new and unmistakably inexpensive — made for function rather than form. A balcony looks out at a parking lot crowded with pickups and SUVs.

In the middle of the room he stands in stocking feet, wearing baggy fatigues like pajamas, hands on hips. He's deciding where to begin the packing. When all the world seemed chaotic, it made sense to organize. Should he start with his barely mussed chemical suit or his spotless all-weather traction-control camouflage boots?

His smooth brown face is boyish and devoted, like a child inspecting his most precious toys. He's not a small man, but not big either. Certainly not as big as the Rushmore-sized symbol he's become to the antiwar movement, which hails him as nothing less than an American hero.

But he also bears no sign of the sniveling qualities ascribed him by pro-war groups that have branded him a coward. One syndicated columnist posted Watada's Army photo on her website with the caption: "The face of a deserter."

With everyone judging him, he wants to make one thing clear. "I'm not afraid to fight," he says. "I'm not a pacifist. If our country needed defending, I'd be the first one to pick up a rifle. But I won't be part of a war that I believe is criminal."

Watada calls himself "an ordinary American" and a patriot who unwittingly found himself in a moral dilemma he could never have imagined when he first put on a uniform 18 years ago. That's when the story begins, according to his mother, Carolyn Ho, a high school counselor in Honolulu.

It all started because she thought Cub Scout uniforms were cute.

The uniforms also represented wholesome activity. Ho and her then-husband, Bob Watada, wanted to keep their two young sons out of the malls and out of trouble. Ehren was the thoughtful one; his older brother, Lorin, the rambunctious one.

Ehren thrived on the order and discipline, and the little rewards that marked one's ascension up the scouting ranks. "He was the sort who studied for every merit badge possible," Ho says.

Thus Watada's kinship with the uniformed life was born. He went from Cub to Boy to Eagle Scout, and he had an inkling as early as 15 that he would end up in the armed forces. As an Eagle Scout, he got the idea of carving out a hiking trail on a hillside abutting a neighborhood park in Honolulu.

Neighbors privately snickered. Sure, kid. Go ahead. Good luck.

Ho says she still beams whenever she drives past the park today and she spots the trail zigzagging up the hill. That's my son's work, she thinks. It took many months. She'd never doubt his resolve again.

Ho tells one other story. At Kalani High School, where Watada was a four-sport athlete, he reported a fellow football player who had been stealing money from the cafeteria coffer. "He risked ostracism [as a snitch] in a very small, tight-knit community," Ho says. "But he's like that, very principled."

Ho is calling from a hotel in Indiana. Her ex-husband Bob is in a hotel in Washington, D.C. Both parents have spent the last six months speaking at schools and churches across the nation, telling their son's story and lobbying the government to acquit him.

The parents shudder at the thought of their son behind bars. Invariably, both Ho and Bob Watada entertain fleeting misgivings: Maybe joining Cub Scouts was a mistake. Maybe, Bob Watada says, he should have tried harder to persuade his son to simply go to Iraq and "lie low."

Lying low is better than prison.

But there's a counterpart to their parental protectiveness.

Rebecca Davis, head of a Maine-based group called Military Families Voice of Victory, prays every day for her son, Stuart, who is serving in Iraq. Davis has publicly called Watada a traitor. "What he's done," she says," is embolden an enemy who is aiming for my son's head."

Watada, kneeling on the carpet with an arm buried deep in an olive-green duffel, explains his epiphany about the war in Iraq. It was the slo-mo kind, not the brilliant flash of lightning in the night.

The way he tells it, the arc of his realization somewhat followed that of many Americans. That is, he believed at the beginning but grew disillusioned as the justifications for the war proved false and the strategy, flawed.

In 2003, after graduating near the top of his class at Hawaii Pacific University, he walked into a recruiting station in Honolulu and hopscotched from Officer Candidate School to his first tour of duty in Korea, where his superiors rated him exemplary.

His battalion commander, whom Watada won't name so as not to drag him into his predicament, spoke long and often of the paramount importance of preparation.

"He told us, 'If you don't know all there is to know about your mission, you're failing yourself and you're failing your soldiers,' " Watada says, still kneeling. He folds his hands in front of him now and looks vaguely like someone pleading or about to propose. "I took the lesson to heart."

So when he was reassigned to Ft. Lewis in early 2005 in anticipation of deploying to Iraq, he did his job: He got to know everything there was to know about Iraq. He spent nights online, read books, talked to combat veterans, devoured media reports.

At the end of 2005, he was convinced the Bush administration had purposefully manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion and the congressional approval of the war therefore was based on lies.

He said he was so anguished by his conclusion and the knowledge that he would soon be "participating in the madness" that he grew deeply depressed. In December 2005, he sought guidance from a chaplain and a mental-health counselor. Neither helped. He considered filing for conscientious objector status but couldn't in good conscience, he says, because he does not oppose bearing arms.

"I was in this situation where I knew something was wrong," he says, still on his knees, "but I was being forced to do it anyway. It felt like I was in an invisible prison of my own making. It's a terrible place to be."

Then it occurred to him: He'd rather risk the other kind of prison. It would be difficult but ultimately easier to live with. In January 2006, he submitted a letter of resignation, was refused, and the process rolled inexorably to where it is today.

The Army could have chosen to accept Watada's resignation. Court-martialing him, however, sends a clear message to other officers thinking about defying orders to deploy. During a preliminary hearing in August, Army prosecutor Capt. Dan Kuecker called Watada's actions "dishonorable" and "disgraceful."

For his part, Watada doesn't blame the Army as much as he blames the administration. The Army does what it must to function. Military culture has always presumed that individuals lose certain kinds of freedom when joining the armed forces.

"The idea is when you put on a uniform, you put your personal opinions to the side," says Kathleen Duignan, executive director of the National Institute of Military Justice in Washington, D.C. A military could not be effective if soldiers had the option to choose which wars to fight and which to forego.

Duignan says the best known case that parallels Watada's occurred in 1965 during the Vietnam War, when 2nd Lt. Henry Howe was caught participating in an antiwar demonstration. The Army court-martialed Howe and sentenced him to two years of hard labor.

Watada's unit deployed to Iraq last summer. He has been doing administrative work ever since, barred from traveling farther than 250 miles from Ft. Lewis. His life settled into a workaday routine — going to work, coming home to his little apartment and wondering what the future holds.

Standing up, crossing his arms as if in defiance, he says he believes history will absolve him no matter what happens in court this week.

At the base, there have been no blatant acts of hostility. "But, yes," Watada says, "you can feel the seething just underneath."

During what was supposed to be a casual football scrimmage among officers late last year, two majors "accidentally" broke Watada's nose. One major shoved, the other smacked. Watada for weeks walked around with two black eyes, a crooked beak and a sneaking hunch it was no accident.

But what encourages him is how much quiet support he receives from individual soldiers. The support, he says, isn't showy. "Nobody wants any part of me officially," he says, laughing that nervous laugh again. There are the approving nods, the knowing glances, the subtle remarks about hanging in there and keeping the chin up.

"It happens almost every day," Watada says. And it makes him think that maybe, just maybe, a whole lot of other uniformed souls feel the same way he does and just haven't figured out a way to say so.

American Takes Over Command Of NATO Force In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 4 — A senior American officer, Gen. Dan K. McNeill, took over command of the 35,000-member NATO force in Afghanistan from the departing British commander on Sunday, ahead of an expected spring offensive by a resurgent Taliban.

General McNeill inherits a force that has expanded its mission to cover all of Afghanistan and is still struggling to contain the Taliban. Although the group was largely defeated in 2002, it mounted a strong comeback last year, leading to the bloodiest fighting in the country since the beginning of the war in 2001.

The new commander will have some advantages his predecessor did not. He has been promised several thousand extra troops in the south, where much of the violence has been centered, although he will continue to have to work with some NATO countries that are restricting where their troops can be used.

The transfer of command came on a day when NATO forces sent a tough message to the Taliban, using an airstrike to kill a commander whose forces overran a town in southern Afghanistan last week.

General McNeill served as commander of United States-led coalition forces in Afghanistan from 2002 to 2003, long before NATO began to take over operations. He is returning for a one-year tour as commander of the United Nations-mandated International Security Assistance Force, drawn from 37 contributing nations.

His primary mission will be to facilitate the reconstruction of Afghanistan, so that the “Afghan people might enjoy self-determination, education, health, and the peaceful realization of their hopes and dreams,” he told a gathering at the change-of-command ceremony at NATO headquarters in Kabul on Sunday.

"We will quit neither post nor mission until the job is done or we are properly relieved," he said. "We will not leave a fallen comrade."

NATO troops expanded their mission to cover all of Afghanistan in 2006, taking over military operations in the south and absorbing mainly American forces in the east.

The departing NATO commander, Gen. David Richards, said in an interview before the ceremony that he expected a surge of violence as the Taliban prepared to carry out a spring offensive. But he said the NATO force, now reinforced by the extra troops that he repeatedly requested, was well-placed to defeat the Taliban militarily.

But in his speech before several hundred soldiers, diplomats and politicians, including the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, the general warned that full victory in Afghanistan would take more than military success. What was needed beyond that, he said, was more reconstruction and development, a good system of government and improved relations with Pakistan, which Afghanistan has accused of continuing to support the Taliban.

The Taliban warned Sunday that 2007 would be the bloodiest year for foreign troops in Afghanistan, in comments to [a news agency] that were apparently timed to the change of command. And in what may be the opening salvo of a new campaign of violence, gunmen suspected of being Taliban fighters killed two senior Muslim clerics in the southern city of Kandahar: the deputy head of the religious council, Maulavi Sayed Amam Mutawal, and the caretaker of Afghanistan's holiest shrine, Shafi Akhund Zada, Agence France-Presse reported.

General Richards's parting shot was an airstrike on Sunday morning, which occurred just 90 minutes before the change of command. The strike killed a Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, who seized control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand Province on Thursday night and detained local leaders and members of the police.

The precision-guided airstrike killed the commander and 10 of his guards as he was driving in an open area called Ghundai, outside the town, according to residents. There were no other casualties, they said. A NATO spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, confirmed that the strike killed a "key Taliban leader," but he did not provide a name.

In October, the governor of Helmand negotiated a controversial agreement under which British troops within NATO and Taliban forces withdrew from the town, leaving a council of tribal elders in charge.

The agreement, which brought a temporary peace to the town but left the Taliban at large, signaled NATO's search for more conciliatory ways of dealing with the insurgency. The accord was criticized by American officials and members of the Afghan government for giving in to the Taliban, but General Richards and diplomats from other NATO countries defended it as an important step in driving a wedge between the local population and the Taliban and encouraging Afghans to resolve their own security issues.

On Sunday, he praised the courage of the tribal elders for standing up to the Taliban and promised NATO's support.

Despite the Americans' criticism of the agreement, General McNeill said he did not intend to change that strategy and would not risk shedding the blood of British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers in the area if the elders could resolve the issue of the town's control.

General McNeill's appointment, and his previous tour conducting combat operations in Afghanistan, has raised concerns among some NATO countries that he will conduct a more aggressive operation. President Karzai welcomed him as a friend who was "with the Afghan people from the beginning of the war on terror." Yet he is also remembered as the general in charge when two Afghan detainees died from beatings in American custody at Bagram Air Base in December 2002.

General Richards indicated that he doubted that his successor would significantly change the way NATO forces operated. He said that General McNeill would inherit a NATO plan and operation that the 37 contributing nations had signed up for, and that he would be under their orders. "Even if he was inclined to make radical changes, he can't do it easily," he said. "How he implements them on the ground is up to him."

General McNeill is the highest-ranking American to serve in Afghanistan; his previous post was commanding general of the United States Army Forces Command. His appointment is accompanied by a significant increase in troops and resources for Afghanistan.

The Bush administration is asking Congress for $10.6 billion to train and equip the Afghan Army and the police force and for reconstruction. The general will also have under his command the 3,200 American troops whose tour of duty was extended last month and an additional 800 British and 1,000 Polish soldiers, providing him with a vital reserve force for the south and southeastern regions where the insurgency is strongest.

Some 14,000 American soldiers will be under his command within the NATO force in Afghanistan. An additional 11,000 American service members, who are training the Afghan Army and the police and conducting counterterrorism operations, will remain in Afghanistan under American two-star generals.

Under Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the departing commander of American coalition forces, the 14,000 American soldiers have focused on training and working as partners with Afghan forces. They also have taken on operations that are focused as much on reconstruction as on combat.

General Richards said American forces were uniquely capable of combining military and development operations. "They'll have a road coming into a valley the day after they have cleared it out of Taliban," he said.

Other NATO forces have to catch up on combining reconstruction and military operations so that one flows directly from the other and does not allow a vacuum for the Taliban to exploit, General Eikenberry said in a recent interview.

"You can launch your military operation and then look over your shoulder and find that there are going to be extraordinary delays in delivering the nonmilitary means — and you could actually make things worse," he said.

"It's not about thinking how we are going to fight into the area — that can be the relatively easy part of it," he said. The real challenge is to make Afghans feel they are connected to their government, he added.

NATO needs to combine more forces with Afghan forces in strategic places and urgently move forward with reconstruction and nonmilitary assistance if it is to counter the expected Taliban spring offensive, he said.

Musharraf's Stale Promises (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

In the months after Sept. 11, 2001, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf was a new and shaky U.S. ally. He decided to side with the Bush administration against al-Qaeda, but there were persistent reports that elements of his army still supported the Afghan Taliban. He was an autocratic ruler who had seized power in a military coup against a democratic government, but in a televised speech to his nation in January 2002, he promised to turn Pakistan into a tolerant, "moderate Muslim" society. Largely because it had little choice, the Bush administration decided to give him the benefit of the doubt.

Five years later, little in Pakistan has changed. Musharraf is still promising a moderate and tolerant regime -- but there are still reports that his army is quietly helping the Taliban. He's also still promising democracy -- but just as in 2002, he's preparing to rig Pakistan's upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections to ensure that his term is extended and his power unchallenged.

What has changed is the response of the Bush administration. Five years ago it portrayed itself as giving Musharraf a chance to perform. Now it defends and apologizes for the general, despite his chronic failure to deliver.

The most recent example of this came 10 days ago, during a visit to the country by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright. Islamabad was in an uproar over the news that Musharraf intends to seek a new five-year term next fall in a way that most of the country's civilian politicians consider undemocratic and unconstitutional. The other subject of conversation was legislation passed by the Democratic-controlled U.S. House during its "100 hours" blitz. It would condition future aid to the Pakistani military on Bush's certification that Pakistan "is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control."

The House measure, backed by the new Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, California's Tom Lantos, was a logical response to recent reports by U.S. commanders that the Taliban leadership is based in Pakistan and that cross-border movements of insurgents are increasing. But Gastright rushed to assure Musharraf's government that the administration opposed it. "The president can certify that," Gastright said of the Taliban metric without explaining the basis for his confidence. "The issue is, he shouldn't have to."

Gastright went on to endorse what he said were steps by Musharraf to promote press and political freedom ahead of the elections: "That's an impressive track record," the Associated Press quoted him as saying. Then he said the administration was pleased with Musharraf's handling of the greatest criminal proliferator of nuclear weapons in history, A.Q. Khan, who was quickly pardoned in 2004 and then shielded from U.S. or U.N. interrogation. Musharraf had "a superb record addressing the legacy of the A.Q. Khan network," Gastright said.

It's at this point in a column like this that administration officials pop up to point out that the relationship with Musharraf is "complicated," that he has the right intentions and that he needs to be supported as well as urged to do more. Whatever his performance or lack of it, the argument goes, Musharraf is better than the alternatives in Pakistan, which include Islamic extremists and anti-Western generals. It's the same argument that's used to defend continued U.S. pandering to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

In Musharraf's case it's particularly perverse. That's because the second most popular leader in Pakistan behind Musharraf, according to polling by the International Republican Institute, is not an Islamist but former prime minister Benazir Bhutto, the leader of the moderate and pro-Western Pakistan People's Party. Bhutto and her party have made it clear that they would be willing to accept Musharraf in exchange for fair parliamentary elections and an end to criminal charges that keep Bhutto in exile. The PPP and the Muslim League party of former prime minister Nawaz Sharif have formed the Alliance for Restoration of Democracy; they are the obvious partners for a government that genuinely aims to modernize the country and marginalize Islamic extremism.

Only Musharraf refuses to deal with them. His supporters say he intends to extend his mandate by staging a presidential vote by the existing parliament and provincial assemblies -- which make up Pakistan's equivalent of the electoral college -- though they were elected in the rigged balloting of 2002 and their terms expire on the same day as the president's. For that maneuver he won't need Bhutto or Sharif or their parties -- and so he won't have to meet their demands for fair parliamentary elections.

In private, the Bush administration has been urging Musharraf for some time to come to terms with Pakistan's moderate democrats. And they've been asking him for years to stop allowing sanctuary for the Taliban. He's not responding. So what's wrong with congressional conditions? They might just produce what's been missing from Musharraf the past five years: results.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Justice Department Balks At Privacy Provision In Telephone Rules Under Review (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON – Federal regulators working on rules to secure the calling records and other private information of telephone customers are running into resistance from phone companies and law enforcement agencies.

The rules, an effort by the Federal Communications Commission to combat “pretexting,” are circulating among the commissioners for comment and may be voted on this month.

Pretexting is the practice of impersonating a phone customer to gain access to his phone records. President Bush signed a law last month criminalizing the practice and imposing penalties including up to 10 years in prison.

The issue gained prominence last year when executives of the Hewlett-Packard Co. were charged with hiring private detectives who used the technique to investigate board members.

The new law gives police a weapon to punish perpetrators. But it leaves out any requirements for how phone companies should protect their customers' private data. Cell phone bills, for example, can reveal who a person has called and, in some cases, even the caller's location.

The FCC chairman, Kevin Martin, told reporters recently that the new rules will require that customers use a password to access their account information.

While that might protect calling data, telephone companies are wary. They fear a password requirement might upset customers.

AT&T Inc. spokesman Michael Balmoris said the company has to be careful to balance security against customers' wishes for easy access to their information.

DOJ_NMG_0126961

The rules also are expected to require that phone companies get a customer's permission before they can release information that may be used for telemarketing.

Phone companies contend this requirement would violate their First Amendment right to communicate with customers – a position that was backed by a federal court in 1999.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, called that court decision "probably one of the oddest First Amendment cases in many, many years." Since that case, he said courts have been more inclined to support privacy rules.

Phone companies say there is no evidence that information shared with business partners falls into the wrong hands, making the proposed requirement unnecessary.

The departments of Justice and Homeland Security have taken issue with two other possible provisions in the emerging rules, both of which have privacy advocates concerned.

The first would tell phone companies to destroy customer records as soon as the records no longer are needed for legitimate business purposes. The government wants the records preserved for possible use in criminal investigations.

Secondly, the two departments want phone companies to notify law enforcement officials first, before customers, when customers' private billing information has been disclosed improperly.

In written comments to the FCC, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said immediately alerting customers in such cases may tip off investigative targets and lead them to destroy evidence, change their behavior or slip away.

He proposed that companies not tell customers for at least seven business days after notifying the FBI or the Secret Service.

For companies, this would mean they would have to determine, without the benefit of input from their own customers, whether an unauthorized breach had occurred. Companies also have raised questions about how such a notification system would work.

Consumer advocates are concerned a delay may result in more harm than good.

Jeannine Kenney, senior policy analyst with Consumers Union, said customers should learn immediately when someone is delving into their personal information.

"In fact, failing to notify a customer of a breach could impede prevention of actual harm or the commission of another crime," she said.

US Courts To Decide On 'scheme Liability' (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York And Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

US courts are considering on Monday whether to bless a new legal theory thought up by plaintiffs' lawyers that could put banks, lawyers and business partners on the hook for billions of dollars when a public company goes bust because of fraud.

The fifth circuit federal appeals court in New Orleans will take up the issue of "scheme liability" when it hears arguments on whether Enron's shareholders can pursue a class action against Credit Suisse, Merrill Lynch and lawyer Vinson & Elkins.

Banks and lawyers have traditionally been protected by a 1994 Supreme Court decision that says shareholders cannot recover money from firms and people who simply "aided or abetted" securities fraud. But the recent corporate scandals prompted plaintiffs' attorneys and angry investors to look for a way around that rule. They argue that the banks and lawyers participated in a "scheme" to hide Enron's losses from investors and should be held "primarily responsible" for the company's collapse.

Scheme liability "is almost indispensable. There would have been no way to hold the big banks responsible in Enron without scheme liability," said Bill Lerach, the plaintiff's attorney who represents Enron shareholders.

But Greg Markel, a lawyer for banks, warned that the theory "creates uncertainty for financial institutions and that uncertainty increases the costs of doing business."

The trial judge in the Enron case initially agreed with investors, but other US courts have divided in cases involving fraud at Dynegy, Parmalat and HealthSouth. The Securities and Exchange Commission favours a limited form of scheme liability that could increase the number of companies targeted by such lawsuits.

"The scope of scheme liability is the single most important issue being litigated in securities class actions today," says Bob Giuffra, an attorney with Sullivan & Cromwell, which defends companies against securities lawsuits.

The US Supreme Court is also considering whether to hear two scheme liability cases. One includes companies allegedly involved in sham transactions conducted by Homestore, the online estate agents site. The influential ninth circuit federal appeals court found that business partners can be held liable if their transactions with a company had "the principal purpose and effect of creating a false appearance of fact in the fur-ther-ance of a scheme to defraud" even if they did not directly mislead investors.

If that ruling stands, "lawyers will begin naming as defendants all manner of companies [particularly those with 'deep pockets'], merely because they engaged in significant transactions with issuers who allegedly accounted for the transactions fraudulently," claim papers filed by Cendant and Time Warner, targets in the Homestore case.

Hyundai Chairman Is Found Guilty (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- A court here found Hyundai Motor Co. Chairman Chung Mong Koo guilty of embezzlement and fraud, and sentenced him to three years in prison, breaking a pattern of leniency for high-profile executives convicted of white-collar crime.

The decision poses a major leadership problem for Hyundai, the world's No. 6 auto maker by volume, as it faces slower growth and mounting challenges including new competitors from China.

Prosecutors alleged that Mr. Chung took about $100 million from Hyundai and affiliated companies for political payoffs and personal use. They sought a six-year prison sentence. Mr. Chung, who told the court at one point during his trial, "I am guilty to a certain extent," had asked for leniency.

At a hearing where the verdict and sentencing were announced, Seoul Central Court Judge Kim Dong Oh said Mr. Chung engaged in "behavior that goes against market practices." The judge, one of three who listened to the trial and handed down the ruling, said, "It shows there's something wrong in the corporate culture of Korea."

The sentence presents Hyundai with a major quandary: Should it replace Mr. Chung, who is the son of Hyundai's founder and has been depicted for years both inside and outside the company as a near-omnipotent leader? A Hyundai spokesman said the company was "disappointed" and that Mr. Chung will appeal the decision. It said he remains in control of the company.

Mr. Chung is 68 years old, but he has no clear successor. He became chief executive in 1999 and chairman a year later. Mr. Chung's son runs the company's Kia affiliate.

Following his arrest last April and subsequent two-month jail stay, Hyundai canceled plant openings and delayed strategic decisions to show it was less able to function without Mr. Chung.

Hyundai said nothing publicly about preparations it was making in case Mr. Chung received a prison sentence. Company executives last week were privately saying they expected him to receive a financial penalty but no prison time.

Hyundai shares fell about 3% today immediately after the sentence was announced.

Hyundai is grappling with slowing growth in South Korea and the U.S., its two biggest markets. The rising value of the Korean won has eroded the price competitiveness of Hyundai and Kia vehicles overseas.

Bribery scandals have in the past engulfed many Korean executives. The problem is rooted in the country's fast growth in the 1960s and 1970s when Korean businesses were largely controlled by the government and the right political connection would bring capital and market protection.

President's Speech Shows CEO Pay Has Hit The Big Time (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126963

Excessive executive compensation, an issue shareholder activists and labor unions have ridden for years, has suddenly become a hot topic in Washington, D.C.

Lawmakers in both houses of Congress plan to make laws affecting executive pay packages, and a new rule from the Securities and Exchange Commission is forcing companies to provide a simplified summary of top executives' compensation in their public filings. Even President Bush weighed in on the subject last week in New York, exhorting corporate boards to tie CEOs' salaries and bonuses to their success in improving companies and bringing value to shareholders.

"When President Bush talks about CEO pay, you know that it's moving to the top of the national agenda," says Robert Reich, professor of public policy at the University of California at Berkeley and former secretary of labor under President Clinton.

Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, a senior associate dean at the Yale School of Management and a prominent expert on corporate leadership, says the Bush speech represents a tipping point in the debate over executive pay.

"By the time Johnny Carson started to joke about Watergate, Nixon had lost his credibility in all quarters," says Sonnenfeld, author of Firing Back, a book about how CEOs deal with career reversals. "This is no longer seen as an edgy, controversial topic."

Several recent events have helped push CEO pay into the public spotlight:

•Bob Nardelli's $210 million exit package at Home Depot. Nardelli was considered a superstar CEO when Home Depot hired him six years ago, but the stock languished and Home Depot lost market share to Lowe's during his tenure.

"There are certain instances where pay is so excessive and the breach of trust that the board has with shareholders is so terribly broken, it's an outrage," says Rich Ferlauto of the government labor union AFSCME. "Nardelli was the catalyst."

•Virginia Sen. Jim Webb's response to Bush's State of the Union address last month. Webb, a Democrat, said robust corporate earnings disguised that the middle class was falling further behind. Webb noted that the average CEO makes more than 400 times what the average worker makes, and promised congressional action on the topic.

"Somebody in the White House noticed that he upstaged the president," says Damon Silvers of the AFL-CIO.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., the new chair of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a bill this spring that would require companies to allow shareholders to vote on CEO pay packages in proxy votes, a system in place in the U.K.

"You can count on that bill coming to the floor of the House and passing," he says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Set To Begin A Vast Expansion Of DNA Sampling (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

The Justice Department is completing rules to allow the collection of DNA from most people arrested or detained by federal authorities, a vast expansion of DNA gathering that will include hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants, by far the largest group affected.

The new forensic DNA sampling was authorized by Congress in a little-noticed amendment to a January 2006 renewal of the Violence Against Women Act, which provides protections and assistance for victims of sexual crimes. The amendment permits DNA collecting from anyone under criminal arrest by federal authorities, and also from illegal immigrants detained by federal agents.

Over the last year, the Justice Department has been conducting an internal review and consulting with other agencies to prepare regulations to carry out the law.

The goal, justice officials said, is to make the practice of DNA sampling as routine as fingerprinting for anyone detained by federal agents, including illegal immigrants. Until now, federal authorities have taken DNA samples only from convicted felons.

The law has strong support from crime victims' organizations and some women's groups, who say it will help law enforcement identify sexual predators and also detect dangerous criminals among illegal immigrants.

"Obviously, the bigger the DNA database, the better," said Lynn Parrish, the spokeswoman for the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network, based in Washington. "If this had been implemented years ago, it could have prevented many crimes. Rapists are generalists. They don't just rape, they also murder."

Peter Neufeld, a lawyer who is a co-director of the Innocence Project, which has exonerated dozens of prison inmates using DNA evidence, said the government was overreaching by seeking to apply DNA sampling as universally as fingerprinting.

"Whereas fingerprints merely identify the person who left them," Mr. Neufeld said, "DNA profiles have the potential to reveal our physical diseases and mental disorders. It becomes intrusive when the government begins to mine our most intimate matters."

Immigration lawyers said they did not learn of the measure when it passed last year and were dismayed by its sweeping scope.

"This has taken us by storm," said Deborah Notkin, a lawyer who was president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association last year. "It's so broad, it's scary. It is a terrible thing to do because people are sometimes detained erroneously in the immigration system."

Immigration lawyers noted that most immigration violations, including those committed when people enter the country illegally, are civil, not criminal, offenses. They warned that the new law would make it difficult for immigrants to remove their DNA profiles from the federal database, even if they were never found to have committed any serious violation or crime.

Under the new law, DNA samples would be taken from any illegal immigrants who are detained and would normally be fingerprinted, justice officials said. Last year federal customs, Border Patrol and immigration agents detained more than 1.2 million immigrants, the majority of them at the border with Mexico. About 238,000 of those immigrants were detained in immigration enforcement investigations. A great majority of all immigration detainees were fingerprinted, immigration officials said. About 102,000 people were arrested on federal charges not related to immigration in 2005.

While the proposed rules have not been finished, justice officials said they were certain to bring a huge new workload for the F.B.I. laboratory that logs, analyzes and stores federal DNA samples. Federal Bureau of Investigation officials said they anticipated an increase ranging from 250,000 to as many as 1 million samples a year.

The laboratory currently receives about 96,000 samples a year, said Robert Fram, chief of the agency's Scientific Analysis Section.

DNA would not be taken from legal immigrants who are stopped briefly by the authorities, justice officials said, or from legal residents who are detained on noncriminal immigration violations.

"What this does is move the DNA collection to the arrest stage," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman. "The general approach," he said, "is to bring the collection of DNA samples into alignment with current federal fingerprint collection practices." He said the department was "moving forward aggressively" to issue proposed regulations.

The 2006 amendment was sponsored by two border state Republicans, Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona and Senator John Cornyn of Texas. In an interview, Mr. Kyl said the measure was broadly drawn to encompass illegal immigrants as well as Americans arrested for federal crimes. He said that 13 percent of illegal immigrants detained in Arizona last year had criminal records.

"Some of these are very bad people," Mr. Kyl said. "The number of sexual assaults committed by illegal immigrants is astonishing. Right now there is a fingerprint system in use, but it is not as thorough as it could be."

Ms. Parrish, of the rape victims' organization, pointed to the case of Angel Resendiz, a Mexican immigrant who was known as the Railroad Killer. Starting in 1997, Mr. Resendiz committed at least 15 murders and numerous rapes in the United States. Over the years of his rampage, Mr. Resendiz was deported 17 times. He was executed in Texas in June.

"That was 17 missed opportunities to collect his DNA," Ms. Parrish said. "If he had been identified as the perpetrator of the first rapes, it would have prevented later ones."

Immigration lawyers said the DNA sampling could tar illegal immigrants with a criminal stigma, even though most of them have never committed any criminal offense.

"To equate somebody with a possible immigration violation in the same category as a suspected sex offender is an outrage," said David Leopold, an immigration lawyer who practices in Cleveland.

DOJ_NMG_0126965

Forensic DNA is culled either from a tiny blood sample taken from a fingertip (the F.B.I.'s preferred method) or from a swab of the inside of the mouth. Federal samples are logged into the F.B.I.'s laboratory, analyzed and transformed into profiles that can be read by computer. The profiles are loaded into a database called the National DNA Index System.

The F.B.I. also loads DNA profiles from local and state police into the federal database and runs searches. Only seven states now collect DNA from suspects when they are arrested; of those, only two states are authorized by their laws to send those samples to the federal database.

Mr. Neufeld, of the Innocence Project, said his group supported broad DNA collection from convicted criminals. But, he said, "There is no demonstrable nexus between being detained for an immigration matter and the likelihood you are going to commit some serious violent crime."

The DNA amendment has divided women's groups that are usually unified supporters of the Violence Against Women Act, which was adopted in 1994.

"We were stunned by the extraordinary, broad sweep of this amendment," said Lisalyn Jacobs, vice president for government relations at Legal Momentum, a law group founded by the National Organization for Women. Ms. Jacobs recalled that the amendment had been adopted by a voice vote with little debate. She said many lawmakers eager to renew the act, which enjoys solid bipartisan support, appeared unaware of the scope of the DNA amendment.

"The pervasive problems of profiling in the United States will only be exacerbated by such a system," Ms. Jacobs said, because Latino and other immigrants will be greatly over-represented in the database. She noted that the law required a court order to remove a profile from the system.

Many groups warned that the measure would compound already severe backlogs in the F.B.I.'s DNA processing. Mr. Fram of the F.B.I. said there had been an enormous increase in the samples coming to the databank since it started to operate in 1998, but no new resources for the bureau's laboratory. Currently about 150,000 DNA samples from convicted criminals are waiting to be processed and loaded into the national database, Mr. Fram said.

He said the laboratory had added robot technology to speed the processing. But in the "worst case scenario," where the laboratory receives one million new samples a year, Mr. Fram said, "there is going to be a bottleneck."

Leak Case Hangs On Credibility (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's defense in his perjury trial rests largely on the claim that he was too busy with pressing affairs of state to recall minor events such as conversations with reporters about an obscure CIA employee.

But after nine government witnesses testified in federal court here over the last two weeks, a question is starting to emerge: Given all the time and attention the White House devoted in 2003 to CIA operative Valerie Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, how credible is Libby's apparent forgetfulness?

Libby, 56, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, is charged with obstructing a federal investigation into how the identity of Plame became public in the summer of 2003.

Wilson's public criticism of the justifications for the Iraq war spawned what the trial has shown to be a concerted effort by Cheney's office to discredit him. Prosecutors allege that as the administration pushed back, Plame became caught in the crossfire and was exposed.

Libby's lead lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., has painted a defense in broad strokes, portraying Libby as a senior official immersed in life-and-death national security issues who may have been the scapegoat in a White House cover-up.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, by contrast, has been methodically building a narrowly focused case that in large part is being made through the testimony of past and present Bush administration insiders.

That has resulted in a rare inside glimpse into how the White House mobilizes against critics, including an account of how, contrary to claims it made at the time, Cheney's public-relations machinery was operating full-throttle to rebut the questions Wilson was raising about Iraq's supposed nuclear weapons capabilities.

Experts said the fact that Cheney's office was attaching such importance to the issue suggests it was the sort of thing that would not be easily forgotten.

The government case "turns on showing that the need to link Wilson to the CIA was a high priority for Libby and the kind of thing that he would not forget about and that he would not want to be candid to investigators about," said Daniel Richman, a former federal prosecutor and a professor at Fordham law school. "The government has been making a strong case for that."

Legal experts cautioned against reading too much into what the jury might be thinking at this stage of the trial because Libby's lawyers have yet to present their case. And for the prosecution, proving that a senior government official intentionally lied is no easy matter.

Also, some of the government's witnesses have demonstrated memory problems of their own, potentially bolstering Libby's faulty memory defense.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged under cross-examination last week that when she first appeared before the grand jury she did not remember the first time Libby gave her information about Plame. She said her memory was refreshed after she found a notebook in her office.

The closest thing to a smoking gun in the case so far are handwritten notes taken by Libby during a phone conversation with Cheney on June 12, 2003. Cheney told Libby, according to the notes, that Wilson's wife was a counter-proliferation specialist at the CIA.

Libby has acknowledged taking the notes, but has said he had forgotten that Cheney had passed him the tip by the time he started talking with reporters about Wilson a few weeks later. He has told investigators that he believed he first learned about Plame from the reporters; prosecutors say Libby lied out of concern that he could be charged with leaking classified information.

Trial testimony has indicated that other officials also discussed Plame's secret resume with Libby around the time he was speaking with Cheney. They include a high-ranking State Department official, a top spymaster from the CIA and Libby's morning intelligence briefer.

With those witnesses having no apparent motive to lie, legal experts say, their testimony threatens to undercut Libby's memory defense as his lawyers prepare to put on their case starting Wednesday. They say the cumulative effect of witnesses saying they were engaged with Libby on the subject earlier than when he has said he first learned about Plame could be a challenge the defense.

"Either these witnesses are wrong in their recollections or Libby will need to convince [the jury] that he simply forgot these multiple conversations," said Daniel French, a former federal prosecutor who represents a potential witness in the trial. "I think that could be problematic" for Libby.

Jeffrey Frederick, a Charlottesville, Va., jury consultant, said: "What the government had to do was show that this was not a one conversation gig. I think they are doing a very good job of nailing that down."

Testimony in the case has showed that Cheney was dictating talking points to rebut Wilson, while his public-relations handlers weighed strategic leaks to friendly reporters, among other moves.

Libby was the apparent lieutenant in the counter-offensive, and he seemed to get his marching orders in the June 12 phone conversation with Cheney that included the reference to Plame.

According to the notes from that conversation, Wilson was saying that Cheney's office had expressed strong interest in the notion that Iraq had sought weapons-grade uranium in Africa. Libby jotted down in the margin the orders he received from Cheney to "get agency to answer that."

Libby subsequently made a number of inquiries to senior State Department and CIA officials about Wilson and an agency-sponsored fact-finding trip he'd made to Africa in 2002.

The top CIA expert on Iraq, Robert Grenier, testified that Libby had him pulled out of a meeting with then-director George J. Tenet to discuss the issue in a phone call.

Former State Department undersecretary Marc Grossman said he also felt a sense of urgency when Libby called him, after which he promptly commissioned an internal intelligence analysis.

Both Grenier and Grossman testified that they promptly reported back to Libby with information about Wilson and the trip — and the fact that his wife was a CIA employee.

DOJ_NMG_0126967

After Wilson went public with his criticism in a July 6 op-ed in the New York Times, saying he'd found no evidence of Iraq seeking nuclear material in Niger, Libby promptly passed on information about Wilson's wife, prosecutors allege.

Former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer testified that, on the following day, Libby offered the information to him on "the QT" over lunch at the White House mess. Miller testified that Libby told him about Wilson's wife the next day, a Tuesday.

Libby told the grand jury that he did not learn Plame's identity until the following Thursday, July 10, in a conversation with journalist Tim Russert, the moderator of the NBC's "Meet the Press." Libby has said he was surprised to hear the information from the newsman.

Russert, who is scheduled to testify for the government today or Tuesday, has denied that he gave Plame's identity to Libby.

Fitzgerald, in his opening statement to the jury last month, commented on the apparent contradiction. "You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you are giving out on Monday and Tuesday," he said.

The Big Uneasy (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Like an awkward cocktail party where the guests know each other too well and don't always get along, the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has brought the capital's government celebs and media players back together in the close quarters of one Washington courthouse.

Maybe too close.

It's a sometimes genial and sometimes strained reunion -- with hearty backslapping as well as forced smiles and uncomfortable silences, but without the canapes and cocktails to lighten the mood. Against the grim backdrop of whether Vice President Cheney's right-hand man had lied about blowing a CIA officer's cover, witnesses called to the stand, their prominent attorneys and reporters covering the criminal case all try to exchange pleasantries in courthouse hallways while they tend to their intersecting duties.

Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, during a break in his testimony for the prosecution, makes small talk about his kids with reporters who once tried to pin him down on assertions the administration used faulty intelligence to justify a war.

During a recess, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. beams as he introduces Libby to Mike Espy, a Clinton administration agriculture secretary he helped out of a different jam.

In this slice of Washington, courtroom spectators, witnesses, lawyers -- even the judge -- have been the subjects, sources or authors of interconnected news stories.

Max Frankel, former executive editor of the New York Times and supervisor of reporter Judith Miller, a prosecution witness, is writing about the case, as are two former colleagues at the paper that ultimately questioned some of her reporting on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. John Dickerson, a former Time magazine reporter, is writing about the testimony of his former colleague, Matthew Cooper.

Finally, a Newsweek reporter is old chums with one of the jurors. "I obviously did a double take when I saw him on the jury," said Newsweek's Michael Isikoff, who is also the co-author of a book about the administration's claims for justifying war with Iraq, the backdrop for the Libby case. "This whole thing reminds me of high school."

Like high school, some people just don't want to be here.

The best illustration may be Cooper, who grabbed a quick lunch last week in the courthouse cafeteria before returning to the witness chair to be questioned about his confidential phone conversation with Libby. The normally chatty scribe and amateur comedian wore a pasted-on smile and moved past the grill and salad bar as if picking his way through a minefield. He silently nodded at his buddies in the Washington press corps, then sidestepped them without chitchat.

His most forthcoming remark? "Oh. Hi."

An intensely private and surprisingly tall David Addington, the legal mastermind behind President Bush's expansive executive powers, slunk through the hall with head down to avoid human interaction. Nearly every reporter in the building would have loved to interview him; alas, he was questioned on the stand about subpoenas he received as Cheney's counsel -- and often mumbled.

In some cases, the participants' past dealings with one another have left a sour taste.

CIA former associate deputy director Robert Grenier averted his glance from the defense table where Libby sat as he joined the ranks of witnesses helping the prosecution paint Libby as a liar who tried to conceal his bosses' efforts to silence a war critic. Grenier's agency had repeatedly taken a beating from Cheney and Libby in the run-up to the Iraq war, with Cheney deriding the spooks as incompetent in finding evidence that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

With such odd intersections, the trial sometimes provides "Alice in Wonderland" moments. Dickerson, who is covering the trial for Slate, an online magazine, was in court scribbling notes last week when his picture was flashed on a courtroom screen. It was a glamour shot from his book jacket. Defense attorney William Jeffress Jr. implied that Dickerson -- not Libby -- told other reporters about the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Dickerson was also in court when he heard Fleischer allege that he shared that information with Dickerson, though Dickerson remembers the conversation differently. Dickerson wrote a story that day about their conflicting accounts.

"It was all very surreal," he said.

The CIA Leak: Boring In On The Veep (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

The Scooter Libby trial has put a new focus on Vice President Dick Cheney's own role in the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson's identity. When the CIA on July 11, 2003, sent over a draft statement taking responsibility for President George W. Bush's inaccurate assertion that Iraq had sought uranium from Africa, Cheney wrote on the cover sheet "Unsatisfactory" and underlined the word, according to a trial document. The veep thought the agency wasn't going far enough in distancing Cheney's office from the trip by Joseph Wilson (in which the ex-ambassador claimed he'd debunked the uranium shopping reports). "The vice president was frustrated and upset," Libby told the FBI, according to Deborah Bond, an FBI agent who later questioned Libby on the leak.

The next day, aboard Air Force Two, Libby and Cheney talked media strategy, Bond said. "There was some discussion ... about whether they should report to the press that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA," Bond testified that Libby told her. Bond added that Libby said "they may have talked about it." This is the first suggestion that Cheney himself talked about disclosing Wilson's wife's identity to the press as a way of undercutting Wilson's credibility.

After the talk on the plane, Libby at Cheney's direction began making phone calls to reporters. One of them, Matt Cooper, testified that Libby confirmed to him (he'd heard it from Karl Rove) that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Former New York Times reporter Judy Miller testified that Libby mentioned Wilson's wife to her that day (as in two previous talks). The new testimony could make things more awkward for Cheney, due to be called as a defense witness soon. Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to wrap up his case with Tim Russert (likely to deny Libby's grand-jury testimony that Russert told him about Plame's CIA job). The defense may call reporters—including columnist Robert Novak—to say Libby never told them about Plame.

Pulling The Curtain (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

The perjury trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former right-hand man won't go down in history as the turning point in the collapse of the Bush administration's once powerful control over its Iraq message. That milestone has long since passed.

But testimony by an all-star parade of witnesses in Lewis "Scooter" Libby's federal trial will make a fascinating footnote-with details about the usually secret and occasionally inept workings of a wartime White House and the reporters who cover it.

Libby is on trial in Washington for allegedly lying to a grand jury and FBI agents investigating whether administration officials illegally leaked to the media the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame in an effort to undermine the credibility of her husband, war critic Joseph Wilson. No one has been indicted for revealing her name, but Libby was charged with obstructing justice and perjury for discrepancies between his account and that of other witnesses about how he learned of the now former CIA operative and when he took that information to reporters.

The trial, which continues this week, has laid bare some of the capital's most peculiar tribal rituals. The jury has seen Libby's handwritten notes on the administration's plan to discredit Wilson, who, after a CIA-sponsored trip to Africa, wrote a New York Times piece disputing one of President Bush's arguments for going to war-that Iraq was attempting to buy uranium ore from Niger. Jurors heard former New York Times reporter Judith Miller's pricelessly convoluted, but largely accurate, explanation of how many journalists and their sources negotiate information-from "on the record" and "background" to "deep background" and beyond. And those jurors learned how far administration apparatchiks will go to protect themselves.

Libby, Cheney's powerful former chief of staff, walked a tortured path to Judge Reggie Walton's chambers in U.S. District Court. It all started in summer 2003, when the White House was in high dudgeon over Wilson's assertions. Libby's meeting notes say that staffers were agitated that the former ambassador's claims were topping news reports and undermining the president's "trustworthiness." Top Bush aide Karl Rove, Libby wrote, bemoaned that Wilson had been accepted as "a credible expert."

Coddling. A pushback was hatched, and on a list of national journalists to be coddled, according to testimony by Cheney's communications director, was Miller, a controversial veteran Times reporter who had written extensively about weapons of mass destruction in the run-up to the war. Miller has since become a lightning rod; much of her prewar reporting has been discredited, and she has been criticized for being too cozy with the administration, including Libby, and thus helping it make the case for war.

Though Miller, who has since resigned from the Times, never wrote about Plame, she became a cause célèbre in 2005 when she spent 85 days in jail for refusing to reveal to the grand jury that Libby gave her information about Wilson's wife. Miller was released, and agreed to testify, after Libby sent a note permitting her to disclose his identity. Her incarceration raised profound questions about the sanctity of reporter-source interactions and reinvigorated the ongoing debate about whether, in the public interest, such relationships deserve protection.

Miller was among a half-dozen witnesses last week-including former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer-who contradicted Libby's claim that he learned about Plame from NBC's Tim Russert during a July 10, 2003, conversation. Miller testified that Libby mentioned Plame to her in two meetings and a phone call that predated July 10.

Before the prosecution rests this week, it will question Russert, who has denied Libby's claim they spoke about Plame. Libby's lawyers will press their case that the administration made their client a Plamegate scapegoat to protect the powerful Rove. But this case isn't about scapegoating or leaks. It's about whether Libby told the truth under oath. After last week, that may be a difficult sell.

Johnson Backs Away From Official (WP)

By Cheryl W. Thompson And Martin Weil

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson distanced himself yesterday from Keith A. Washington, the county homeland security official and police officer who shot two men during an altercation at his Accokeek home. One of the two men has died, and the matter is under investigation.

Johnson said the relationship between him and Washington -- who had backed Johnson for office and once served as his driver -- is not one of personal friendship. He also said he did not believe Washington, a police corporal, should resume his homeland security post -- a job to which Johnson had appointed him.

"I don't think he should come back to Homeland Security, no matter what happens," Johnson told a reporter yesterday.

Johnson did not give reasons but said he believed Washington should return to the police department, which pays his salary.

It was not clear yesterday whether Washington could remain in the security post without the support of Johnson, who appointed him. Washington did not return calls last night.

Yesterday's telephone interview with a reporter was the most detailed account Johnson has provided of his position on the Jan. 24 shooting incident and his association with Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0126970

Washington was appointed a deputy director of homeland security by Johnson in 2004. He is a longtime Johnson supporter who worked at one time as his driver.

He was one of few county police officers to support Johnson, who as state's attorney had focused on combating abuses by police.

Johnson and Washington belong to the same collegiate fraternity, and Washington has indicated that the two were close. Johnson said yesterday that the men's relationship has been misconstrued and would not affect the probe of the incident.

"Even if we were friends," Johnson said, "I wouldn't interfere" in the investigation of the shooting.

Washington, a 16-year police officer, has been on paid administrative leave since the night he shot unarmed deliverymen Brandon D. Clark, 22, and Robert White, 36.

The two were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were wounded during an altercation. Clark, who lived in Oxon Hill, died Friday at Prince George's Hospital Center. White, a District resident, has been in critical condition there.

Critics have described Washington as prone to losing his temper. Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have said little while the investigation has proceeded but have previously said he apparently acted in self-defense.

In the interview yesterday, Johnson depicted what he said was his relationship with Washington.

"I don't call him. He doesn't call me. My relationship with him is a professional one." Johnson, who is in his second term as county executive, said he has found that people often mischaracterize their relationships with him.

Johnson said that he and Washington are friendly when they see each other and that on the campaign trail they might have stopped to share a bite. But he said, "we are not friends."

The two do not socialize, and "I have never had dinner, lunch or anything else with him," Johnson said.

Washington was not his confidant, Johnson added.

"I am the county executive," Johnson said. "I am not going to be talking about business with my driver. We talk about sports."

Johnson said he has not contacted the families of those involved in the shooting.

"I'm just going to wait," he said.

But, he said, "my heart goes out to everybody."

Little information has been released about the circumstances of the shooting.

"I don't know what went on in that house," Johnson said yesterday. "Whatever went on, it's a huge tragedy. I'm devastated."

When he named Washington to the homeland security job, Johnson said the Army veteran would ensure that the office "provides the protection and required services that the county needs."

Johnson did not elaborate yesterday on why he believed that Washington should not continue in the post, which Johnson said involved serving as a liaison with the police.

But he said Washington should return to the police department. "That's where he should go back to."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Civil Rights-era Killers Escape Justice (USAT)

By Jerry Mitchell The (jackson, Miss.) Clarion-ledger

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Despite high-profile arrests, death is claiming potential witnesses — and many crimes were never probed

JACKSON, Miss. — Despite high-profile convictions in the past two decades, most killers from the civil rights era will go unpunished.

Many of the murder cases from 1954 to 1968, the years that bracket the height of the civil rights movement, were not investigated or were given only cursory attention, leaving authorities little to work with today. Now the window of time is closing. Death is claiming potential defendants and witnesses.

"In nearly all these cases, there was no investigation at the time, and without an investigation, I don't think you have any ability to prosecute these crimes," said Don Cochran, professor at Cumberland School of Law in Birmingham, Ala., who, in 2002, helped successfully prosecute Bobby Cherry, then 71, for the 1963 Birmingham church bombing that killed four girls.

James Seale's arrest Jan. 24 on kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction and killings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore — two of the 40 names listed on the National Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, Ala. — is certain to be one of the last because suspects are dying, former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones of Birmingham said. Seale, 71, suffers from cancer.

Jones led the prosecution that convicted Thomas Blanton, then 62, in 2001 in the Birmingham church bombing case and that won Cherry's conviction.

Since 1989, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era and made 28 arrests that led to 22 convictions. The latest was the 2005 conviction of Edgar Ray Killen, then 80, for orchestrating the 1964 slayings of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney.

Just how many people died during that period is uncertain. Next to the National Civil Rights Memorial is the Civil Rights Memorial Center, where 86 additional names appear on a wall dedicated to the "forgotten others."

Johnnie Mae Chappell, a mother of 10, is one of those honored on the wall. She was killed March 23, 1964. She had bought ice cream earlier for her children and was looking for her missing billfold along a road in Jacksonville when she was shot from a car with four white men. Her admitted killer went to prison for three years; charges were dropped against three other suspects.

The plaque on the wall also says: "The names of all those who lost their lives to racial violence during the civil rights movement will never be known. The media often paid little attention to the death of black people. Many murders were never fully investigated."

Retired FBI agent Jim Ingram said he and other agents investigating racial violence in Mississippi in the 1960s often ran into hostile neighbors, frightened witnesses, reluctant prosecutors and all-white juries, many of whom refused to convict in these crimes.

Working for the New Orleans Times-Picayune, veteran reporter Bill Minor was one of the journalists in Mississippi willing to shed light on these crimes.

"The bias permeated the entire journalistic apparatus back then," he said. "It was not only unpopular, it was unsafe to pursue civil rights stories."

Minor said he traveled to Poplarville, Miss., in 1959 to investigate the lynching of Mack Charles Parker, who was dragged from his jail cell and killed by a white mob.

In town, Minor spotted friends he knew. "They wouldn't come across the street for fear of being seen with me," he said.

The FBI investigated the killing, determined who the mob members were and turned the case over to state authorities, who refused to prosecute.

Minor eventually learned the names of those supposedly involved. The last of those suspects died a few years ago, he said.

Little is known about most of the "forgotten others" listed on the wall of the Civil Rights Memorial Center, said Penny Weaver of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which built the center.

Ellie Dahmer said these forgotten killings still should be investigated and prosecuted, if possible. "If they can find out who did it, I don't care how old they are, I think they should go to prison," she said. "Just think about the poor people that didn't get a chance to get old."

Dahmer watched her husband, Vernon, die in a hospital in 1966 after defending his family from an attack by Klansmen. It wasn't until 1998 that Sam Bowers went to prison for ordering the killing. On Nov. 5, 2006, Bowers died behind bars at 82.

U.S. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., believes there is bipartisan support in Congress for the Unsolved Civil Rights Crimes Act that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down evidence in the unpunished killings.

By creating such a unit to punish these pre-1970 crimes, he said, "we are saying that historical context is no excuse for brutality in America, and we are reclaiming our integrity as a nation by doing what we can to right these wrongs today."

The 2005 investigation of the 1967 slaying of Wharlest Jackson shows how hard success is becoming. After Jackson was promoted into a "whites-only" job in Natchez, Miss., a bomb with a timer placed underneath his truck exploded, killing him. Last year, FBI agents concluded all of those involved in the bombing are dead.

After nearly three decades of waiting, Myrlie Evers-Williams, the widow of NAACP leader Medgar Evers, saw her late husband's killer convicted in 1994 and sentenced to life in prison. Byron De La Beckwith died in 2001 at 80.

"The issue goes beyond the murderers being brought to justice," she said. "These 'forgotten others' should never be forgotten. They and so many like them were the unsung heroes of the movement. Without them, there would have been no movement."

Gary Tyler's Lost Decades (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Destrehan, La.

The term "time warp" could have been coined for this rural town of 11,000 residents that sits beside, and just a little below, the Mississippi River. A remnant of the sugar-plantation era, the region's racially troubled past is always here, seldom spoken about but inescapable, like the murk in the air of a perpetually stalled weather front.

The Harry Hurst Middle School is on the site of the old Destrehan High School, which was the scene of violent protests during the integration period of the 1970s. Local residents have tried to blot out the murder case that made Destrehan High notorious three decades ago, but there's a big problem with that collective effort to forget. The black teenager who was railroaded into prison (and almost into the electric chair) for the murder of a white student in 1974 is still in prison all these many years later. He's middle-aged now, still suffering through a life sentence without any chance for parole in the notorious state penitentiary at Angola.

There is no longer any doubt that the case against the teenager, Gary Tyler, was a travesty. A federal appeals court ruled unequivocally that he did not receive a fair trial. The Louisiana Board of Pardons issued rulings on three occasions that would have allowed Mr. Tyler to be freed.

But this is the South and Mr. Tyler was a black person convicted of killing a white. It didn't matter that the case was built on bogus evidence and coerced witnesses, or that the trial was, in the words of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, "fundamentally unfair." Mr. Tyler was never given a new trial and the pardon board recommendations were rejected by two governors.

(Lurking in the background as the case unfolded was David Duke, a former grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan who was very active politically in Louisiana and always ready to inject his poison into the public issues of the day. If you drive around Destrehan and nearby communities today you will still see some of the old blue-and-white campaign signs for Duke.)

Mr. Tyler, a sophomore at Destrehan High, was on a bus filled with black students that was attacked on Oct. 7, 1974, by a white mob enraged over school integration. A shot was fired and a 13-year-old white boy standing outside the bus collapsed, mortally wounded. Mr. Tyler was arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace after he talked back to a sheriff's deputy.

Although the bus and its passengers were searched and no weapon was found, Mr. Tyler was taken into custody, savagely beaten and accused of committing the murder. A gun was "found" during a subsequent search of the bus and witnesses were rounded up to testify against Mr. Tyler. It turned out that the gun (which has since disappeared) had been stolen from a firing range used by officers of the sheriff's department. All of the witnesses who fingered Mr. Tyler would eventually recant, saying they had been terrorized into testifying falsely by the authorities.

Mr. Tyler was represented at trial by a white sole practitioner who had never handled a murder case, much less a death penalty case. He kept his meetings with his client to a minimum and would later complain about the money he was paid.

The outcome was predictable. Mr. Tyler was convicted and sentenced to die in the electric chair by an all-white jury. At 17, he was the youngest prisoner on death row in the country. He almost certainly would have been executed if the U.S. Supreme Court had not ruled the Louisiana death penalty unconstitutional.

The Fifth Circuit ruling in 1981 said that an improper charge to the jury had denied Mr. Tyler the presumption of innocence at his trial. “It is folly,” the court said, “to argue that the erroneous charge did not affect the central determination of guilt or innocence.”

What was folly was any expectation that Mr. Tyler would be treated fairly at any point. Despite the appeals court ruling, he was denied a new trial on a technicality.

Now consider this, because it will tell you all you need to know about racial justice in the South. A 19-year-old black man named Richard Dunn was shotgunned to death as he was heading home from a benefit dance in support of Mr. Tyler at Southern University in New Orleans in 1976. A white man, Anthony Mart, was arrested and convicted of shooting Mr. Dunn from a passing car.

Gary Tyler’s current attorney, Mary Howell, ruefully explained what happened to Mr. Mart for the cold-blooded killing of a black stranger: He was sent to prison for life but was pardoned and freed after serving about 10 years.

Bush's Double Standard On Race In Schools (CSM)

By Alec Ian Gershberg And Darrick Hamilton

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

The Supreme Court is considering two school desegregation cases that will probably result in limits on the use of race as a criterion for admission to public elementary and high schools.

Not surprisingly, the Bush administration is supporting the plaintiffs' arguments that the use of such racial criteria is unconstitutional. It was no doubt delighted to hear Justice Anthony Kennedy say during oral arguments that "characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort."

But Bush officials are being inconsistent. They don't apply that standard to their own public education policies. It's time they embraced the premise of their own student testing rules – race matters – and support efforts to promote access and diversity in schools.

The No Child Left Behind (NCLB) law, is remarkable because it deals with racial issues in a manner at odds with nearly every other policy advocated by the Bush administration – including its current argument to the Supreme Court that school desegregation plans must be "race neutral." NCLB requires that schools show adequate progress in each of 10 "subgroups" of students. These subgroups include nonracial categories such as disabled, poor, and limited English proficient students, as well as racial and ethnic categories such as blacks, Hispanics, Asians, native Americans, and whites.

We applaud the intent behind such policies to support students who, as a group, tend to have subpar academic performance. But the policy rests on flawed assumptions about the use of such tests to determine which students are being taught well. It also creates perverse incentives potentially harmful to the groups the policy intends to help and raises thorny philosophical issues about race.

Given the diversity of the way schools are organized, current research casts strong doubts on the ability of such tests to consistently evaluate a school's progress. Worse, testing tools get less reliable when disaggregated by the subgroups of concern in NCLB. In particular, small schools and schools with relatively small groups of different kinds of students pose nearly intractable statistical problems.

For instance, Midwood High School in Brooklyn, N.Y., got flagged because the scores of 33 disabled students (out of more than 3,700 total) did not improve. But statistically it is almost impossible to determine that the school is not teaching these students well. Another flaw in NCLB, pointed out by President Bush's brother, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is that it does not track individual students over time. The difference in how schools are evaluated, using exactly the same tests, can be quite dramatic. For example, R.J. Longstreet Elementary School in Daytona Beach, Fla., failed under NCLB for four years, but got A's for five years in a row in Jeb Bush's program, which does track individual students over time. So to a school that George W. Bush gives an "F," Jeb Bush gives an "A"!

While we support policies aimed at addressing educational inequities, we are concerned by the perverse incentives that stem from NCLB's racialization of academic standards. At best, school staff must now view all their students through an explicitly racial lens. At worst, shrewd principals, understanding that their organizations' survival is so dependent on the average test scores of certain students, have an incentive to exclude these underperforming subgroups. Moreover, a Supreme Court decision to end the use of race in admissions can aid in this exclusion. Bush administration officials assert that NCLB does not allow schools to "hide behind averages," meaning that overall school improvement cannot come at the expense of smaller subgroups of concern.

But how does that stance jibe with the other prominent policies the Bush administration has pursued regarding race? In 2003, the administration sided with the plaintiffs against the University of Michigan in the Supreme Court precisely because their admissions system paid particular attention to race. And the administration recently used an obscure statement on energy policy to make clear that race should not be a factor in government programs.

Yet NCLB is a tacit admission that race matters. How can the Bush administration force primary and secondary schools to pay specific attention to test scores of students of particular racial groups while arguing that similar racial attention should be illegal for admission to the same public schools being tested? Even conservative opponents of affirmative action have called this approach "schizophrenic" and unprincipled.

To make it principled, the administration must reconsider its positions on affirmative action and school integration. And it must stop urging the Supreme Court to ban a tool some local school districts deem effective and desirable for providing access and expanding student diversity.

Through NCLB, the Bush administration has promoted "characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin" for the purposes of assessing school performance. This is an admission that race matters in the public school arena. We agree. And race matters not only when it's convenient for political aims.

Good Election News From Florida (NYT)

Florida, famous for doing so much wrong in its elections, is poised to take two very important right steps. First, Gov. Charlie Crist says he plans to end the use of touch-screen voting machines that do not produce a paper record. Florida's move may finally sound the death knell for these unreliable, inherently antidemocratic voting machines.

After the 2000 election, there was a rush to eliminate the punch-card machines that produced the infamous hanging chads. But many states replaced them with paperless touch-screen machines that require voters to accept on faith that the reported vote totals accurately reflect the votes cast.

It has been hard to have faith. There have been widespread reports of "vote flipping," in which machines record votes cast for one candidate as votes for the opponent. The Florida courts are still trying to resolve a challenge to a Congressional race last fall in which as many as 18,000 votes may have disappeared. The race was extremely close, and the possibly missing votes were in the losing candidate's strongest county.

Governor Crist is asking the Legislature to finance the purchase of new optical-scan machines, and it is expected to agree. Choosing optical scans is Governor Crist's second good move. In optical-scan voting, voters mark a paper ballot that is then read by a computer. Polling place lines are shorter, because many voters can fill out ballots at the same time. These paper ballots are the official ballots, and can be recounted by hand to resolve a dispute.

More than half the states — including large ones like California, New York, Illinois and Ohio — require computerized voting machines to produce a paper record. The addition of Florida would be a major defeat for election officials and voting-machine companies that have stubbornly opposed paper-trail requirements.

Governor Crist's move should provide further momentum for a bill that Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, plans to introduce in Congress today that would require voting machines nationwide to produce voter-verified paper records.

With the Democrats in control of Congress, the bill has a good chance of passing. But it is gratifying that Florida's shift is led by a Republican governor, and expected to pass a Republican-controlled Legislature. This has for too long been considered a Democratic issue. It shouldn't be. It is, as Governor Crist said, "common sense."

ANTITRUST:

Mill Developments Rest With Antitrust Decision (STEUBHS)

DOJ_NMG_0126975

By Paul Giannamore, Business editor

Steubenville (OH) Herald-Star, February 5, 2007

STEUBENVILLE — Many developments for the local steel mills hinge upon the decision of the U.S. Department of Justice in an antitrust claim against Mittal Steel.

While the date has passed for expiration of a memorandum of understanding between Esmark and Mittal for the purchase of Mittal's Weirton mill, negotiations between the two firms are continuing.

Esmark spokesman Bill Keegan said Friday that Esmark and Mittal "continue to negotiate in earnest" on the potential purchase agreement and discussions are continuing.

Esmark, Mittal and Weirton's Independent Steelworkers Union officials all said they were not sure how Justice would make its decision known. A Justice spokeswoman said Friday the decision was "still pending" and a statement could be expected at some point.

The Department of Justice and Mittal entered into an antitrust consent decree in August when Mittal and Arcelor merged. The concern was over Mittal's control over tin-producing assets in the eastern United States. Through the merger, Mittal came into possession of the Canadian Dofasco mill in Hamilton, Ontario, which produces tin. It already owned the Weirton mill and the Sparrows Point, Md., plant, both of which produce tin.

Because of the placement of Dofasco into a Dutch trust by Arcelor when it had been fighting Mittal's offers earlier in 2006, Mittal faced difficulty in selling Dofasco. The company had been ordered to use its best efforts to sell Dofasco and, absent a sale, Justice would choose between Weirton and Sparrows Point to be sold to ease the antitrust concerns.

A November deadline on the decision was extended to Jan. 28, which passed without word from the Justice Department.

Mittal wanted to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp, which sued and lost in a court in the Netherlands trying to force Mittal into the sale. The Dutch trustees voted against dissolving the trust that owns Dofasco.

Esmark, which controls Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and has won a board election for the steelmaker's holding company, has said it would make an offer for Weirton as soon as it is cleared for sale.

The ISU hasn't come out in favor of the Esmark proposal because it doesn't include the re-firing of the mill's hot end, shuttered by Mittal in 2005. Esmark's plan calls for Weirton's finishing capacity to augment its plans for Wheeling-Pitt. Other offers exist, according to the ISU, including one from steel investor Mitch Hecht, who would restart the hot end of the plant and return hundreds of ISU members to work. Esmark says its plans for Weirton would include about 100 more jobs in the finishing end of the plant.

One other item hanging in the balance on the Justice decision is the fate of the General Office and grounds at the south end of Three Springs Drive in Weirton.

The ISU said Friday the final move of Mittal management offices from the general offices has been completed. The offices are now headquartered at the Main Administration Building, at the corner of Main Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, across the street from the steel mill.

The MAB had been the headquarters of the mill until the General Offices were opened in the late 1950s or early 1960s. The General Offices were the headquarters for Weirton Steel as a division of National Steel Corp. and for the independent Weirton after it was sold by National to the mill's employees in 1984. The now-abandoned office building, once home to several hundred workers, has been slowly phased out in recent years, and Mittal management said shortly after taking over the Weirton mill in 2005 that it intended to move its management downtown, to be closer to the plant.

Mittal spokesman Dave Allen said Friday the move is a reflection that the mill no longer needs to house management for an entire steel company but functions as a single plant of a larger steelmaker. The ISU said the MAB offices include payroll, seniority and benefits, making it more convenient for employees.

"Anyone dropping off SUB pay forms or signing a bid sheet can stop at the MAB during normal workday hours, Monday through Friday, through the Pennsylvania Avenue parking lot doors," said Mark Glyptis, ISU president.

Allen said Mittal could not comment on the future of the General Office because of the pending Justice decision that could result in the sale of the building as part of the sale of the Weirton mill.

The independent Weirton Steel had sold outparcels of the property which are used by two firms as part of an industrial park. A sign in front of the General Office grounds, which also house a memorial to Weirton Steel's war veterans, says property is available for lease.

Back at Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark's offer to finalize its purchase of the steelmaker has been given to an independent review committee for the board of directors. The committee will make a recommendation to the full Wheeling-Pitt board, which then, if it favors the proposal, could put it before the shareholders for a proxy vote. James and Craig Bouchard, the brothers who founded Esmark and were behind the drive for their steel service center firm to acquire Wheeling-Pitt, will recuse themselves from the board's handling of the offer. Both are top executives with Wheeling-Pitt under the new board of directors.

Esmark's offer, Keegan said, remains at the $20 per share that was first offered in July as part of its takeover battle for Wheeling-Pitt. The price was a premium above the $17.86 sale price that Wheeling-Pitt was trading in mid-July.

W-P's shares in recent days have risen to trade steadily above $25 a share and closed at $26.23 a share Friday.

Keegan further said Esmark could not comment on issues regarding the company's views of Wheeling-Pitt's joint ventures, including Wheeling-Nisshin in Follansbee and Ohio Coatings in Yorkville, until after it issues its fourth quarter and whole-year 2006 earnings reports, expected Feb. 28. Also, the amount of payouts to former Wheeling-Pitt executives who have been sacked by Esmark is anticipated to be revealed in the report.

BAR/BRI Monolopy Class Action Settled For $49M (NLJ)

By Amanda Bronstad, Staff reporter

National Law Journal, February 5, 2007

LOS ANGELES — The publishers of the BAR/BRI law review course have agreed to pay $49 million to settle a case brought by a class of nearly 300,000 law students alleging they each were overcharged by about $1,000.

West Publishing Corp., the owner of the BAR/BRI, and Kaplan Inc., which makes the preparatory coursework for the Law School Admission Test, agreed to settle claims that they conspired to monopolize the law exam market. Ryan Rodriguez v. West Publishing Corp., No. 05cv3222 (C.D. Calif.).

The antitrust case had sought triple the $300 million in damages and applied to all students who took the BAR/BRI course from 1997 to 2006.

The parent company of West Publishing, The Thomson Corp., has agreed to pay $36 million as part of the proposed settlement, according to John Shaughnessy, senior director of corporate communications at the legal and regulatory market group of The Thomson Corp.

"We are pleased to bring a close to his matter as the alleged actions that formed the basis of the suit occurred years prior to Thomson acquiring the business," he said in an e-mailed statement.

Kaplan agreed to pay nearly $13 million as part of the proposed settlement.

Eliot Disner, a partner in the Los Angeles office of McGuireWoods who brought the year-old case, said the proposed settlement, minus attorney fees, comes to $37 million for class members. He estimated that, with 290,000 anticipated class members, each would receive about $125, although that amount could be higher if some members don't claim their share.

"This gives a measure of relief to the injured class," Disner said, nothing that both companies also agreed to end certain co-marketing agreements that came into question in the case.

The proposed settlement has yet to be preliminarily approved by a judge.

Disner said he anticipated such approval by early March, with a final settlement to be approved sometime this summer. Class members could potentially receive their settlement checks by September or October, he said.

Simon Sets Rival Offer For Mills (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

Simon Property Group Inc. and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management yesterday lobbed in a roughly $1.56 billion offer for Mills Corp., a move designed to derail a $1.35 billion agreement with Brookfield Asset Management.

Investors had for weeks been expecting a higher offer for Mills, a real-estate investment trust with dozens of shopping malls around the country. As Mills's largest shareholder, Farallon has aggressively pushed for a higher offer for the Chevy Chase, Md.-based company.

• The Play: Simon Property and hedge fund Farallon made a $1.56 billion offer for mall owner Mills, a move designed to derail a $1.35 billion pact with Canada's Brookfield.

• Takeover Trends: Hedge funds are increasingly comfortable assuming controlling ownership stakes, and the bid is another example of suitors showing little fear about busting up an agreed-upon deal.

• Hot Neighborhood: Commercial real estate remains a big lure for investors, even as residential property values continue to suffer.

The emergence of Simon, the country's largest REIT by market value, gives Farallon's efforts some important momentum. The two are expected to put up equal amounts of equity to help fund their bid, creating a per-share price of $24, greater than the $21-per-share deal struck by Brookfield, based in Canada, last month. Mills also has an additional $6 billion-plus in debt and preferred stock that the two partners would assume.

The offer puts into relief two of the emerging deal-making themes of 2007: Hedge funds are getting increasingly comfortable assuming controlling ownership stakes and are finding willing allies among corporate stalwarts such as Simon. The new year has also brought a spate of "jumped" transactions, in which bidders have shown little fear about busting up an agreed-upon deal. Robust financing markets have made such maneuvers possible, and bankers on Wall Street expect still more unsolicited activity in the months ahead.

Simon's move also highlights the seemingly relentless rise of commercial real-estate, even while residential property values continue to suffer. Simon already is the country's largest mall developer, with interests in 285 properties throughout the U.S. The Indianapolis-based firm had developed five properties with Mills during the 1990s, and is in a "better position to enhance its assets" than other owners, a person close to Simon said yesterday.

To help push its efforts, Simon and Farallon are structuring their proposal as a cash tender offer, which would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash within a matter of weeks, this person said. That could be as much as six months earlier than Brookfield's plan. The team has also lined up support of another large shareholder, Stark Master Fund Ltd., which has given the duo an option to acquire its 2.8 million Mills shares.

To succeed, Farallon and Simon must first win support of Mills's board, which needs to find their proposal a "superior competing transaction" to begin negotiations. That would, in essence, kick off a new auction for Mills just weeks after a months-long auction appeared to conclude.

Brookfield, which owns a controlling stake in office-building owner Brookfield Properties Corp., focuses on long-term, income-producing investments such as hydropower, timber and commercial real estate, and has more than $50 billion in assets under management. But most of its commercial-real-estate holdings are in office buildings, not retail. That raised questions among some analysts.

The earlier Brookfield agreement appeared to end a 15-month drama for Mills, which ran into ill-fated developments and accounting woes that may have been a result of misconduct, according to the company. On Friday, Mills shares closed up 17 cents to $22.15 each, a price that is still 44% below the company's value of a year ago, and 8% lower than its market capitalization of 1997.

Triad Nears Private-Equity Pact (WSJ)

CCMP, Goldman to Lead $4.4 Billion Hospital Deal; Blackstone May Be Spoiler

Triad Hospitals Inc. was expected last night to announce a deal as early as this morning to sell the company to private-equity buyers for about $4.4 billion.

The likely buyers of the Plano, Texas, hospital chain were CCMP Capital Advisors LLC and the private-investment arm of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., people familiar with the matter said.

Rival Blackstone Group also was in the hunt and might still snatch Triad at the last moment, these people added.

The deal may presage more buyouts or acquisitions in the sector: Hospitals have been fertile territory for buyout shops lately, most notably in last year's record-setting purchase of hospital giant HCA Inc.

The deal would value the company at $50.25 a share, a 16% premium over Friday's close of $43.27 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Triad, spun off by HCA in May 1999, had 51 general acute-care hospitals and 10 ambulatory-surgery centers in early 2006, primarily in small southern U.S. cities.

Triad has been considered a likely buyout target by many analysts after an October conference call in which executives said they had held talks with "various groups" that would continue, though they said nothing was then imminent.

At about the same time, Community Health Systems Inc. of Brentwood, Tenn., said it was considering going private, among a variety of strategies. In addition, Health Management Associates Inc. of Naples, Fla., borrowed to pay shareholders a dividend valued at half its share price, which analysts described as the equivalent of a public buyout.

Generally, hospital stocks "are trading as if something is going to happen," Cowen & Co. health-care analyst Kemp Dolliver said last week. Mr. Dolliver didn't directly address the Triad deal.

Private-equity firms see opportunity in the hospital sector in part because of the extensive cash flow many companies have devoted to expansion and capital expense. By reducing capital expense, the buyers may free up enough cash to pay down leverage necessary to consummate the deals.

HCA's buyers have said their goal is long-term, to improve the quality and efficiency of the chain's hospitals in anticipation of a sector comeback.

Still, private-equity firms face tough challenges. Hospital companies are struggling with, among other problems, stagnant admission in recent quarters and rising bad debt stemming from the expanding ranks of uninsured patients.

Analysts have noted that between a third and half of hospital-company revenue comes from the government, chiefly Medicare, the federal program for the elderly and disabled, and Medicaid, the joint state-federal health-care program for the poor. Both government and private insurers have been stingy with price increases, and even crack turnaround management won't have much pricing power, analysts say.

However, buyouts could give hospitals breathing room to make necessary changes while waiting for market conditions to improve. "It's almost analogous to Chapter 11—give them the protection to restructure," Paul Mango, a hospital consultant in Pittsburgh at McKinsey & Co., said last week, speaking generally.

Triad's board includes Gale Sayers, a former running back for the Chicago Bears and 1965 rookie of the year, who now runs The Sayers 40 Inc., a technology consulting firm founded by Mr. Sayers and his wife, Ardythe in 1982.

The likely buyers in the Triad deal were advised by J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Goldman Sachs and Citigroup Inc. and attorneys at O'Melveny & Myers. Triad was advised by Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc. and law firm Baker Botts.

The company ran a limited auction, and the board's special committee pressed for a number of protections to seek a higher offer. Those include a small break-up fee and a 40-day so-called "go shop" period in which the company can find a higher price.

A Climate-change Cost Analysis (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, February 5, 2007

The human and economic cost of global warming will move to center stage when the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change releases the second and third installments of its report this spring, experts say.

"Now, stronger results are being expressed with higher confidence in terms of impacts that will be triggered by temperature increases," says economist Gary Yohe of Wesleyan University in Middletown, Conn. Yohe is an author of the climate change panel's report due in April called "Impacts, Adaptation and Vulnerability."

The panel's report is the creation of three separate "working groups," which each prepare a separate report. The first, which was released Friday and involved the efforts of thousands of scientists and government reviewers, concludes with 90% certainty that humanity is triggering global warming by burning fossil fuels, cutting down forests and other activities.

The April report will pick up the ball from there to answer the "So what?" question, Yohe says. The document will assess the effect of warming on socioeconomic and natural systems and show that the effects on people "are distributed across the globe and in every major sector of human activity," he says.

Like other climate panel reports, the impacts assessment will review and combine studies conducted since 2001. Ocean acidification that is killing corals and sea life, disappearing species, the failure of crops and water supplies and other calamities have been detailed in journals in recent years, notes climate scientist Patrick Gonzalez of the Nature Conservancy.

The third report, to be released in May, focuses on "mitigation" measures, such as taxing carbon dioxide production.

"Mitigation has become an issue of more broadly appreciated importance," says economist Jae Edmonds of the Pacific Northwest National Laboratory in College Park, Md., pointing to a flurry of legislative activity on Capitol Hill aimed at limiting carbon dioxide emissions. "If carbon change really is serious, probably it's about time to think seriously about it."

But the third report, which also examines technology options, from biofuels to windmills to "sequestration" of industrial greenhouse gases in underground rock layers, won't be a cookbook of fixes for global warming, Edmonds says. "People will find we face a complex problem — not an insoluble one, but it will take real efforts."

Landing just as congressional and state leaders have taken up climate change legislation, the three reports come at a pivotal moment, Gonzalez says. "All three reports are important; the progress of science is narrowing down answers."

The Nature Conservancy already uses published studies to target climate efforts worldwide, including:

•Sierra Nevada Mountains. With the Agriculture Department's Forest Service, conserving mountain valleys, meadows and wetlands vegetation as warming moves up mountain slopes over about 700,000 acres.

•Yunnan, China. Mapping ecology of mountain areas already affected by warming.

How Do We Stop The Warming? (LAT)

By Alan Zarembo

Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

Everybody in the United States could switch from cars to bicycles.

The Chinese could close all their factories.

Europe could give up electricity and return to the age of the lantern.

But all those steps together would not come close to stopping global warming.

A landmark report from the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, released Friday, warns that there is so much carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases in the atmosphere that even if concentrations held at current levels, the effects of global warming would continue for centuries.

There is still hope. The report notes that a concerted world effort could stave off the direst consequences of global warming, such as widespread flooding, drought and extreme weather.

Ultimately eliminating the global warming threat, however, would require radical action.

To stabilize atmospheric levels of carbon dioxide — the primary contributor to global warming — CO2 emissions would have to drop 70% to 80%, said Richard Somerville, a theoretical meteorologist at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

Such a reduction would bring emissions into equilibrium with the planet's ability to absorb carbon dioxide. The last time the planet was in balance was more than 150 years ago, before the widespread use of coal and steam engines.

What would it take to bring that kind of reduction?

"All truck, all trains, all airplanes, cars, motorcycles and boats in the United States — that's 7.3% of global emissions," said Gregg Marland, a fossil fuel pollution expert at Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tennessee.

Closing all fossil-fuel-powered electricity plants worldwide and replacing them with windmills, solar panels and nuclear power plants would make a serious dent — a 39% reduction globally, Marland said.

His calculation doesn't include all the fossil fuels that would have to be burned to build the greener facilities, though.

Trees could be planted to absorb more carbon dioxide. But even if every available space in the United States were turned into woodland, Marland said, it would not come close to offsetting U.S. emissions.

"There is not enough land area," he said.

The United States accounts for nearly a quarter of the carbon dioxide released each year, according to government statistics. China, in second at about 15%, is gaining fast.

If the rest of the world returned to the Stone Age, carbon concentrations would still rise.

Carbon does not dissipate rapidly. Some is eventually absorbed by oceans and plants, but about half stays in the atmosphere. And there is no easy way to get it out.

Maintaining current levels would require reducing worldwide carbon dioxide emissions by more than 20 billion tons a year, federal statistics suggest.

For some perspective on that number, consider an icon of the green movement: a 2007 Toyota Prius. Driving it 12,000 miles releases 4,200 pounds of carbon dioxide.

If hybrid cars replaced all 245 million cars in the United States — more than a third of the cars in the world — the carbon savings would be less than 3% of the needed reduction.

Rapid industrial development in some of the most populous nations has compounded the problem. Their burgeoning emissions could swamp environmental gains in other countries.

In India, carbon dioxide emissions increased 39% between 1993 and 2004 — nearly double the global rate. The figure was 36% in Indonesia. China, which saw a 45% rise, now opens a coal-fired power plant every week to 10 days.

Given the scale of the problem, experts see no realistic way to lower the concentration of atmospheric carbon.

In fact, Robert Socolow, a carbon mitigation expert at Princeton University, said that even if the entire world stopped burning fossil fuels, carbon wouldn't approach pre-Industrial Revolution levels for several hundred years.

The only possibility now is to slow the buildup of carbon. If emissions can be reduced enough, the gradual process of warming can be stretched into centuries.

From this perspective, there is some hope. Though the savings from any one measure may look small, in combination, they could add up to something significant, experts said.

There is no shortage of ideas.

The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, said high-efficiency appliances and other products in the Energy Star program last year eliminated greenhouse gas emissions equal to the pollution from 23 million cars.

"As a citizen, each of us has an opportunity to make a difference," he said Friday after the release of the U.N. report.

He urged people to use compact fluorescent light bulbs, which provide the same light as a standard bulb on two-thirds of the energy. Replacing one standard light bulb in every U.S. home would prevent greenhouse gases equivalent to the emissions of nearly 800,000 cars.

Tips from TerraPass Inc. of Menlo Park, Calif., include going back to clotheslines. The company, which promotes alternative energy, says eliminating a family's dryer could save electricity equivalent to 1,016 pounds of carbon dioxide a year.

Socolow said the ultimate solution might rely on technology.

He said his research suggested that by improving energy efficiency now and phasing out fossil fuels over the next 100 years, carbon concentrations could remain within safe levels.

The biggest polluter, he said, should lead the way: "The U.S. is going to have to decarbonize."

AEI Critiques Of Warming Questioned (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, February 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0126981

A Washington-based think tank has been soliciting critiques of the just-released international assessment of the evidence on climate change, a move that prompted some academics and environmentalists to accuse the group of seeking to distort the latest evidence for global warming.

Advocacy groups such as Greenpeace and the Public Interest Research Group questioned why the American Enterprise Institute (AEI) has offered $10,000 to academics willing to contribute to a book on climate- change policy, an overture that was first reported Friday in London's Guardian newspaper.

Greenpeace spokeswoman Jane Kochersperger, who noted that AEI has received funding from Exxon Mobil in recent years, said yesterday that the think tank "has clearly hit a new low . . . when it's throwing out cash awards under the rubric of 'reason' to create confusion on the status of climate science. Americans are still suffering the impacts of Hurricane Katrina, and it's clearly time for policymakers on both sides of the aisle to take substantive action on global warming and ignore Exxon Mobil's disinformation campaign via climate skeptics."

AEI visiting scholar Kenneth Green -- one of two researchers who has sought to commission the critiques -- said in an interview that his group is examining the policy debate on global warming, not the science.

"It's completely policy-oriented," said Green, adding that a third of the academics AEI solicited for the project are interested in participating. "Somebody wants to distort this."

In July 2006, Green and AEI resident scholar Steven F. Hayward -- both of whom have questioned the need for caps on emissions of carbon dioxide and other gasses linked to global warming -- started soliciting essays from academics on the then-upcoming report on global warming by the U.N.-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). The survey's authors, who hail from more than 100 countries, said in their report Friday that they are at least 90 percent certain that human activity accounted for climate change over the past 50 years.

"The purpose of the project is to highlight the strengths and weaknesses of the IPCC process, especially as it bears on policy responses to climate change," the two men wrote. "As with any large-scale 'consensus' process, the IPCC is susceptible to self-selection bias in its personnel, resistant to reasonable criticism and dissent, and prone to summary conclusions that are poorly supported by the analytical work of the complete Working Group reports."

At least two academics -- Texas A&M University atmospheric sciences professor Gerald North and Texas A&M climate researcher Steven Schroeder -- turned down AEI's offer because they feared their work would be politicized.

Schroeder, who has worked with Green in the past and has questioned some aspects of traditional climate modeling, said in an interview that he did not think AEI would have skewed his results. But he added that he worried his contribution might have been published alongside "off-the-wall ideas" questioning the existence of global warming.

"We worried our work could be misused even if we produced a reasonable report," Schroeder said. "While any human endeavor can be criticized, the IPCC system greatly exceeds the cooperation, openness and scientific rigorousness of the process applied to any other problem area that has significant effects on society."

Faced with such resistance, AEI modified its proposal last month and sent out a new round of offers, asking academics to contribute to a book examining the broad policy options for dealing with global warming.

Hayward and Green wrote that "climate change has tended to be caught in a straightjacket between so-called 'skeptics' and so-called 'alarmists' with seemingly little room left in the middle for people who may have reasonable doubts or heterodox views about the range of policy descriptions that should be considered for climate change of uncertain dimensions."

Several environmental activists and climate scientists questioned why AEI would offer a $10,000 honorarium to scientists to critique the IPCC survey. Andrew Dessler, another Texas A&M atmospheric science professor, who has worked with both Schroeder and North, said the move represents an effort by climate skeptics to create "reasonable doubt" in the minds of policymakers who are debating whether to limit greenhouse gases.

AEI President Christopher DeMuth issued a letter Friday saying his group will continue to challenge orthodox thinking on climate change: "The effort to anathematize opposing views is the standard recourse of the ideologue; one of AEI's highest purposes, here as in many other contentious areas, is to ensure that such efforts to do not succeed."

Climate Of Opinion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

Last week's headlines about the United Nation's latest report on global warming were typically breathless, predicting doom and human damnation like the most fervent religious evangelical. Yet the real news in the fourth assessment from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) may be how far it is backpedaling on some key issues. Beware claims that the science of global warming is settled.

The document that caused such a stir was only a short policy report, a summary of the full scientific report due in May. Written mainly by policymakers (not scientists) who have a stake in the issue, the summary was long on dire predictions. The press reported the bullet points, noting that this latest summary pronounced with more than "90% confidence" that humans have been the main drivers of warming since the 1950s, and that higher temperatures and rising sea levels would result.

More pertinent is the underlying scientific report. And according to people who have seen that draft, it contains startling revisions of previous U.N. predictions. For example, the Center for Science and Public Policy has just released an illuminating analysis written by Lord Christopher Monckton, a one-time adviser to Margaret Thatcher who has become a voice of sanity on global warming.

Take rising sea levels. In its 2001 report, the U.N.'s best high-end estimate of the rise in sea levels by 2100 was three feet. Lord Monckton notes that the upcoming report's high-end best estimate is 17 inches, or half the previous prediction. Similarly, the new report shows that the 2001 assessment had overestimated the human influence on climate change since the Industrial Revolution by at least one-third.

Such reversals (and there are more) are remarkable, given that the IPCC's previous reports, in 1990, 1995 and 2001, have been steadily more urgent in their scientific claims and political tone. It's worth noting that many of the policymakers who tinker with the IPCC reports work for governments that have promoted climate fears as a way of justifying carbon-restriction policies. More skeptical scientists are routinely vetoed from contributing to the panel's work. The Pasteur Institute's Paul Reiter, a malaria expert who thinks global warming would have little impact on the spread of that disease, is one example.

U.N. scientists have relied heavily on computer models to predict future climate change, and these crystal balls are notoriously inaccurate. According to the models, for instance, global temperatures were supposed to have risen in recent years. Yet according to the U.S. National Climate Data Center, the world in 2006 was only 0.03 degrees Celsius warmer than it was in 2001 -- in the range of measurement error and thus not statistically significant.

The models also predicted that sea levels would rise much faster than they actually have. The models didn't predict the significant cooling the oceans have undergone since 2003 -- which is the opposite of what you'd expect with global warming. Cooler oceans have also put a damper on claims that global warming is the cause of more frequent or intense hurricanes. The models also failed to predict falling concentrations of methane in the atmosphere, another surprise.

Meanwhile, new scientific evidence keeps challenging previous assumptions. The latest report, for instance, takes greater note of the role of pollutant particles, which are thought to reflect sunlight back to space, supplying a cooling effect. More scientists are also studying the effect of solar activity on climate, and some believe it alone is responsible for recent warming.

All this appears to be resulting in a more cautious scientific approach, which is largely good news. We're told that the upcoming report is also missing any reference to the infamous "hockey stick," a study by Michael Mann that purported to show 900 years of minor fluctuations in temperature, followed by a dramatic spike over the past century. The IPCC featured the graph in 2001, but it has since been widely rebutted.

While everyone concedes that the Earth is about a degree Celsius warmer than it was a century ago, the debate continues over the cause and consequences. We don't deny that carbon emissions may play a role, but we don't believe that the case is sufficiently proven to justify a revolution in global energy use. The economic dislocations of such an abrupt policy change could be far more severe than warming itself, especially if it reduces the growth and innovation that would help the world cope with, say, rising sea levels. There are also other problems -- AIDS, malaria and clean drinking water, for example -- whose claims on scarce resources are at least as urgent as climate change.

The IPCC report should be understood as one more contribution to the warming debate, not some definitive last word that justifies radical policy change. It can be hard to keep one's head when everyone else is predicting the Apocalypse, but that's all the more reason to keep cool and focus on the actual science.

Global Warning (WP)

IT'S NOT quite the hurricane-force blow to skeptics of global warming that many climatologists would have preferred, but for a document drafted by hundreds of scientists representing 113 governments, the latest report from the United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, released Friday, is nevertheless full of frightening evidence and, we hope, policy-inducing conclusions.

Here are some of the more notable conclusions: There is no doubt that the planet is warming, according to all sorts of measures, from rising air and ocean temperatures to widespread melting of snow and ice. Increases in global temperature are "very likely" the result of higher concentrations of greenhouse gases, which are far higher now than they have been over the past 650,000 years. Policymakers should expect global temperatures to continue to rise, even if greenhouse gas concentrations stay at the levels of the year 2000. Continuing to release greenhouse gases at current rates would warm the Earth even more and would be "very likely" to yield much more severe consequences during this century than those we saw in the previous one. Sea levels will rise, heat waves and droughts will strike longer and more often, hurricanes will become more intense, and it will rain more in high latitudes.

Many climate scientists say the report doesn't go far enough. Michael Mann, a leading climatologist at Pennsylvania State University, welcomes the assessment, but he says that it probably underestimates how high oceans could rise over the next century or so, especially if the ice covering Greenland melts faster than expected. He may be right: Recent research on melting ice caps suggests that cracks in the ice will speed up the melting process.

The assessment's value does not lie in its innovative approach to describing global climate change. On the contrary, because so many individuals and organizations signed on, the report's strong language is virtually unassailable. Even the Bush administration hailed it, which makes the president's continued neglect of the issue particularly troubling. Now that leaders in the United States and abroad have agreed on the basics of the problem and the seriousness of the consequences, sound policy -- the likes of which President Bush continues to oppose -- should follow.

Yellowstone Proposal Sets Greater Snowmobile Access (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, Wyo. — The latest installment in the long-running debate over the use of snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park is a proposal to allow as many as 720 to enter each day, nearly three times as many as permitted in the last several years.

The plan, which could be adopted by the end of the year, has drawn fire from environmentalists and praise from snowmobile advocates and some businesses in the communities around the park.

The plan is described in a preliminary draft environmental impact statement that was released to agencies and governments near the park for comment in December. The Park Service could change the plan before releasing a final version to the public next month for comment, but so far it is favoring greatly expanded winter use. About 250 snowmobiles a day use the park now. The historical average in the 1990s was 795 a day, before access was banned by the Clinton administration.

Critics say that snowmobiles will be detrimental to the park's pristine air, wildlife and quiet. Michael Finley, who was superintendent of Yellowstone for more than six years, and who oversaw the plan that banned snowmobiles, said the Park Service was skirting its responsibilities under the new plan.

"The facts and science gave them a direction to take, then they softened, twisted and contorted the science," Mr. Finley said. "The plan deserves to be challenged. It deserves burial in deep snow."

In late 2006, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne reaffirmed the parks' commitment to policies emphasizing the conservation of natural and cultural resources over recreation.

But Tim Stevens, Yellowstone program director for the National Parks and Conservation Association, said the proposed standards were misguided.

"Instead of meeting the bars they set for themselves, they lowered the bars," Mr. Stevens said.

DOJ_NMG_0126984

John Sacklin, a management assistant at Yellowstone who has worked on the issue since the 1990s, said that the park had not abdicated its responsibilities and that the new plan still protected the park's natural assets.

"We can achieve those goals," Mr. Sacklin said, "with a managed program that allows limited snowmobile and snow-coach use."

Mr. Sacklin said snowmobile technology had gotten much cleaner and quieter. And all snowmobiles must travel with a guide, who enforces strict rules. The new plan also requires noise reduction technology on snow-coaches.

As far as increasing the limit from current use, he said, "It's hard to know what the real demand or desire might be."

"We were comfortable with a middle ground of 720," he added.

Before 2000, snowmobile use was unregulated. Hundreds of vehicles with roaring two-stroke motors entered the park daily, and noise, pollution, harassment of wildlife and moving violations became serious problems. A lawsuit by a wildlife group, the Fund for Animals, forced the park to take a hard look at the issue.

The first study, in the late 1990s, found that banning snowmobiles and allowing only snow-coaches — buses or vans on large skis or treads — would protect the park the best. In 2000, near the end of the Clinton administration, the Park Service adopted that recommendation.

That decision was reversed after the Bush administration took over. Two subsequent studies, in 2002 and 2003, found that snowmobiles were compatible with park values. A lawsuit has followed each study and forced another.

Critics say the latest preliminary draft is faulty in three major areas, including its effects on air quality and on wildlife. Perhaps the most evident is the noise levels it would allow.

In the winter of 2003-4, a study by the Park Service looked at whether snowmobiles were audible more than 50 percent of the time at Old Faithful. Even the new, quieter snowmobiles, numbering about 250 a day, exceeded that threshold, creating "major adverse effects."

The last two environmental studies raised the threshold. Major adverse effects were considered to exist if visitors to Old Faithful heard snowmobiles more than 75 percent of the time. This relaxed standard was still exceeded with 250 snowmobiles a day entering the park.

"People go to Yellowstone one time in their lives with a few hours at Old Faithful," said Jon Catton, an independent environmentalist who has worked on the issue for eight years. "You can hear the hiss and splash of Old Faithful, the howl of a wolf, or the persistent buzz, whine and roar of snowmobiles."

The Ethanol Mirage: What Is GM Talking About? (USNEWS)

Galva, Iowa-This farming town of fewer than 400 people might be most memorable for what it doesn't have: a Wal-Mart, a high school, even a stoplight. But humble Galva and its environs have two things in abundance: corn and, by extension, hope.

"We feel we're on the cusp here as far as things happening," says Rita Frahm, an 18-year resident and president of the county's economic development corporation. That's because Galva is the lucky home of an ethanol plant.

Since opening in 2002, the plant has produced ever increasing dividends, to date putting more than $13 million into the hands of the 420 local farmers and investors who own it. That cash is slowly but markedly changing Galva's landscape. For the first time in 30 years, the town witnessed construction of three new homes at once, and a whole new street, Sixth Street, on which to place the houses. Those dwellings are now occupied by families "who saw an opportunity to stay rather than the community dying," Frahm says.

Heartwarming stories like Galva's-in a state that hosts the first presidential contest-help explain why Washington is so fired up over ethanol. In 2006, production skyrocketed, and Washington is poised to push it still higher. What's not to like? Every gallon theoretically means more money for the iconic American farmer and less cash lining the pockets of foreign sheiks. "There's almost a sense," says Iowa State University political scientist Steffen Schmidt, "that ethanol is morally better than oil."

Washington loves a "win-win," but there are plenty of doubts as to whether the love affair with ethanol qualifies. Even though the ethanol industry profited handsomely last year, it continued to benefit from billions of dollars in taxpayer subsidies. And as ethanol becomes a larger part of the energy mix, it is not clear that Washington is prepared for the fallout. Ethanol already consumes so much corn that signs of strain on the food supply and prices are rippling across the marketplace. Environmental impacts will multiply as more land and water are devoted to the prized yellow grain. And, even if these problems were overcome, ethanol's potential growth could be stunted by an energy system currently tailored to gasoline. Ethanol undoubtedly plays a role in the quest for energy independence and the desire to curb global warming. But some observers worry that ethanol development may take the place of more effective initiatives: forcing automakers to increase gas mileage, for instance, or mandating cuts in carbon dioxide emissions. "Some members of Congress are looking for quick fixes," says one economist who has studied the issue. "It's an easy bandwagon to jump on. But there's a lot of exaggeration about what ethanol is capable of doing."

Beginnings

Ethanol is alcohol distilled from fermented, mashed grain. It took a century for it to make a big splash on the U.S. energy scene, even though Henry Ford built his first Model T in 1908 to run on either gasoline or ethanol. Over the decades, petroleum proved cheaper, and grain alcohol was relegated to college fraternity parties rather than gas tanks. No one looked seriously at ethanol as fuel until the oil price shocks of the 1970s, when Congress decided to subsidize a homegrown alternative-most significantly through a tax credit to oil companies for every gallon of the costly alternative they blended into gasoline. But when oil prices fell again in the late 1980s through the 1990s, the nation's dependence on petroleum imports mushroomed to 60 percent, and ethanol was reduced to a performance-boosting additive for some midwestern gasoline-a nice, subsidized side business for the dominant producer, Archer Daniels Midland.

Will: Inconvenient Kyoto Truths (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Was life better when a sheet of ice a mile thick covered Chicago? Was it worse when Greenland was so warm that Vikings farmed there?

Enough already. It is time to call some bluffs. John Kerry says that one reason America has become an "international pariah" is President Bush's decision to "walk away from global warming." Kerry's accusation is opaque, but it implies the usual complaint that Bush is insufficiently enthusiastic about the Kyoto Protocol's binding caps on emissions of greenhouse gases. Many senators and other experts in climate science say we must "do something" about global warming. Barack Obama says "the world" is watching to see "what action we take."

Fine. President Bush should give the world something amusing to watch. He should demand that the Senate vote on the protocol.

Climate Cassandras say the facts are clear and the case is closed. (Sen. Barbara Boxer: "We're not going to take a lot of time debating this anymore.") The consensus catechism about global warming has six tenets: 1. Global warming is happening. 2. It is our (humanity's, but especially America's) fault. 3. It will continue unless we mend our ways. 4. If it continues we are in grave danger. 5. We know how to slow or even reverse the warming. 6. The benefits from doing that will far exceed the costs.

Only the first tenet is clearly true, and only in the sense that the Earth warmed about 0.7 degrees Celsius in the 20th century. We do not know the extent to which human activity caused this. The activity is economic growth, the wealth-creation that makes possible improved well-being—better nutrition, medicine, education, etc. How much reduction of such social goods are we willing to accept by slowing economic activity in order to (try to) regulate the planet's climate?

We do not know how much we must change our economic activity to produce a particular reduction of warming. And we do not know whether warming is necessarily dangerous. Over the millennia, the planet has warmed and cooled for reasons that are unclear but clearly were unrelated to SUVs. Was life better when ice a mile thick covered Chicago? Was it worse when Greenland was so warm that Vikings farmed there? Are we sure the climate at this particular moment is exactly right, and that it must be preserved, no matter the cost?

It could cost tens of trillions (in expenditures and foregone economic growth, here and in less-favored parts of the planet) to try to fine-tune the planet's temperature. We cannot know if these trillions would purchase benefits commensurate with the benefits that would have come from social wealth that was not produced.

In 1997, when the Kyoto Protocol's essential provisions were known, a "sense of the Senate" resolution declared opposition to any agreement that would do what the protocol aims to do. The Senate warned against any agreement that would require significant reductions of greenhouse-gas emissions in the United States and other developed nations without mandating "specific scheduled commitments" on the part of the 129 "developing" countries, which include China, India, Brazil and South Korea—the second, fourth, 10th and 11th largest economies. Nothing Americans can do to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions will make a significant impact on the global climate while every 10 days China fires up a coal-fueled generating plant big enough to power San Diego. China will construct 2,200 new coal plants by 2030.

The Senate's resolution expressed opposition to any agreement that "would result in serious harm to the economy of the United States," which the Senate correctly thought Kyoto would do. The Senate said any agreement should be accompanied by "a detailed explanation of any legislation or regulatory actions that may be required to implement" it, and an analysis of the agreement's "detailed financial costs and other impacts" on the U.S. economy.

The president is now on the side of the angels, having promised to "confront" the challenge of climate change. The confronting is one reason for his fascination with new fuels. (Another reason, he says, is U.S. imports of oil from unstable nations. Our largest foreign source of oil is turbulent Canada. Our second largest is Mexico, which is experiencing turbulence because of the soaring cost of tortillas. They are made from corn, which is ... well, read on.)

Ethanol produces just slightly more energy than it takes to manufacture it. But now that the government is rigging energy markets with mandates, tariffs and subsidies, ethanol production might consume half of next year's corn crop. The price of corn already has doubled in a year. Hence the tortilla turbulence south of the border. Forests will be felled (will fewer trees mean more global warming?) to clear land for growing corn, which requires fertilizer, the manufacture of which requires energy. Oh, my.

President Clinton and his earnest vice president knew better than to seek ratification of Kyoto by a Senate that had passed its resolution of disapproval 95-0. Fifty-six of those 95 senators are still serving. Two of them are John Kerry and Barbara Boxer. That is an inconvenient truth.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Charles A. Radin, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 3, 2007

Called members of drug rings tying Canada to Boston area

They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business. But yesterday law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston.

Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday and unsealed yesterday charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering.

"This ecstasy was manufactured in clandestine laboratories in Canada, then smuggled into the United States, ending up in Boston and further distributed to gangs and other buyers in the city," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Boston office.

The alleged drug organization was dismantled from top to bottom by investigators who targeted the Canadian supplier and arrested local gangs that sold the drugs in the Boston area, Stansbury told reporters during a news conference yesterday.

The investigation started when an immigrant, who was facing possible deportation in February 2005 after his arrest on charges involving drugs, guns, and an assault on a police officer, began cooperating with Boston police and the DEA and identified a list of local drug dealers, according to an affidavit filed in federal court.

A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials.

Investigators seized 85,000 ecstasy pills, worth nearly $2.6 million on the street, 130 pounds of marijuana, five guns, and $25,000.

Law enforcement officials raided houses in Dorchester and Quincy yesterday and arrested 21 of those charged.

The remaining two suspects were being sought last night, officials said.

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the indictments "will have an immediate and positive impact on the city of Boston and the neighboring communities."

Some of the ecstasy pills seized were laced with methamphetamine, which was added by the manufacturer to make the drug more addictive.

Sullivan called the mixture "a dangerous trend" that has been developing across the country over the past few years.

Boston Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis said, "These drugs that were being sold on the streets of our city were destroying the qualify of life for people and driving the crime rate up."

Among those indicted were a family that lives on Bloomfield Street in Dorchester, including Tiem Trinh , 54; his wife, Anna , 51; and their sons Antwon Trinh , 24, and Quoc Boa Trinh, 27.

DOJ_NMG_0126988

Quoc Boa Trinh, an alleged ringleader, is charged in three separate indictments with conspiring to sell ecstasy and marijuana and money laundering.

His parents and brother are charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

Boston lawyer Michael C. Andrews, who is representing Quoc Boa Trinh, said his client works at his father's convenience store, TJ Variety, and is "a hard-working young man from a good family."

His client is "looking forward to his day in court," Andrews said.

A neighbor of the Trinhs said they "were very nice people."

"I don't know much about them, but we never had any trouble," the neighbor said.

The family had lived in the house for more than two years, the neighbor said.

But affidavits filed in federal court offered a different portrait.

A witness told investigators that Quoc Boa Trinh wore a bulletproof vest, owned a couple of guns, and obtained up to 300 pounds of marijuana a week from his supplier, Tan Dinh Phung, 43, of Dorchester. Phung was also arrested yesterday.

Last night, investigators were searching for Hung Van Le, 37, of Revere and Van H. Nguyen, 25, of Dorchester.

Affidavits also assert that Nguyen and another man indicted , Long T. Vu, picked up 40,000 ecstasy pills in Buffalo in December. They were stopped by Massachusetts State Police, who seized the drugs. Vu, 23, of Christy Lane in Randolph, is in custody.

DEA: Wide-ranging Drug Ring Busted (BOSH)

Boston Herald, February 3, 2007

Federal authorities said they seized 85,000 tablets of ecstasy and 100 pounds of marijuana when they dismantled what they described as an international drug ring with tentacles that reached north to Canada and across the Pacific to Vietnam.

Twenty-three defendants - all Vietnamese or Vietnamese Americans from Dorchester, Quincy, and Randolph - are accused of orchestrating the operation, distributing the drugs and laundering thousands in cash. Nineteen of them were arrested in a sweep Thursday and yesterday by federal agents. Arraignments are set for Monday.

The Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating the operation for the past 15 months though surveillance, undercover purchases and “trash pulls” - or garbage searches.

All of the ecstasy and some of the greenhouse-grown marijuana came from Canada, agents said, and hundreds of pounds of marijuana were moved into the United States each week. The ring transferred the money it reaped in the United States to Canada and Vietnam.

Federal prosecutors now want the defendants to turn over hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash and land purchases. The ring had more than $150,000 in Bank of America accounts, $16,000 in money orders and three pieces of property, one in Dorchester and two in New York state,federal court documents state.

Feds Charge 23 In Ecstasy, Marijuana Ring (AP)

BOSTON (AP) - Federal authorities in Boston say 23 people in four states are facing drug charges for allegedly operating an ecstasy and marijuana ring with suppliers from Canada.

All but one of the defendants is Vietnamese, and most live in the Boston area.

One suspect lives in Woonsocket, Rhode Island; another in Hamden, Connecticut.

Nineteen arrests were made early Friday and authorities were searching for the other four.

Prosecutors say none of those charged live in Canada.

At the peak of the operation, officials say several hundred pounds of marijuana were transported to the Boston area from Canada and other U-S points.

The probe started in October 2005 and resulted in the seizure of 85-thousand ecstasy pills and 100 pounds of marijuana.

Mexico's Gangs Take Over U.S. Meth Trade (AR)

The Arizona Republic, February 4, 2007

MEXICO CITY - Four guards lay dead in pools of blood, their hands and feet bound with gray duct tape, as dawn broke over the Medix pharmaceutical plant in Mexico City. The gate was open, the security system dismantled.

It looked as well-planned as a bank heist. Except these robbers made off with a far bigger treasure: more than one ton of the chemical pseudoephedrine, enough to make 4 million hits of crystal methamphetamine, the hottest drug in America. The finished product could fetch $120 million on U.S. street corners.

The robbery at the Medix lab in July is part of a boom in Mexican meth as "superlabs" controlled by Mexican cartels take over what was once a mom-and-pop business in the United States.

"Mexican drug-trafficking organizations, being the entrepreneurs they are . . . decided they could produce large amounts of meth in Mexico, then smuggle it across the Southwest border using the same drug routes they've used for generations," said Steve Robertson, a spokesman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The cartels' labs in Mexico and California now produce about 80 percent of the meth in the United States, according to a November report by the U.S. National Drug Intelligence Center. And the cartels are far more organized than previous meth rings.

In August, Arizona prosecutors filed indictments against 69 people suspected of working with a meth and cocaine ring in Mexico's Sinaloa state. Police seized 50 pounds of meth and $2.5 million in cash.

"These were very sophisticated criminal operations," Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said. "They had lots of foot soldiers, they were very well armed, they were incredibly well financed. They are a very, very serious opponent."

A new business

Ice, crank, crystal, tweak, chalk, glass or speed: Methamphetamine goes by a lot of names. It's one of the most addictive drugs around and is as dangerous to make as it is to consume. The "cooking" process creates toxic chemicals, and labs often catch fire or explode.

For decades, homemade meth was a small-time drug. Meth "cooks" worked in home kitchens, making a few ounces for themselves or to sell through motorcycle gangs. A typical dose is one-quarter of a gram and costs $30, though price and purity vary widely.

The most popular meth recipe uses ephedrine, an ingredient in some asthma medications, or its chemical cousin pseudoephedrine, which is widely used in cold remedies.

But since the late 1990s, U.S. states have been passing laws limiting the sale of those drugs. Arizona passed a law in 2006 limiting purchases to 9 grams. Phoenix, Tucson, and 44 other Arizona cities and towns adopted even tougher rules, and President Bush signed a similar federal law in March.

As the raw materials become harder to get, small-time cooks are being put out of business. The Mexican cartels have rushed to fill the demand with California-based superlabs, which can produce more than 10 pounds of meth a day.

Less sophisticated cooks are usually caught when neighbors notice chemical smells or suspicious people hanging around at odd hours. But the Mexican cartels have built their superlabs shacks in remote areas of California's Central Valley.

Many of the labs have ventilation systems to combat the smells, and smugglers visit only a few times a week to pick up meth or drop off supplies. That makes the labs hard to find.

"We still have what we call the Beavis and Butthead labs . . . but the ones that we really have problems with are the large labs, the superlabs or even megalabs," said Kent Shaw, assistant chief of California's Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement. "Those are run by organized-crime groups, and almost exclusively those are Mexican-operated drug cartels."

To augment their labs in California, the Mexican cartels began building labs in Mexico, where, until a recent crackdown, it was easy to import tons of raw pseudoephedrine from Asia.

In 2004, a Mexican government study found Mexico was importing four times the pseudoephedrine needed to treat the country's respiratory illnesses.

As the labs in Mexico ramp up production, meth seizures at border ports along the drug's main smuggling routes - California, Arizona, New Mexico and western Texas - have risen from 1,130 pounds in the 2002 fiscal year to 3,648 pounds in fiscal 2006.

"Most of the meth on the street right now is crystal meth from Mexico, I have no doubt about that," Goddard said. "It has created a national phenomenon, where a few years ago it was a regional phenomenon."

Butterflies and ice

For eons the towering fir trees of Michoacan state have sheltered clouds of monarch butterflies that migrate from across North America during the winter. They used to be the western state's only claim to international fame.

But now Michoacan is known for something else: cheap, high-quality meth.

Michoacan is ideally located between two big sources of raw materials: pharmaceutical plants in Mexico City, increasingly a target for looters, and the Pacific seaports where shipments of pseudoephedrine arrive from factories in Asia. Couriers take finished meth to Arizona and California along Mexico's Highway 15. Of the 31 major meth labs dismantled in Mexico in the past two years, 12 were in Michoacan, a Republic analysis shows.

During the same period, the state has become one of the bloodiest battlefields between warring cartels. Gangs have taken to decapitating their rivals: In one case in September, gunmen barged into a nightclub and threw five severed heads onto the dance floor.

In December, incoming President Felipe Calderón ordered 7,000 soldiers and federal police into Michoacan to stop the violence. During one raid, they seized 21 tons of Chinese pseudoephedrine at the port of Lazaro Cardenas. It was the biggest such bust in Mexican history.

Cracking down

Despite the boom, many experts believe the Mexican meth labs may have peaked.

"Further production increases are unlikely in the near term," the National Drug Intelligence Center said in its report.

It cited new rules the Mexican government has imposed on importers of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine. Authorities slashed the number of import permits from 246 tons in 2004 to 77 tons in 2006. Companies can import only 6,600 pounds of raw ephedrine or pseudoephedrine at a time, and they can get import permits only if the government determines there are enough patients to warrant more drug production.

To keep feeding the drug labs, gangs have begun looting pharmaceutical factories and hijacking medicine shipments. In August, shortly after the Medix heist, robbers stole a truck full of cold medicine from the Diprofar plant in Mexico City but were quickly caught.

In November, another gang killed a police officer and stole a truck full of cold medicine from the Marsan plant on the outskirts of the city.

The supply problem is acute because there are no producers of raw pseudoephedrine or ephedrine in Latin America.

"These (gangs) are facing serious difficulties in switching to the trafficking of pseudoephedrine," Mexican Attorney General Eduardo Medina told lawmakers in January.

Meanwhile, the U.S. has started training Mexican police to find meth labs. In September, 49 agents and six prosecutors graduated from the DEA's new anti-meth school in Quantico, Va. The U.S. government plans to train 1,000 more officers and is providing them hazardous-materials trucks.

"Whatever our differences in language, culture and, at times, opinion, we are united partners in our desire to drive the drug traffickers out of business and into jail," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a binational conference on meth last year.

Palm Beach Post, February 3, 2007

Two Jupiter men were sentenced to life in federal prison Thursday for their roles in a countywide cocaine distribution ring.

Their supplier, a Boynton Beach man, was sentenced to 20 years.

Winfred Lorenzo Hunt, 33, and Leonard Allen, Jr., 31, sold the narcotic from Delray Beach to Jupiter, with Hunt dealing about 2 kilograms of crack cocaine and a kilogram of powder cocaine a week, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Carlton Potts, 41, supplied Hunt with 2 to 3 kilograms of powder cocaine a week for more than 10 months. Hunt then turned the cocaine into crack cocaine and sold it on the streets of Delray Beach, officials said.

They were arrested along with 35 others in May in a massive sweep that included 450 officers from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office and the Boynton Beach, Delray Beach and Jupiter police departments.

Sixteen of those arrested are serving sentences ranging from two to 10 years, officials said.

Operation Magnum Force, the investigation leading to their convictions, spanned a year.

Hunt, considered a ringleader, had been arrested more than 25 times, according to Florida Department of Law Enforcement records. He was charged with several violent crimes, including shooting a 17-year-old in the abdomen, according to police records.

Allen had three prior convictions for selling cocaine, records show.

Potts' record includes 30 arrests on charges such as burglary, battery, drug sales and attempted murder.

"The investigation was in response to a community outcry for help," Delray Beach police Lt. Tommy Mitchell said. "It was a community effort involving law enforcement and the neighborhoods in which the drugs were being distributed."

Heroin In The Suburbs: Some Experts See Use On The Rise (PHI)

By Andrew Maykuth And Julie Stoiber

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

The questioning last week of the eldest son of Eagles coach Andy Reid in Montgomery County and his alleged confession of heroin use has renewed attention to narcotics abuse by affluent suburbanites.

"These stories are not uncommon, but they still seem to shock people," said Jeremiah Daley, executive director of the Philadelphia County High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area, a law enforcement clearinghouse.

While national statistics indicate that heroin abuse has been steady in recent years, some Philadelphia-area drug-treatment experts say it appears to be on the rise.

"We're seeing a number of young, affluent kids getting themselves hooked on heroin," said Risa Vetri Ferman, first assistant district attorney in Montgomery County, where Garrett Reid, 23, was taken in for questioning after his Jeep Liberty reportedly was speeding, ran a red light, and crashed into a Ford sedan Tuesday in Plymouth Township. Police said Garrett Reid had acknowledged using heroin that day and possessed drug paraphernalia.

"I wouldn't call it an epidemic, but it's a trend," she said. She declined to speak specifically about Garrett Reid or his brother Britt, 21, whom police questioned after a separate road-rage confrontation in West Conshohocken the same day.

Kim Bowman, executive director of the Chester County Department of Drug and Alcohol Services, said she believed more young people were dabbling with the drug, which can be injected or inhaled in powder form.

In a survey of 2,839 Chester County high school seniors last year, Bowman said, 1.3 percent said they had used heroin the previous month - above the national average. Four years before, 0.3 percent admitted using the opiate.

Other law enforcement officials, however, say national statistics do not support the anecdotal accounts of regional officials.

"Heroin has been and continues to be a drug-trafficking and drug-abuse problem in the Philadelphia area," Daley said. "It has not changed much in the past eight to 10 years."

William R. Hocker, spokesman for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said heroin use appeared stable.

"Heroin's a mainstay," he said. "It's always going to be there."

Most studies peg the number of Americans using heroin at a fraction of 1 percent. The federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration in 2004 estimated that 400,000 people had used heroin the previous year, compared with 25.5 million marijuana and hashish users and 5.8 million cocaine users.

But heroin remains one of the most ferociously addictive drugs, and the tolerance that users develop with prolonged use can lead a two-bag-a-week dabbler to escalate into a 12-bag-a-day addict. A bag typically costs $10 to $20.

While heroin use may be steady, there was a dramatic increase in deaths last year tied to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl.

In Philadelphia, about 70 people died last year from fentanyl-laced heroin, Hocker said.

In South Jersey, 133 people died between April and September from spiked heroin, half of them outside of Camden County, said Capt. Joe Bowen, with the Camden County Prosecutor's Office.

DOJ_NMG_0126992

Bowen said that heroin had lost much of its stigma, and that young suburbanites routinely ventured into Camden to score from street-corner dealers.

"It's become more acceptable, more social," he said. "These young kids are not scared of heroin."

Lloyd D. Johnston, a researcher at the University of Michigan and principal investigator for its annual survey of drug abuse, said heroin use among teens increased in the early 1990s, when the purity rose and forms of heroin that could be snorted or inhaled became more widely available.

Johnston's survey found that reported heroin use among eighth graders jumped in the early 1990s, reaching 1.2 percent in 1994. Use later declined and is now stable at about 0.8 percent.

Some heroin users say they started out first abusing legal painkillers such as OxyContin, an opiate frequently prescribed for patients recovering from surgery or injuries.

Most experts say the common impression of a heroin user as a destitute urban dweller is out of date.

"Our perception of an addict is someone who shoots dope, is homeless, and has lost everything," said William J. Lorman, clinical director of residential services at the Livengrin Foundation in Bensalem. "That is becoming less and less the case. We are seeing more middle-class working folks, young adults."

In that sense, the case of Garrett Reid is unusual only in that his father is a famous football coach, known as a practicing Mormon. The faith forbids use of alcohol, caffeine and drugs.

"It's sad that the Reid family has to deal with a substance-abuse problem in its midst with all the media attention," Daley said. "It's sadder still how may thousands of other families in the Delaware Valley have to deal with this every day."

Authorities served a search warrant Tuesday at Reid's home in Villanova. They said they had seized a shotgun and a handgun, along with containers of white powder or residue from a vehicle.

No charges have been filed against either of Reid's sons, and officials said their investigation was continuing. Police said they were waiting for drug and toxicology test results.

IMMIGRATION:

Ex-officer Pleads Guilty To Immigration Fraud (DMN)

By Jason Trahan, The Dallas Morning News Jtrahan@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 3, 2007

Dallas: He faces 10 years in deal for helping wife obtain fake visa

A former Dallas police officer has pleaded guilty to a federal charge of immigration fraud for helping his wife, a native of Mexico who was in the U.S. illegally and had ties to drug traffickers, obtain a fake visa.

Jose Luis Cabrera, 37, an 11-year Dallas Police Department veteran, was fired in December after a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment accusing him of conspiring with his wife, Moraima Cabrera, 34, to commit passport fraud.

Prosecutors on Thursday also said they had reached a plea deal with Mohammad Hakemy, 39, of Southlake, who officials said helped Mrs. Cabrera get a fake passport in 2002.

Mr. Hakemy, who owns several liquor stores and other businesses in the area, was once in a relationship with her. They have a 12-year-old daughter.

The Cabreras married in 2004.

Both Mr. Hakemy and Mr. Cabrera face up to 10 years in prison if their plea deals are accepted by a federal judge. Each could receive lighter sentences if they cooperate by giving prosecutors information about other crimes, but the U.S. attorney's office declined Thursday to say what cases they might know about.

Mrs. Cabrera has pleaded not guilty in her own case. She is accused of obtaining a driver's license and passport under a fake name and using it to travel to France and Italy with Mr. Hakemy, and, later, to Colombia with her husband after they married.

Her attorney, Jay Ethington, said she is ready for trial on Feb. 26. He said she hasn't been offered a plea bargain.

Patrick McClain, Mr. Cabrera's attorney, could not be reached for comment. Mr. Hakemy's attorney, Kevin Clancy, declined to comment on his client's plea deal.

Mrs. Cabrera helped prosecutors make cases against drug traffickers in the late 1990s after she herself faced a felony drug charge.

After they married in March 2004, Mr. Cabrera was so desperate for his wife to avoid deportation to Mexico that, according to federal officials, in April 2005 he brought her to the Dallas office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. He offered agents a deal: His wife would share what she learned from her drug trafficking past in exchange for legal immigration status. The interview room was wired, according to authorities, and efforts by the DEA to follow up with the couple were unsuccessful. Mrs. Cabrera remained in the country illegally.

The pair traveled to Colombia shortly after their marriage to visit Mr. Cabrera's family. Mr. Cabrera also accompanied his wife when she transported more than $50,000 in cash across the border to Mexico. She told federal agents that the money belonged to another woman and that she was delivering it.

The current federal indictment makes no allegations of drug activity against either Mrs. Cabrera, her husband or Mr. Hakemy. But authorities say more charges and more arrests are pending.

Guatemalans In S. Florida Face Expulsion (FLSUNSEN)

By Tal Abbady, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 5, 2007

Juana Tomas resolved to forget the ghosts of San Miguel Acatán.

She fled her native Guatemalan village, tucked in the rural highlands where civil war raged, and headed north in 1991.

In the United States, Tomas sought political asylum. She was 17. Adolescence turned into adulthood. She gave birth to two sons and made a home for them in Lake Worth, joining a large, Qanjobal-speaking community of Mayan farm workers and day laborers in Palm Beach County. Raising her children and working in a nursery, she waited for a response from the government.

Fifteen years later in 2006, Tomas, now 33, learned that federal authorities denied her asylum claim. An immigration judge recently ordered her deported to Guatemala, a country still reeling from the effects of a war that ended a decade ago. Advocates say she is one of roughly 250,000 Guatemalans whose asylum claims from the 1990s U.S. authorities rejected. All could be deported.

U.S. officials say Guatemalans no longer qualify for political asylum because their country's civil war ended in 1996. Due to a massive backlog, the government only last year began notifying applicants that they must leave the country, immigration lawyers say.

During her long wait, Tomas took refuge in her new home and put the war behind her. A childhood memory of the great-aunt she saw dragged and decapitated slowly faded. So did the image of a neighbor whose body she found hanging from a tree one night while gathering firewood with her father. Every year, she renewed her work permit, raised her sons, and had little idea that her newfangled American life was built on borrowed time.

"The memories are less now. But I can't go back. We have a life here. There's only poverty in Guatemala, and crime," said Tomas in a dimly lighted apartment she shares with U.S.-born sons, Alex, 14, and Jesus, 10, and another family.

Now Tomas finds herself challenging the government whose protection she sought. She and other exiles in Florida, home to 28,650 Guatemalans, plan to join a California lawsuit against the Justice Department, said her attorney, Aileen Josephs.

Attorneys for the nonprofit group Casa de Cultura de Guatemala in Los Angeles are preparing a lawsuit demanding a halt to pending deportations of Guatemalans who entered the United States before the end of the civil war. The suit, which will seek class-action status, also will ask for legal status for Guatemalans who applied for asylum after 1990 but before that country's 1996 peace accords. Those who applied in the 1980s are protected under a federal program.

South Florida Guatemalan activists also have mobilized. Members of the Miami-based Coalition of Guatemalan Immigrants in the United States met with representatives of Congress in late January to press for a moratorium on deportations.

"Just when Congress is about to renew the push for immigration reform, immigration authorities decide to dump all these Guatemalan asylum cases," said Marlon Gonzalez, the coalition's president.

Government officials restricted their comments because of the pending lawsuit.

"We look at every case diligently before we let someone know they've been denied asylum," said Chris Bentley, spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Tomas, who was 8 when she says soldiers burned her house and jailed her father for one year, lived among villagers caught in the crossfire between leftist guerrillas and government militias that fanned out into the country's highlands. Roughly 200,000 Guatemalans died in the 36-year war, many of them indigenous farm workers.

"If the soldiers saw you speaking to the guerrillas, they killed you. If the guerrillas saw you speaking to the soldiers, they killed you. You spoke to no one. You locked yourself up inside your house," Tomas recalled.

In 1997, the Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act allowed Guatemalans who applied for asylum in the 1980s to seek legal residency, but it did not grant benefits to those who fled during the last years of the war.

Advocates argue that because the U.S. government had a role in the civil war that displaced about 1 million Guatemalans, all asylum seekers from that era should be allowed to stay here.

"The government that provoked this war is forcing us back to a country that we no longer know, a country where people now live in anarchy, amid gangs," said Byron Vasquez, director of the Case de la Cultura de Guatemala.

Vasquez referred to the U.S.-backed ouster of democratically elected leftist president Jacobo Arbenz Guzman in 1954, an event that was followed by years of instability and, in 1960, the rise of successive right-wing governments that, with U.S. support, waged decades of war against leftist guerrillas.

Despite the peace accord between the military and an umbrella leftist group, kidnappings and gang-related crime have overwhelmed parts of Guatemala.

"You could say, in quotation marks, that the war ended. But the war's legacy is the gangs. They'll murder you over a cell phone," said Reyna Valenzuela, a Hollywood housekeeper who left Guatemala in 1983 and is now a U.S. resident. Her nephew, Lester Betancourt, 17, was shot and strangled in the town of Villa Nueva last year by gang members, she said.

TAX:

Barry At Risk Of Losing Probation (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors want to revoke D.C. Council member Marion Barry's probation in a criminal tax case because he has failed to pay 2005 federal and D.C. income taxes.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys James Cooper and Thomas Zeno said in a court memo Friday that Mr. Barry, a former D.C. mayor, has shown "unworthiness to reap the benefits of a lenient sanction." Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying his income taxes, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office.

Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying taxes for five years, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office. A spokesman declined to comment on the development.

"The court's patience should be at an end," the prosecutors wrote. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own return for six years."

Mr. Barry, a Ward 8 Democrat and four-term mayor, also has not made arrangements to pay taxes on more than $500,000 he earned in previous years, officials said.

The prosecutors call Mr. Barry's failure to file 2005 tax returns the latest in a series of "willful acts in defiance of the tax laws." They also say Mr. Barry's actions puts him in violation of an express condition of his release.

Mr. Barry asked the Internal Revenue Service for an extension to allow him to file his return by Oct. 15. However, no return had been filed as of last week, according to an affidavit submitted by an IRS special agent investigating the case.

The IRS began garnishing Mr. Barry's paycheck in November.

In December, the D.C. council voted to raise members' salaries to $115,000 a year.

Mr. Barry could not be reached for comment yesterday. WTOP Radio, which has reported on the request to revoke Mr. Barry's probation, reported that the tax troubles could be the result of his changing accountants.

If prosecutors succeed in getting probation revoked, Mr. Barry could return to prison. He faced up to 18 months in prison under sentencing guidelines before getting probation in the tax case.

Mr. Barry served six months in prison in 1990 after he was convicted of cocaine possession.

During a court-ordered drug test in the criminal tax case, Mr. Barry tested positive for cocaine and marijuana use. Under his probation, he must stay drug-free. The memo seeking to revoke Mr. Barry's probation gave no indication that he had relapsed.

Even if Mr. Barry goes to prison, he technically could retain his council seat because the criminal tax case charged him with a misdemeanor, not a felony crime.

Prosecutors did not charge Mr. Barry with tax evasion, a felony.

Citing Mr. Barry's prompt guilty plea in 2005, prosecutors at the time agreed to take no position at his sentencing on whether he deserved prison time.

Their memo last week, though, said Mr. Barry has continued to flout the "standards applicable to all persons who reside in the District of Columbia who pay a portion of their income to support his salary."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Nominate Former White House Associate Counsel To D.C. Court (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 5, 2007

President George W. Bush is expected to nominate former White House insider Dabney Friedrich to fill the recently vacated seat on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, two sources familiar with the process say.

The White House is in the final stages of finalizing her nomination to replace Judge Gladys Kessler, who took senior status last month.

Friedrich, 39, was appointed to the U.S. Sentencing Commission in December. Before that she spent three years as an associate counsel in the White House, where she oversaw judicial nominations, including nominations for the Supreme Court.

A Yale Law School graduate, Friedrich began her career as a clerk on the District Court to now-Chief Judge Thomas Hogan. In 1994, she joined Latham & Watkins in San Diego. A year later she became a prosecutor in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, where she worked with now-U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Jeffrey Taylor.

In 1998, she moved to the Eastern District of Virginia, where she served until 2002. That year, Friedrich was hired as a staffer for the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

She is married to Matthew Friedrich, former Enron task force prosecutor and now counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Bush Budget Projects A Surplus By 2012 (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The budget that President Bush will submit to Congress today shows the federal deficit falling in each of the next four years and would produce a $61 billion surplus in 2012, administration officials said. But to get there, Bush is counting on strong economic growth, diminishing costs in the Iraq war and tight domestic spending to offset the cost of his tax cuts.

Democrats yesterday criticized the five-year budget plan as overly optimistic, and predicted that extending the tax cuts past their 2010 expiration date would dig the nation deeper into debt rather than produce a budget surplus. Republicans countered that the tax cuts are critical to maintaining a healthy economy and that a balanced budget is not possible without them.

"Raising taxes . . . won't help balance the budget -- it will slow the economic growth that is creating the new jobs of tomorrow and increasing revenue to the federal government," House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) wrote in an essay distributed yesterday by his office. "Keeping our economy strong and promoting fiscal responsibility will get the job done. Raising taxes won't."

Republicans hope to make the tax cuts a central feature of this year's budget debate, the first in which Bush will present his request to a Democratic Congress. Both the White House and Democratic leaders have vowed to eliminate the federal deficit by 2012, but Democrats have signaled their intention to do it in part by targeting tax breaks for corporations and taxpayers earning more than $500,000 a year.

"We think it's absolutely critical that they be extended in 2010, when they otherwise would expire. Why? Because they have contributed to this growing economy," White House budget director Rob Portman said yesterday on CNN's "Late Edition."

"We think it would be a mistake and a risk to our strong economy to have these tax cuts not continue," Portman added.

Recent estimates by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office suggest that it would be difficult to balance the budget if the tax cuts -- a collection of rate reductions and tax credits that have reduced Treasury collections by an estimated $1 trillion since 2001 -- continue.

According to the CBO, a vibrant economy has indeed produced a gusher of revenue over the past two years that could help turn the nation's $248 billion deficit into a $170 billion surplus by 2012. But if the tax cuts and other expiring tax provisions are extended, the CBO predicts, the deficit would hit $146 billion in 2012 and grow thereafter as health costs skyrocket and the baby-boom generation retires.

The White House takes a different view, assuming that continuing the tax cuts would produce slightly more robust economic growth than the CBO foresees.

"The big difference between CBO and us is the tax relief. They don't make it permanent, and we do. And we stand behind the economic benefits of the tax relief," said an administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the budget had not yet been released.

There are other differences between the two projections. Bush's budget projects slower spending growth from 2008 to 2012, with outlays rising 11.8 percent, compared with 14.7 percent in the CBO's estimates.

Administration officials also exclude some potentially expensive items. Their request, for the first time, attempts to show the true cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in the coming fiscal year, $145 billion, but includes just $50 billion for fiscal 2009 and nothing thereafter.

The president's budget would also reduce spending for Medicare and Medicaid, the federal government's health programs for the elderly and the poor, by about $100 billion over five years. And it would provide insufficient extra cash to maintain coverage for poor children currently enrolled in the Children's Health Insurance Program.

Democrats blasted those proposals, noting that the Republican-controlled Congress last year did not approve much smaller reductions in federal health-care spending.

"Rather than trying to solve our health care crisis by lowering costs and covering more people, the President's plan will make the crisis worse by raising costs and failing to cover those who need it most -- our nation's children," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said yesterday in a statement.

Democrats also pointed to an assumption common to projections by the CBO and White House: Both assume that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to expand to millions of additional families, generating billions in additional tax dollars by 2012. Democrats and some Republicans have vowed to halt the growth of the tax and, ultimately, repeal it.

Portman said the White House proposal is a "tight budget, but a more realistic budget" that contains much to appeal to Democrats, such as a small increase in non-security domestic spending, the first in two years.

But Democrats were skeptical.

"With their track record, everything they present is going to be viewed skeptically. Because they've been deceptive year after year after year," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). "Every projection shows the cost of making all the tax cuts permanent explodes at the very time the baby boomers start to retire," driving "the deficit and the growth of the debt to the moon."

Bush To Submit $2.9 Trillion Budget (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

President Bush will send Congress a $2.9 trillion spending request today that seeks billions of dollars more to fight the Iraq war and tries to restrain the spiraling cost of the government's big health care programs.

Responding to the new political realities of a Democrat-controlled Congress, Mr. Bush will propose balancing the budget in five years, matching a goal put forward by Democratic leaders. But Mr. Bush would achieve that feat while protecting his cherished first-term tax cuts.

The arrival of the massive four-volume set of green budget books, which will cover the budget year that begins Oct. 1, will be followed by months of debate in Congress. Democrats charged that Mr. Bush wants to make painful cuts across a wide swath of government programs to protect his tax cuts and to keep funneling money to the unpopular Iraq war.

"It just gives you sticker shock. Every time you turn around, it's another $100 billion," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat, said of Mr. Bush's war spending.

The federal deficit hit an all-time high under Mr. Bush of $413 billion in 2004. It has been declining since that time and the 2008 budget projects it will continue to decline and show a surplus in 2012, three years after Mr. Bush leaves office.

To accomplish those reductions, Mr. Bush would allow only modest growth in the government programs outside of defense and homeland security. He is proposing eliminations or sharp reductions in 141 government programs, for a savings over five years of $12 billion, although Congress has rejected many of the same proposals over the past two years.

Mr. Bush also will seek to trim spending on farm subsidies by $18 billion over five years, mainly by reducing payments to wealthier farmers, an effort certain to spark resistance among farm-state lawmakers.

The president's budget would achieve nearly $100 billion in savings over five years by trimming increases in Medicare, the health insurance program for 43 million retirees and disabled, and Medicaid which provides health care to the poor.

The president appealed for Democratic support during an appearance at a House Democrats' retreat on Saturday, saying the government must do something to restrain the soaring costs of costs of entitlement spending on health care and Social Security before the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers.

"I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be," he told the Democrats. "The only thing I want to share with you is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

For the first time, Mr. Bush will spell out details of the spending requests for Iraq and Afghanistan in the budget books. Previously, he has lumped that spending into supplemental requests with less detail.

Mr. Bush said he would ask for an additional $100 billion for Iraq and the global war on terrorism this year, on top of $70 billion already sought. For 2008, that spending would drop to $145 billion and fall to $50 billion in 2009, although administration officials conceded that the 2008 and 2009 requests could go higher depending on the progress of the war effort.

As in past years, the Pentagon is scheduled to get a hefty increase in spending authority of 11 percent, pushing its 2008 budget to $481.4 billion.

Tank-size Defense Request (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — When the Bush administration unveils its annual spending request today, it is expected to ask for a defense budget of $481 billion — near historic highs, even when adjusted for inflation.

It will also ask for additional funding for Iraq and Afghanistan, taking the cost of those wars this year to close to $165 billion, and will present estimates for next year's costs that would push war spending above the total cost of the Vietnam War.

But if the military's top officers have their way, today's proposal may be only a precursor to a future of even larger defense budgets.

The chiefs of the Army, Navy and Air Force are gearing up for a long-term campaign to convince Congress and the public that the growing demands of the Iraq war — plus the administration's aggressive global security ambitions — require tens of billions more each year to meet the nation's defense needs.

For more than a year, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the outgoing Army chief of staff, has pointed out that defense spending accounts for about 3.8% of the gross domestic product — a figure that is projected to drop over the next five years, to near the lowest levels since World War II, even though the U.S. is involved in protracted fighting.

He is calling for a wider national debate on whether that percentage should be significantly increased — and the chiefs of the Navy and Air Force said in interviews last week that they would publicly support that call in upcoming hearings on the defense budget.

"In working that [budget] problem, I believe I'm seeing challenges that leads us to the notion that maybe it's time to have this discussion about a higher percentage of GDP" devoted to defense, Air Force Gen. T. Michael "Buzz" Moseley said in a telephone interview during a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq.

"It's going to be very, very hard to get where we're going as defined in the [Pentagon's strategic plans] and to do this business on a global scale with the resources that we have."

Navy Adm. Michael G. Mullen added: "At 3.8%, it just isn't enough for the strategic appetite, and the strategic appetite is tied directly to the world we're living in."

According to a senior Pentagon official, the Air Force alone is expected to tell Congress that it will need an additional $20 billion per year over the next five years, on top of the White House funding request, just to meet the strategic plans laid out by the Pentagon and the increasing demands resulting from the troop buildup in Iraq.

Questions of sacrifice

It is certainly not unexpected for military officers to seek more money for personnel and weapons systems, defense budget experts said. But the increasingly vocal complaints from all three service chiefs, even as the administration is increasing troop levels in Iraq, add complexity to the debate over the war and the challenges presented by other global adversaries.

It is also, in part, a reflection of a view held by many throughout the armed services that the military is the only U.S. institution bearing the burden of the Iraq war. In interviews and in comments reported by superior officers, many veterans have argued that the U.S. hardly seems like a country at war, with civilians making little sacrifice even as troops put their lives on the line.

That perspective on the war may set up awkward circumstances for the White House and Congress. For the White House, the services' appeal for more funding comes as Democrats argue that repeated deployments to Iraq are leaving the military without the equipment and personnel it needs if other situations arise.

At the same time, congressional Democrats — whose new House and Senate majorities are largely based on opposition to Bush's Iraq policy — must also balance that opposition with the public's ongoing support for the troops in harm's way.

"Nobody wants to cut off somebody's body armor or someone's Humvee, or somebody's ability to sustain themselves in Baghdad," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition," referring to Democratic concerns that military spending is already too high. "Many people believe that the administration will turn around and say, 'See? They cut money from our troops that are there already.' "

Record spending

Any increase in military spending above the administration's request would be on top of what is, in inflation-adjusted dollars, one of the biggest defense budgets in history.

But even at those levels, the service chiefs argue that the war's wear and tear on their equipment, along with the strategic planning that calls on them to check such global threats as a rapidly modernizing China, a nuclear-armed North Korea and an increasingly hostile Iran, has begun to outstrip their ability to fund the Army brigades, Air Force wings and Navy strike groups needed to meet all contingencies.

"What I have found in the 18 months I have been here as chief is … the worldwide demands are increasing," said Mullen. "Obviously, there's an extraordinary amount of pressure on the ground forces, but there are other things in the world right now, and there will be in the future, that don't have anything to do with Iraq and Afghanistan."

Tough trade-offs

Some defense budget experts say the military is in a crisis of its own making. Although critics acknowledge that the armed forces faced a nearly decade-long "procurement holiday" at the end of the Cold War, they argue that the services chose to replace aging, overused weaponry with highly sophisticated, complicated armaments that in some cases cost three times the systems they replaced.

By attempting to take huge technological leaps instead of incremental improvements, these critics argue, the replacement weapons face years of delays and vast cost increases, forcing the Pentagon to buy fewer of each weapon.

"They have demonstrated that they have absolutely no discipline in dealing with the money they've gotten, and their only response when they get more money is to ask for still more money," said Winslow Wheeler, a former defense budget staffer in the Senate who now works for the nonpartisan Center for Defense Information.

According to an October study by the Congressional Budget Office, the Pentagon may need as much as $560 billion every year — or $80 billion more than the administration is proposing in the nonwar portion of its 2008 budget plan — just to pay for all the weapons on order and to meet growing personnel and operational costs.

The services insist that they are working to drive down such delays and costs, but defend the need to push the technological envelope.

"When you actually have to put someone in an airplane and send them into combat, do you want to win this ballgame by one run in the bottom of the ninth, or do want to have the game called in the seventh inning by 20 runs?" Moseley asked.

The first hints of a rebellion within the armed services over funding levels came last summer when Schoomaker, convinced that he did not have the resources to maintain troop levels in Iraq and meet the Army's other commitments, did not submit his 2008 budget plan to then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, saying Pentagon spending guidelines were nearly $25 billion short of what he needed.

When Bush's budget is announced today, Schoomaker is expected to get about $13 billion more than those original suggested guidelines. But his refusal to go along with the normal Pentagon process caused consternation among the other service chiefs. According to one senior Pentagon official, Mullen and Moseley confronted Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, expressing concerns that they were being penalized for playing by the rules.

"That has created some turmoil," said the Pentagon official. "It appears that a certain track and a certain behavior has paid off — and if that's reasonably valid, then stand by."

Another senior Defense official said the Air Force was likely to make an appeal directly to Congress that it is $9.8 billion short in 2008, and that over the next five years it will need about $20 billion more each year.

Mullen said he was not planning to go to Capitol Hill with a specific proposal for more money for the Navy, but he added that the current plan to reverse the shrinking number of ships under his command — there are now 276 warships, less than half the number in the 1980s — to a goal of 313 may not be sufficient.

"I'm about as tightly wound, budget-wise, as I can be and deliver the Navy we need for the future," Mullen said.

Defense budget experts said that any decision by Congress to examine greater increases in defense spending could evolve into a defining discussion over U.S. foreign policy goals and the Pentagon's vision of its armed services in a post-Cold War world.

"Clearly there's a big mismatch between the projected costs of the Defense Department's plans and the money that's currently projected to be provided for those plans," said Steven Kosiak, a defense budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a nonpartisan policy research organization. "Then the question becomes: Is the problem that not enough money is projected, or are the plans too ambitious?"

His Budget On The Line, Bush Courts Dems (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And David Jackson

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush presents a $2.9 trillion budget to Congress Monday amid a charm offensive intended to woo Democrats.

His speech Saturday at a House Democratic retreat was the latest effort to reach out to opposing party members, who felt widely ignored during six years of GOP dominance. It was his first visit to the annual retreat since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0127000

Bush said he understood Democrats' doubts about White House cooperation, but "in order to do big things, we're going to have to do it together."

Other signs of outreach:

•Bush regularly invites Democrats to the Oval Office and went out of his way to attend Saturday's getaway at Colonial Williamsburg, a historic district in Virginia. Before his Jan. 10 address on Iraq, Bush or top aides met with at least 45 congressional Democrats.

•Top administration officials, led by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House budget director Rob Portman, have made the rounds on Capitol Hill. They met with new committee chairmen and other influential Democrats, focusing particularly on moderates and those willing to work with the administration.

•The White House emphasizes areas of possible compromise, such as an expanded "guest worker" program for illegal immigrants and an increase in Pell grants for low- and middle-income college students. Both will be highlighted in the budget released Monday.

Even so, bigger issues loom. Congress has made clear its intention to play a stronger role on the Iraq war. Bush has stated his desire to tackle the long-term sustainability of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. Both sides want to balance the budget in five years but favor vastly different means to that end.

"This depends on the administration's attitude," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. A panel meeting he arranged with Paulson and Portman went well, he said, but "I don't know how short a leash they're on."

Trying to build trust

Bush's immediate predecessors reached deals across the aisle. President Clinton worked with Republicans to overhaul welfare. The first President Bush raised taxes to get a major deficit reduction agreement with Democrats. President Reagan worked with Democrats to revamp the tax code.

None of them had so little time to get accustomed to a Congress run by the other party. To fix the long-term financing of Medicare and Social Security, Bush will have to get along with Democrats like he did as Texas governor in the 1990s.

Presidential historian Fred Greenstein of Princeton University said Bush can do it by reverting to "the Texas persona." He sees more of the affable Reagan than the obstinate Woodrow Wilson in Bush, who began his presidency socializing with the Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy.

Others doubt Bush's ability to get major policies through a Democratic Congress. Republican John Kasich, who as House Budget Committee chairman helped craft a 1997 deficit reduction package with Clinton, said Bush lacks leverage. "People are not afraid of George Bush," he said.

Democrat Leon Panetta, a former Clinton chief of staff, said there's more bad blood to overcome now. "There has to be a degree of trust that you can work with the other side without getting a knife in your back," Panetta said.

That's where Paulson and Portman come in. The Treasury secretary, who left the chairmanship of Goldman Sachs to join the administration, has urged lawmakers to call him "Hank." His Wall Street pedigree gives him an above-politics reputation. The budget director, a former Republican congressman from Ohio and U.S. trade representative, wins friends with his personable demeanor.

"Part of this is about building trust," Portman said. "These are very frank exchanges."

Both Cabinet members want to make progress on what may be the toughest issue next to Iraq: making Medicare and Social Security whole for the long-term. Without changes in benefits, taxes or both, the programs will be insolvent within decades.

Portman worked with members from both parties before last week's announcement that Bush's proposed budget would include $25 million for 9/11-related health assistance. Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., credited his help.

"We want to get things done," Portman said. "There is a willingness to try to work together."

Democrats on the receiving end of the outreach give the administration better grades for style than substance. Still, Maloney said there is only one alternative: "Stalemate. No one wants that."

Lots of talk, little action

Paulson has used his friendship with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., whose help will be needed to get anything done on taxes, trade or entitlement programs. "There's no question in my mind that Hank Paulson is a very sincere man," Rangel said.

The Treasury secretary has also renewed ties with House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C., with whom he served as a budget analyst at the Pentagon during the Vietnam War. "It makes me more comfortable approaching Paulson," Spratt said.

Rep. Ellen Tauscher of California, chairwoman of the moderate New Democrat Coalition, said the administration should have the ability to wheel and deal with a Democratic Congress the way the Clinton White House did with a Republican majority. In his meeting with her group, Paulson "made all the right points" about working together and taking risks on tough issues, she said.

While the meetings have been cordial, Democrats say, little progress has been made. "With all of the progress in terms of discussion," Rangel said, "we haven't agreed on a darn thing so far."

Democrats say it's hard to trust an administration that largely ignored them when they were in the minority. "There's been virtually no communication for six years," said Rep. Allen Boyd of Florida, a co-chairman of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition, which met with Paulson and Portman. "There's a wall that exists. You have to figure out how to tear the wall down."

President Pushes Boost In Funding For National Parks (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — National parks would be a big winner under President Bush's 2008 budget, and a plan to match up to $100 million annually in private donations could guarantee increases for a decade.

Bush's budget, being unveiled today, would give the National Park Service $2.4 billion next year, administration officials told USA TODAY. That includes a $258 million increase for daily operations, up 14.5%. Since 2002, those funds have risen 1.5% above inflation.

The president proposes adding at least $100 million a year for the next 10 years. The funds would be used to hire 3,000 seasonal park rangers, guides and maintenance workers each summer, an increase of more than 50%. In addition, more than 1 million children could be enrolled in youth programs.

On top of that, Bush wants Congress to guarantee that the federal government would match philanthropic donations each year, up to another $100 million. Currently, about $20 million is contributed each year by supporters of national parks, such as family foundations.

Taken together, the proposals could provide $3 billion in new parks funding over the coming decade. In 2016, the parks will celebrate their 100th anniversary; Bush wants them to be in better shape than they are today.

"I think it can be a source of healing for Americans," Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said. "This one is not partisan. This one is American."

The proposal is being welcomed by groups that advocate on behalf of the nearly 400 sites managed by the National Park Service and have been a thorn in the Bush administration's side during lean years. The National Parks Conservation Association was seeking an increase of $250 million in operating funds for the parks.

"This is a renewed commitment that national parks should be a national priority," said Tom Kiernan, the group's president. "It's a catalyzing initiative at a wonderful time for the national parks."

The proposals would have to be approved separately by Congress. The $2.4 billion parks budget, with its record increase in operating funds, would become final if Congress allocates the funding. The matching-funds proposal would have to be approved by committees with jurisdiction over the Interior Department.

Taken together, they would add thousands of new park workers to guide visitors with programs such as interpretive walks and campfire talks. Volunteer coordinators would be added in 44 sites.

Seasonal workers have been cut during lean budget years, resulting in a 10-year decline.

"We simply have lost contact people who meet the American public," said Stephen Whitesell, superintendent of the San Antonio Missions National Historical Park in Texas. "What they're not seeing are rangers in flat hats."

Since 9/11, most of the money added to the National Park Service budget has gone for added security in such places as New York City, Washington, D.C., and along the U.S. borders with Canada and Mexico.

Some of the new funds will be used to attract young people to the parks through Internet programs and podcasts. Kempthorne and others see it as mutually beneficial: The parks would avoid a loss of visitors in future generations, and children would reap the health benefits of the great outdoors.

"We're competing with an electronic world," Kempthorne said.

Bush Plays Traffic Cop In Budget Request (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With much of his domestic agenda stalled by Congress, President Bush is embracing a new cause he is hoping will cross party lines and leave him with an end-of-term accomplishment: easing rush-hour traffic.

In his annual budget blueprint to be unveiled today, Mr. Bush intends to showcase a highway "congestion initiative," according to White House documents, with grants for state and local governments to experiment with anti-jam strategies.

In a surprise that could foreshadow how Mr. Bush might reach out to Democrats -- and disappoint conservatives -- for the rest of his term, the centerpiece of the traffic plan involves an initiative that some critics say amounts to a tax, a plan depicted by administration officials as "congestion pricing." The administration will award $130 million in grants starting this spring to help cities and states build electronic toll systems that would charge drivers fees for traveling in and out of big cities during peak traffic times. The money also could go to other congestion strategies such as expanded telecommuting, but administration officials make it clear they think congestion pricing is the most powerful tool they have. The White House will seek an additional $175 million for congestion initiatives in next year's budget.

Beyond automobile traffic, the administration will also introduce legislation soon that could seek to impose a form of "congestion pricing" on airline travel, likely through user fees on airlines. The idea is to spread flights more evenly.

Travel congestion is "increasingly troubling," Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said in an interview. "It's a cost to business and probably affects our ability to be competitive on the global market. But it's also something that just drives people crazy."

The White House is also planning a high-level transportation summit this month that will bring together officials from around the country to discuss the congestion initiative.

The Bush traffic plan is likely to draw support from some Democrats. It is reminiscent of Vice President Al Gore's 2000 campaign proposal to relieve traffic and other effects of urban sprawl through "smart growth" initiatives. Back then, Mr. Bush questioned the federal government's role in local planning.

Big-city mayors and urban business leaders may also embrace the administration initiative. Recently, many have been weighing politically dicey "congestion pricing," a strategy used to a limited extent today in Southern California, Denver and Minneapolis, among other places.

A New York business coalition that is pushing congestion pricing for lower Manhattan praised the new White House strategy. "Without some political cover ... it's a very hard thing to sell," says Kathryn Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City. "We think the federal government stepping up to provide incentives for local government to take on what is a tough issue ... is very important."

But some conservative allies of the administration fear the initiative could mark a turn for the president, who has made cutting taxes the core of his domestic policy. Some critics are already upset that Mr. Bush's new health-insurance proposals include higher taxes on individuals with high-price employer-provided plans, and worry that the White House would accept higher Social Security taxes as a part of a deal to overhaul the retirement program.

Highway tolls "are increasingly a form of tax" to support other government spending, for instance on mass transit, says Ronald Utt, an expert on transportation at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "Make it any more difficult or unattractive to get to downtown, and you'd reduce congestion -- but you'd do so largely by reducing jobs," he adds.

Anticipating such attacks, transportation officials have armed themselves with studies suggesting that traffic itself is becoming a big hidden tax on businesses across the country, as well as the No. 1 quality-of-life concern in many urban areas.

Congestion pricing "is a lot cheaper than the way we're paying now ... with time, unreliability, psychological hell," said Tyler Duvall, DOT's assistant secretary for policy.

The DOT estimates the total cost of U.S. congestion at about $200 billion annually, or almost 2% of GDP, counting wasted fuel, delays, environmental costs and increased inventory needs.

The White House, under fire for failing to embrace a more aggressive global-warming policy, is portraying the plan as part of a climate change strategy. Administration documents estimate that "travel delay ... wasted 2.3 billion gallons of fuel" in 2003, a total that "accounts for more than 20 million metric tons of carbon dioxide emissions."

In cities and regions that have adopted congestion-related fees, the most common approach is to offer solo commuters the choice of paying during rush hour to travel in the high-occupancy lanes reserved for car-poolers. Some tolls on existing turnpikes also have been adjusted higher for rush-hour travel.

Now the Bush administration is encouraging city and state transportation officials around the country to go further where appropriate, and even impose "cordon" tolls on rush-hour commuters -- in which toll-collecting devices are installed all around a city's perimeter. The tolls could be collected without making drivers stop, through electronic tag readers.

The Bush administration is distributing $130 million in grants to help cities build the electronic systems needed. Department of Transportation officials expect more than 10 major cities to apply before the April deadline.

Currently, only San Francisco is planning "cordon tolls" that would impose a charge on essentially all rush-hour commuters. Other cities, including New York, are taking a look.

Officials in northern Virginia plan to build four "High-Occupancy/Toll" lanes along 15 miles of the I-495 Beltway around Washington, according to DOT officials and documents. They are also studying converting High-Occupancy Vehicle, or HOV, lanes into HOT lanes along nearly 50 miles of the I-95/I-395 corridor in Virginia.

Even a 5% reduction in traffic jams can increase traffic speeds by as much as 50%, says Mr. Duvall. DOT officials figure a typical big-city traffic jam can be cleared with tolls of as little as $2 to $2.50 a day, if all lanes on a big highway are charged. But on some Southern California highways where fees are charged only for the former high-occupancy lanes, prices at the peak of rush hour have reached $8.50.

Congestion pricing has already taken hold in Europe, and the success of a congestion pricing system for London's roads three years ago motivated U.S. officials and major businesses to consider the idea. Voters in Stockholm approved a similar plan in September, after a test run during the summer.

But tinkering with highway prices also means political perils. That became apparent in Indiana last year when Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels pushed through the sale of a big toll road to private investors, who announced plans to raise the tolls for the first time in years. State Republicans took a beating in the November elections.

GUNS AND BUTTER How War's Expense Didn't Strain Economy (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Since President Bush took office, he's boosted annual defense spending by 50% -- including $500 billion over five years for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan -- and doubled spending on homeland security. At the same time, he's cut taxes, expanded Medicare to cover prescription drugs, approved $100 billion to clean up after Gulf Coast hurricanes, and signed bills that spend a little more each year on domestic programs.

For years, critics said it couldn't last, backed by some historical precedent: President Johnson is blamed by many for triggering inflation in the 1970s by spending on both guns and butter.

DOJ_NMG_0127004

• The Issue: President Bush has managed to wage a war, cut taxes and boost other spending without triggering Vietnam-era inflation.

• The Background: The spending spree has been aided by foreign borrowing and a strong economy.

• What's Next: While economically painless so far, war and military spending will soon collide with looming entitlement obligations.

But this time, it's been nearly painless. Inflation is in check. The federal budget deficit is down from its 2004 peak, and rests near its historical average of 2% of gross domestic product, a measure of the nation's total output. Long-term interest rates are relatively low.

What's Mr. Bush's secret? Ingredient one: strong revenue growth driven by an economy distinguished by surging profits and rising incomes at the top, which are taxed more heavily than incomes at the bottom. Ingredient two: tax cuts and spending increases, which arrived when the U.S. economy needed a boost. Ingredient three, and perhaps the most significant: the willingness of foreigners to lend to the U.S., which finances the budget deficit without pushing up interest rates at a time when Americans don't save very much.

"This situation is what you'd call an exorbitant privilege," says Menzie Chinn, a University of Wisconsin economist. "We've gotten a pretty good deal so far."

No one knows when this bonanza might end, although end it must. For the coming year, Mr. Bush is expected to shave costs from programs and agencies unconnected to defense. In the future, the flow of cash from foreign lenders could dry up. Health care and Social Security could swamp the federal budget. In the shorter term, the combination of military spending and tax cuts could collide with spending priorities outlined by the capital's newly empowered Democrats.

For now, the budget the president will offer today essentially counts on continued good luck. Both he and Congress recognize that neither the war in Iraq nor the buildup in homeland-security spending is a one-time-only expense. Both sides are talking about the need for a larger military, a sharp contrast to the decline in post-Cold War defense spending that helped produce Bill Clinton's surpluses.

Mr. Bush's budget estimates Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years alone will cost about $300 billion, and analysts say the five-year price tag could reach $500 billion. Mr. Bush is seeking to add 92,000 troops to overall Pentagon forces over the next five years. Democrats are even more eager to increase homeland-security spending than Mr. Bush. Indeed, the Congressional Budget Office last week estimated a bill the House has passed to improve aviation security and implement other recommendations of the 9/11 Commission would cost $21 billion over six years, a sum equal to roughly half the Department of Homeland Security's current annual budget.

Democrats also have a long list of other domestic priorities to fund, which include lower student-loan rates and more science and health research. They've pledged to balance the budget and adhere to rules that require tax cuts and benefits increases to be offset somehow.

"It will be hard to attain those goals because of the squeeze that the defense budget, and in particular that the cost of war in Iraq, is placing on us," says House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, a South Carolina Democrat. "These expenditures at this sort of level are consequential -- they necessitate trade-offs."

In the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, Mr. Bush has said he will show how the deficit can be eliminated by 2012 without raising taxes. The budget will give the administration's best guess (about $141 billion) at the cost of Iraq and Afghanistan for 2008, a departure from past practice, and what one administration official calls "a plug number" for 2009 -- an estimated $50 billion -- but nothing beyond that.

The president is also expected to project spending less, in inflation-adjusted terms, on annually appropriated spending outside of defense and homeland security. Much of that squeeze is expected to come in proposed freezes or cuts to federal agencies and programs.

"It's going to be the tightest budget we've seen," says Brian Riedl, a budget expert with Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. He predicts a call for "freezing most discretionary programs for the next five years."

The big problem, however, remains the government's entitlement programs. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson says the budget deficit is "well below where anybody would have expected it to be several years ago" despite the costs of war and hurricanes. He credits a strong economy and record tax receipts.

But he warns of "a looming collision with entitlements," and adds: "I have no doubt we will deal with it. But the longer we wait to deal with it, the more expensive and the more painful it's going to be to do it."

Some academic economists are beginning to gauge what the sums spent on Iraq could have financed -- a down payment on a Social Security fix, for instance. Nobel laureate Joseph Stiglitz predicts Iraq will cost at least $1 trillion, assuming troops are withdrawn by 2010. "Half that sum would have put Social Security on a firm grounding for the next 75 years," he wrote last year in a paper. "If we spent even a small fraction of the remainder on education and research, it is likely our economy would be in a far stronger position."

Comparisons to Vietnam are tempting but Iraq isn't, at least yet, as costly as Vietnam, when compared to the overall economy. It's running about $100 billion a year, or about 1% of GDP. By the time it was over, Vietnam cost the equivalent of about $660 billion in today's dollars.

Overall defense spending today is higher than it was during Vietnam, when adjusted for inflation, but is just about 4% of GDP. That's an increase from when Mr. Bush took office, but far from the Vietnam peak of 9.5% of GDP in 1968, and less even than the 1980s Cold War buildup. Even with the planned troop surge, the U.S. will have about 160,000 troops in Iraq, well below the 550,000 Vietnam peak.

It was the combination of military spending and President Johnson's "Great Society" programs -- Medicare health insurance for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor -- that many say led to the "Great Inflation" of the 1970s. Like Mr. Bush, Mr. Johnson at first tried to fund the war through supplemental spending bills, a move historians and contemporaries believe was aimed at cloaking the true costs so Congress wouldn't scale back his ambitious domestic agenda. Inflation, which had been below 2% in the early 1960s, was running at above 6% in 1970. By 1970, the U.S. was in a recession.

Vietnam-era defense spending added fuel to an economy that was already running at full employment and producing at capacity. Mr. Johnson resisted calls for tax increases to reduce the inflation risk, fearing Southern Democrats would instead insist on cutting social programs. The Federal Reserve, partly under pressure from Mr. Johnson, but also because it mistakenly believed the economy had spare capacity, was reluctant to raise interest rates. To control inflation, it had to raise rates higher later on. By the time Mr. Johnson imposed a 10% surcharge on individual and corporate income taxes in 1968, it was too late.

Although the government borrowed heavily in the 1960s, most of its borrowing came from inside the U.S. Interest rates rose as a result. The yield on 10-year Treasurys, a benchmark interest rate, began the 1960s at 4.72%; it ended the decade at 7.65%. But the private sector saved enough to offset government borrowing, and the U.S. economy was a net lender to the world.

This time, interest rates haven't risen as much, because foreigners, particularly in Asia, are eager to lend to the U.S. economy at fairly low rates. The economy as a whole is a heavy borrower from the rest of the world.

In fact, the U.S. government is particularly dependent on the willingness of foreigners to lend it money. As of November 2006, foreigners owned about $2.2 trillion of U.S. Treasury securities -- or about 52% of the public debt not held by the U.S. government, compared with about 20% in the early 1990s. (The total U.S. debt, which includes what the government owes itself, is about $8.7 trillion.)

Mr. Bush's ability to sustain spending and tax cuts depends largely on the willingness of foreigners to continue lending the U.S. money. Mr. Chinn, the economist, says that at some point, global investors will lose their appetite for ever-larger amounts of American debt. That would trigger a decline in value of the U.S. dollar and an increase in interest rates.

"So far it's not a problem because foreigners are willing to lend, but you've got to wonder what happens when the rest of the world says, 'We're tired of taking paper that loses value pretty quickly,' " says Mr. Chinn.

The Bush era upturn in defense and homeland-security spending came not during a 1960s-style boom, but in a lull in the U.S. economy, which had tumbled into recession even before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. That meant the economy had plenty of slack to absorb increased government spending without sparking inflation. Lee Price, an economist who until recently was research director at the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal Washington think tank, says defense spending created 1.3 million private-sector jobs between 2001 and 2005 while all other private-sector employment fell by 1.2 million.

At the same time, the Bush administration cut taxes in 2001 and 2003 on individuals, dividends, capital gains and estates, among other areas. The administration and some economists credit the cuts with spurring economic growth, saying they provided incentives to business to invest and buoyed consumer spending.

The moment of economic slack may be in the past, which raises the specter of inflation. Unemployment is about as low as the Fed will tolerate, and there are some hiring bottlenecks of the sort that were common during Vietnam. "We're starting to see tightening up in the high-tech market, and people who were tied up with defense or homeland security are not available," says EPI's Mr. Price.

War has other costs, too. Some companies are struggling to keep jobs open for military reservists. A 2005 Congressional Budget Office report found that "some businesses may absorb the loss of personnel at little cost, but others may experience slowdowns in production, lost sales or additional expenses as they attempt to compensate for a reservist's absence." The problems are more severe for small businesses or those that employ highly specialized workers, the CBO said.

At Fallon Ambulance Service in Quincy, Mass., more than 20 of the company's 500 full-time employees are reservists, and several have been deployed for stints lasting as long as two years.

"It does at times put a strain when we have large deployments," says Stephanie Eastwick, director of human resources for the family-owned company.

In the end, it may be Johnson's ballooning programs that prompt tough decision making. The government has expanded greatly since the 1960s and has made all sorts of promises to pay benefits, particularly to older Americans, in coming years. As war costs preoccupy official Washington, the retirement of the baby boom generation is growing closer; the oldest boomers turn 60 this year. There is no sign of a political consensus on changing Social Security, which has expanded since Roosevelt launched it, or on making more affordable Mr. Johnson's health-care programs.

Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid already consume 36 cents of every dollar that the government spends, about $1.2 trillion this year, and are growing faster than the economy as a whole. Defense accounts for about 20 cents of every dollar, up from 16 cents when Mr. Bush took office in 2001, more than the government spends on education, transportation, scientific research and housing aid combined.

"We can continue doing what we're now doing subject to foreigners being willing to finance it but eventually it's going to do us in because Medicare and Social Security are going to overwhelm the budget," says Charles Schultze, a Brookings Institution economist who was among Jimmy Carter's advisers.

The Fed is watching carefully, the lessons from the 1960s inscribed in the minds of today's policy makers. "There were plenty of signs in the 1960s that inflation was accelerating, yet monetary policy wasn't fundamentally changed," says former Fed Governor Edward Gramlich. "Today, [the Fed] would be more alert and is more likely to react forcefully to signs of accelerating inflation."

Democrats Seek Unpaid Taxes, Setting Up Clash (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Congressional Democrats, hoping to finance an ambitious agenda without raising taxes, are on a collision course with the Bush administration about pursuing the potentially vast amount of money that people hide from the Internal Revenue Service.

House and Senate Democrats say the government could collect as much as $100 billion more a year by whittling the tax gap — the unpaid taxes, mostly on unreported earnings, that the I.R.S. estimated was about $300 billion a year.

But the Treasury Department, which oversees the I.R.S., says it cannot realistically recover one-tenth as much as Democrats suggest.

On Monday, as part of President Bush's budget proposal, the Treasury Department will unveil more than a dozen proposals to pursue tax cheats. But officials said those ideas would bring in less than $10 billion a year in extra revenue.

Mark W. Everson, the I.R.S. commissioner, has expressed far greater optimism. At a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee a year ago, he told lawmakers that the government could recover "between $50 billion and $100 billion without changing the dynamic between the I.R.S. and the people."

Recouping unpaid taxes is a perennial concern in Washington. But the issue may have new urgency with the Democrats now in power and driving the considerable momentum behind it. Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has cited the tax gap as a top priority for increasing revenue, ahead of any discussion about rolling back President Bush's tax cuts.

Democrats badly want the money because they have adopted strict "pay as you go" budgeting rules that require Congress to pay for any new programs or tax cuts with revenue from other areas.

"The tax gap is the logical place to go," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "It's also the fair thing to do. When you have a number as high as $300 billion in unreported and uncollected income taxes, that puts a burden on everybody."

Administration officials contend that Democrats have exaggerated the amount of money they can recover.

"At this point we have to do more research to understand where this money is," said Michele Davis, a Treasury Department spokeswoman. "We are very mindful of the compliance burden on taxpayers who do follow the law."

The Democrats have offered only a few specific proposals, and lawmakers have conspicuously refused to comment about proposals that could raise money but also provoke a political reaction from legions of self-employed people and family businesses.

Based on an analysis of audited tax returns from 2001, the I.R.S. recently estimated that the government lost $290 billion that year as a result of underreporting and underpayment of taxes.

More than 80 percent of that loss stemmed from underreporting by individuals, not corporations.

And the biggest problems were with people in business for themselves, who earned income that was not reported to the I.R.S. on W-2 forms or on the Form 1099 that businesses file when they pay independent contractors.

The I.R.S. estimated that it lost $109 billion on unreported business income, almost all of that from sole proprietors, like painters, plumbers, dry cleaners, florists, limousine drivers and restaurant owners.

Small-business lobbying groups have begun to mobilize against proposals intended to reduce the tax gap.

Two of the biggest trade associations in Washington, the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business, organized the Coalition for Fairness in Tax Compliance in December to address lawmakers about proposals that might burden law-abiding business owners.

"I'm focused on avoiding the wrong solutions," said Macey Davis, tax counsel for the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents more than 600,000 small companies, half of which have fewer than five employees. "We're not out to protect noncompliance. We're out to protect those who are compliant and whose businesses could be hurt."

Small-business groups have provided powerful support to President Bush and to Republican lawmakers. But they are poised to fight at least one proposal by the Treasury Department, which would authorize the I.R.S. to obtain information about a business's revenues from credit card companies.

The proposal would allow the I.R.S. to compare the credit card payments made to a business with the revenues the business owner reports on his or her tax return. If the credit card payments were suspiciously high compared with what the business owner reported to the government, the I.R.S. could begin an audit.

Opponents of the proposal contend that it would catch very little wrong-doing because it would not examine payments made in cash or by check. They warn that it could have disruptive side effects on business operations. (A similar idea proposed by the Bush administration last year received virtually no attention from the Republican-led Congress.)

The Democrats' biggest obstacle is that the tax gap is in some ways as amorphous as "waste, fraud and abuse" — everyone is against it, but no one is sure how to go about dealing with it. Many tax experts agree that increasing compliance would require an array of tactics, from increased auditing to tougher reporting requirements, to address scores of different practices.

Many such efforts would probably prompt political resistance, whether from small-business lobbying groups or from the credit card companies that might be ordered to provide the I.R.S. with transaction data at no charge. And some efforts may not yield much extra revenue. Another proposal that could lead to organized political opposition is a plan to crack down on investors who understate their profits when selling stocks.

The I.R.S. estimated that it lost about $11 billion in 2001 from people who understated their capital gains after selling stock. According to the agency's review of tax returns that year, a year when the stock market was plunging and losses were more common than gains, about 38 percent of all people underreported their capital gains.

The problem, I.R.S. officials said, is that brokerage firms report only how much money a person receives from the sale of stock, not how much the person paid for it. Without an audit, the government has no way of verifying the profits that people report.

Nina Olson, the I.R.S.'s independent taxpayer advocate, has proposed that Congress require brokerage firms to report a person's purchase cost as well as sales proceeds to the government. Mr. Emanuel has introduced a bill based on the idea.

The Bush administration is also planning to ask Congress to provide more money for enforcement efforts, including money for more auditors. But the I.R.S. currently audits fewer than one out of 435 tax returns. Doubling the number of auditors would mean that the I.R.S. would still audit less than 1 percent of all returns.

Democratic lawmakers contend that the Bush administration has been dragging its feet on efforts to track down underreporting.

"I know they can't recover every dollar of the tax gap, but the I.R.S. needs to make an aggressive effort, and an honest one," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Finance Committee. "Treasury shouldn't lowball their estimate."

But in an interview last week, Mr. Baucus declined to propose any of his own ideas for reducing cheating. "I'm leaving it up to them," he said, referring to the Treasury Department.

Some Treasury officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because President Bush had not announced his proposals, said that Democrats had exaggerated the amount of money they could recover. But in his testimony before the Senate budget committee last February, Mr. Everson said the government could recover much more than it has been collecting.

"What we've said is, between now and 2009, we want to get the compliance rate from 83.5 percent to 85 percent," Mr. Everson said. "That gets you about $30 billion in improved compliance."

Ms. Olson, the I.R.S. taxpayer advocate, said it was not implausible to recover something in the neighborhood of $100 billion a year.

"There's no silver bullet," Ms. Olson cautioned, noting that the government had to use an array of tactics to address scores of different compliance problems. But she added, "I think there's a significant amount of money that's left on the table and that's not hard to recover."

Needy Seniors Still Have Trouble Getting Drugs (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Eight months after Congress implored pharmaceutical companies to restore programs offering free drugs to needy Medicare recipients, advocacy groups say that some patients are still having trouble.

"Before the Medicare program, we had close to 4,000 seniors getting free drugs," says Patricia White, executive director of the West Virginia Health Right clinic in Charleston, W.Va. "We're probably down to 400 now."

The issue arose after many drug companies halted their assistance programs for Medicare-eligible patients once Medicare's drug benefit began last year. The drug companies feared running afoul of federal anti-kickback rules if they did not. Since then, Medicare officials and other regulators have said such programs can be set up in a way to avoid violating any laws.

Currently, some drug companies, including AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline, Merck, Pfizer and Wyeth, offer help to Medicare members. Income limits and other rules vary, as do which drugs are covered. Dozens of other drugmakers, however, bar Medicare-eligible patients from assistance programs.

In May, several members of the Senate Finance Committee met with top executives from eight drugmakers, urging them to continue the assistance programs.

"A company ought to be ashamed if it's still using (the Medicare drug program) as an excuse to abandon people with these extraordinary needs," Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, said in a written statement Friday.

About half of the members of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America provide assistance to Medicare members, says spokesman Ken Johnson, but many are still concerned about the legality of doing so.

Affected Medicare members include Mary Morey and Pat Martinez of Charlotte. "It's like I have fallen through a crack," says Morey, 67, who takes 10 drugs for diabetes and high blood pressure.

Her $15,000 annual income is under the $19,600 limit for assistance through Merck's and Wyeth's programs. Still, letters from Merck and Wyeth have told her she doesn't qualify. Wyeth has a requirement that applicants, or their doctors, write a letter stating they have a hardship. Morey has asked her doctor to write a letter.

"Every month, before it's time for Social Security to come again, I run out of food money," she says.

Martinez, 76, takes 19 drugs. The insulin she needs for diabetes comes from samples her doctor gives her. One of her drugs is made by Glaxo, which requires patients spend $600 on drugs before being eligible for assistance.

"Pat doesn't have $600 to spend, so she can't qualify," says Susan Basini, executive director of MedAssist, a free pharmacy for uninsured and low-income residents of Mecklenburg County, N.C. Martinez works part time at MedAssist.

Inside Bush's Fixation With Harry Truman (NSWK)

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

President Bush was reaching out—sort of. It was Dec. 7, the day after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group had delivered its recommendation that the administration begin to tamp down its war effort in Iraq and turn to diplomacy. Bush had invited the leadership of the newly Democratic Congress to the Oval Office, a sign that he was perhaps willing to listen to new ideas.

The president did seem mildly chastened by his party's defeat in the midterm elections—but not inclined to change course dramatically in Iraq.

He compared his situation to the crisis Harry Truman faced in the early days of the cold war. Then, as now, Bush said, the United States confronted a dangerous ideological foe. Truman had answered with the Truman Doctrine, a vow to protect free peoples wherever they were threatened with communist domination. Truman's policies had been unpopular in their time, but "history showed he was right," said Bush, according to Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate.

The Truman comparison didn't seem quite right to Durbin. When the president went to him for comment, Durbin voiced his doubts. "Harry Truman had allies," Durbin pointed out. The Truman administration had helped create the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to contain communism. After Britain withdraws its troops later this year, Durbin says he told Bush, "we will be virtually alone in what we are trying to accomplish there." Durbin says that Bush did not become angry, but he did seem irritated and "insisted that this was an ideological struggle, which wasn't my point at all," says Durbin. "He was very defensive." (White House spokesman Tony Snow confirmed the exchange between Bush and Durbin but said "the president was not really trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle.")

Bush's grasp of history may have been a little shaky, but there is no doubting the force of his conviction. Bush wants his legacy to be the long-term defeat of Islamic extremism. Indeed, senior officials close to Bush who did not wish to be identified discussing private conversations with the president tell NEWSWEEK that Bush's plan after he leaves the White House is to continue to promote the spread of democracy in the Middle East by inviting world leaders to his own policy institute, to be built alongside his presidential library.

Many presidents find solace in comparing themselves to their predecessors, the only people who could truly understand the job at hand. Truman is a favorite, particularly for presidents with low poll numbers. By 1952, the last year of his presidency, Truman's approval rating sank as low as 22 percent, about 10 points lower than Bush's. David McCullough, author of the Pulitzer Prize-winning biography "Truman," tells NEWSWEEK that, faced with an uphill re-election fight in 1992, George H.W. Bush invited McCullough to the White House to talk about how Truman had beaten the odds in the 1948 campaign (unlike Truman, Bush lost his re-election bid). The two Roosevelts and Lincoln, of course, are popular role models. Bill Clinton, who spent many hours in office fretting over his legacy, lamented that he might not rank highly because he lacked the opportunity to be a "war president"—perhaps overlooking in his meditations the impact of the Lewinsky scandal.

An avid reader of history and presidential biographies, President George W. Bush after 9/11 felt a kinship with war leaders, including Britain's Winston Churchill. In the last year or so, as Bush's approval ratings have tumbled and the Iraq quagmire has deepened, the president has increasingly invoked Truman. His aides say that Bush wants to be remembered for creating a new and effective framework for fighting the war on terror, just as Truman did for the cold war. That may be so, though no one would put the Department of Homeland Security on the same plane as the Marshall Plan.

Senator Durbin tells NEWSWEEK that the better historical model for Bush is Lyndon Johnson, who was overwhelmed by Vietnam. But that comparison is not quite right, either. Bush has said that he does not want to be like LBJ, who micromanaged the Vietnam War right down to picking bombing targets. Presidents, Bush has said, should leave war fighting to the generals. This is Bush's misreading of history: Lincoln constantly second-guessed his generals; Roosevelt and Churchill plotted strategy in the White House Map Room and John F. Kennedy was the strongest voice in the "ExComm," his council of advisers, during the Cuban missile crisis.

Those who see the war as a growing disaster might be surprised by Bush's ability to remain upbeat. When he visits the families of the dead, or sees the casualties come home from the battlefront, doesn't he have crises of confidence? Doesn't he wonder if he's made a terrible mistake that has cost the lives of more than 3,000 Americans and more than 54,000 Iraqis, not to mention the stature and prestige of the United States? Those close to Bush say that such questions misunderstand a fundamental aspect of his character: he doesn't get tangled up thinking about his own mistakes in the raw, recent times of his own making. "He's the least backward-looking person I have ever known in my life," says a senior staffer who didn't want to be named discussing the president's emotional state. Bush laments the casualties, says the aide, but never regrets the decision to go to war.

As more details emerge after Bush leaves office, we may learn that he was not quite so detached, that he privately agonized over decisions. A reconstruction of Bush's past six months as commander in chief shows that he has taken a greater interest in the details of the war in Iraq than he has before. Still, he has repeatedly followed his own certitudes over the advice of others. As the war and his poll numbers worsened, Bush did, for the first time, begin to talk to soldiers with on-the-ground experience and civilian experts with a range of views. But it appears that he was at least two years too late, and that he has somewhat simplistically and unrealistically narrowed his options to victory or defeat. He has kept his focus on the big picture, the great march of freedom, from decades past and decades into the imagined future, as a way to insulate himself against the horrors of the moment.

The Bush White House has long counted on democracy to produce a viable Iraqi government. Last June, when Bush traveled to Baghdad to meet Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, he returned optimistic. The president told reporters on Air Force One that he found Maliki to be tough, direct and truthful. Bush was buoyed by the lack of sectarian finger-pointing in his talks with Maliki and his cabinet.

American military commanders, however, were much less sanguine, say informed high-ranking officers who did not wish to publicly discuss the private views of their superiors. Senior officers on the ground feared that Maliki would be politically ineffective in confronting the growing violence.

The military's fears were quickly realized. Two successive major operations to pacify Baghdad, Together Forward I and II, were complete flops in the summer. Iraqi troops failed to show up as promised, and Maliki's administration interfered when American troops tried to go after Shiite militias. By September, the top American commander, Gen. George Casey, feared that his strategy of training Iraq forces was failing but did not know what else to do, say four senior military officials who declined to be quoted discussing the private views of top commanders. (Casey, who was preparing for Senate confirmation hearings, was unavailable for comment. Last week he testified to Congress that he believed that the war would be long, but still winnable.)

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld sensed that his long and domineering reign was coming to an end, and offered his resignation. With the mid-term elections less than a month away, Bush could not publicly reveal that Rumsfeld was on the way out. At a post-election press conference, Bush virtually admitted that he had held back because voters would see Rummy's exit as a sign of failure.

The GOP defeat at the polls could have been an opening to find a bipartisan way out of Iraq. The report of the Iraq Study Group was greeted with much hoopla in the press. But at the White House, it was a nonstarter. Bush, say two aides who didn't want to be named discussing the president's thinking, dismissed its conclusions; the White House had already begun its own in-depth review, they point out.

The election forced Bush to make a public show of announcing a new strategy in Iraq. He had the usual three options: pull back, stand pat or escalate. Retreat was intolerable; the president could not conceive of managing defeat. In late November, Bush was almost truculent as he publicly addressed reports that the Iraq Study Group would call for a pullout from Iraq. He openly scoffed at the notion of a "graceful exit." At first, say the Bush aides, the president was tempted to pull U.S. troops out of Baghdad and let the sectarian fires burn themselves out. But he soon decided that U.S. forces could not stand by and watch civilian massacres or the breakup of the country.

The president is sensitive to the caricature of Bush-in-a-bubble, and he began reaching out more actively for independent assessments of Iraq. He had two important strategy sessions, described to NEWSWEEK by knowledgeable military and White House officials who wished to remain anonymous discussing confidential presidential meetings. On Dec. 11, Bush summoned five military experts to the Oval Office: retired Gens. Jack Keane (former vice chief of staff of the Army), Wayne Downing (former head of Special Forces) and Barry McCaffrey (armored-division commander in the first gulf war); and two well-known scholars, Eliot Cohen of Johns Hopkins University and Stephen Biddle of the Council on Foreign Relations. Two of the generals, Keane and Downing, argued for significantly more forces—but while Downing argued for more Special Forces, Keane pushed for as many as 50,000 to 60,000 combat troops to protect the population in Baghdad. McCaffrey countered that such a surge would fail. The two civilians warned that it might be too late to save Iraq, but backed a buildup.

On Dec. 13, Bush met directly with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in their Pentagon meeting room, the Tank. After four years of war, it was the first time Bush had directly quizzed the top brass in their own lair. The recently resigned Rumsfeld was still in the room, but for once he was not an overbearing presence. The chiefs were grim. The Coalition forces were not winning in Iraq, said Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Gen. Peter Pace, which meant they were losing because time was not on their side. (Pace's staff declined to comment.) The generals warned that a significant escalation—along the lines proposed by Keane—ran the risk of "breaking" the Army, which was already badly worn.

The outcome of these dire warnings was a compromise. The clamor in Congress for a pullback seems to have only stiffened Bush's resolve to show that he could make the hard choices of a lonely war leader. But he could not create troops out of thin air. Bush decided to surge in Iraq, but to request essentially half a loaf—some 21,000 combat troops. Not a few military commanders have privately complained that those reinforcements are too few to really take control of Baghdad and Anbar province, which is ridden with Sunni insurgents.

Bush seemed once again to be counting on sheer will power to bring success. His apparent plan: to buy time while still hoping that Maliki can create a viable government that won't allow the country to collapse into sectarian slaughter. The strategy may indeed produce a lull in the fighting. Press reports suggest that Shiite militiamen have been told to put away their guns and lie low—until the Americans leave. But counting on Maliki to countenance raids on militias that keep him in power may be a forlorn hope. Even Bush's own national-security adviser, Steve Hadley, questioned Maliki's reliability and competence for the long haul in a secret memo that was leaked to the press, possibly by the military.

The cynical view is that Bush is also buying time for himself—so he can dump the problem on the next president without having to admit defeat. But two years is a long time, and Bush is no cynic. He is a true believer, and he is willing to wait to be vindicated by history. Though he has visibly aged on the job and can appear weary or miffed when speaking to reporters or in front of a camera, he is generally optimistic in private, say his friends and confidants. His routines are unvarying: he gets plenty of rest and exercise and reads voraciously. (After an election hiatus, he has recently resumed a competition with political adviser Karl Rove to see who can read the most books.) But when Bush reads, does he learn? At Henry Kissinger's recommendation, he recently read "A Savage War of Peace," an account of the failed French attempt to suppress the rebellion of its Algerian colony in the late 1950s. American military officers in Iraq regard the book, by British war historian Alistair Horne, as required reading. Bush found the book interesting, says one of the aides, but regards the French experience in Algiers as fundamentally different from the American experience in Iraq. Bush focused on the problems of the French bureaucracy—as if to say the French failed because they were, well, French.

In his history reading, Bush likes to identify with Truman because the former Missouri haberdasher was also mocked by the chattering classes for being inarticulate and unsophisticated. Bush and Truman share a kind of flinty self-reliance: just as Bush likes to call himself "the decider," Truman liked to say "The buck stops here." There is a crucial difference between the approaches of the two men, however. Truman early and often sought out the advice of establishment foreign-policy experts like Gen. George C. Marshall and Dean Acheson, the two men most responsible for postwar European recovery and the Western Alliance. And then he actually listened, with close attention to detail, to what they had to say.

The Press, Turning Up Its Nose At Lame Duck (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Six months after his party lost both houses of Congress, Bill Clinton was reduced to declaring at a news conference that he was still relevant.

The next day, the Oklahoma City federal building was bombed. Clinton regained his footing and cruised to reelection the following year, his relevance never again in doubt -- even after his impeachment.

These days, many in the media seem to be writing off President Bush.

"The American people basically fired George Bush in the last election," writes New York Times columnist Tom Friedman. "We're now just watching him clean out his desk."

"A lot of Americans consider this presidency over," says CNN's Bill Schneider.

"If America were a parliamentary democracy, we would have a no-confidence vote and a new prime minister by spring," writes New York Daily News columnist Michael Goodwin.

Are these and other pundits giving us the unvarnished truth, that we are witnessing the historic collapse of a presidency? Or is this the triumph of quick-draw, poll-driven journalism?

"It's a predictable bit of conventional wisdom," White House spokesman Tony Snow says in an interview. He insists that Bush can make progress on such issues as energy and immigration, "and he still has the bully pulpit. A lot of these narratives about 'the president is a lame duck' assume nothing is going to change politically, anywhere in the world, in the next two years."

But the gibes keep on coming. "If we had a straight dictatorship," writes the New Republic's Jonathan Chait, "Bush would long ago have been dragged out of the White House either by an angry mob or by disgruntled generals." (Not that he's in favor of either.)

Chait agrees in an interview that the president still has power, but notes: "Psychologically, it does feel that people are starting to move past Bush. No one has changed his mind about Bush in the last two years. It's kind of boring to write about him anymore because he's so unchanging."

Fred Barnes, the Weekly Standard's executive editor, says Bush will concentrate on such areas as tightening control of regulatory policy to end-run a Democratic Congress. "The Republicans learned in the '90s -- and the press should have learned as well -- that presidents have great inherent powers," he says. But "Nancy Pelosi at the moment is a more interesting story than George Bush. She's new, she's attractive and she has an agenda."

The media, as always, are mesmerized by polls. When Bush was riding high in the "Mission Accomplished" days of 2003, some of the coverage was almost giddy. If Bush's current approval ratings were at 50 percent, his media portrayal would look very different. With the president having sunk as low as 28 percent in a CBS News survey, it is all too easy to dismiss him, even as he mounts an escalation of the war in Iraq.

That war, of course, is the reason why the mainstream media see no possibility of Bush bouncing back. Things are a mess in Iraq; the country has turned against the war; and few journalists think the "surge" is going to work. Therefore, the reasoning goes, Bush will continue to sink into the quagmire of the war he chose to wage.

There's little question that Bush has never been weaker politically. He got no traction from the State of the Union (as measured by the almighty polls). His domestic proposals seem to have sparked little interest, at least from the press. Here he is talking about income inequality, global warming and tougher auto mileage standards -- all typically Democratic themes -- and the journalistic reaction is a barely suppressed yawn. He's yesterday's news.

But with Bush constitutionally entitled to two more years in the White House, it is risky for journalists to declare him a marginal figure, even if they are far more absorbed in covering the race to succeed him.

Other unpopular war presidents have staggered to the ends of their terms -- Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson come to mind -- and Bush may do the same. But because Iraq is now widely viewed as having been an unnecessary personal crusade on Bush's part, there seems to be an extra element of derision in the political commentary, especially from the left.

Bush's father recently vented his frustrations with the coverage. "It's one thing to have an adversarial . . . relationship -- hard-hitting journalism. It's another when the journalists' rhetoric goes beyond skepticism and goes over the line into overt, unrelenting hostility and personal animosity," the former president said.

Actually, even some of the journalists who are especially aggressive in their coverage of Bush like him in private settings, where the president has a joshing manner and enjoys handing out nicknames. But professional resentment may still be behind some of the increasingly negative coverage. "In the press corps," Chait says, "there's a little bit of a realization that they had been played."

From Iraq, where the media fell down on the WMD debate, to Bush's 2000 campaign persona as a compassionate conservative, many journalists now believe they were led astray. That has given an extra edge to their stories and columns on Bush being out of touch and has fueled an effort to vindicate their darker picture of the war. In short, the mainstream media no longer give this president the benefit of the doubt.Getting Even?

Jim Cramer, CNBC's manic "Mad Money" host, is accustomed to people taking potshots.

Former investment banker Henry Blodget used some heavy ammunition last week in Slate. Blodget said that although Cramer can be "brilliant, in an idiot-savant, freak-show sort of way," he gives "terrible investment advice," and that ordinary folks should invest in index funds rather than following stock picks from "a chair-throwing, self-aggrandizing clown."

Cramer, a former hedge fund manager, says this is nothing but "revenge." He harshly criticized Blodget for his conduct at Merrill Lynch, which led to a $4 million fine against the young analyst and a lifetime ban from the securities industry. Blodget kept touting high-flying Internet stocks that later crashed, while privately deriding them as "junk" and pieces of excrement.

"What he did was egregious," Cramer says. "He was paid millions of dollars to tell the truth. He should go opine on something else. He should not opine on stocks."

What's more, Cramer says it is "appalling" that CNBC recently interviewed Blodget about his new book. Blodget's retaliation, says Cramer, came after Cramer took the unusual step of criticizing his own network for doing the interview.

Blodget says he wrote the Slate column because Cramer is "so influential and omnipresent that just about everyone I know asks me what I think of him. . . . Jim can't possibly believe that trying to out-trade thousands of full-time professionals is an intelligent strategy for average investors."Media Lesson

Last Monday, the George Washington University student paper broke a story about college coaches checking out Facebook to see whether their players had posted racy pictures of themselves.

Days later, WJLA-TV ran the same story -- without credit.

"Absolutely, the idea originated out of their article," says Channel 7 reporter Kris Van Cleave. "But I don't think anyone owns ideas. We went out and obtained the information ourselves. Honestly, it didn't feel like we needed to attribute the story. Otherwise, we would have."

David Ceasar, an editor at the GW Hatchet, says the station used similar phrases in its version. "I felt flattered that a network news affiliate would use material from a 19-year-old sophomore, but it rubbed me the wrong way that it didn't mention us at all."Risky Move

John Edwards has hired Amanda Marcotte, of the liberal site Pandagon, to blog for his presidential campaign. But the trouble with bloggers is that they leave a sometimes inflammatory trail.

DOJ_NMG_0127014

As noted by OpinionJournal's James Taranto, Marcotte wrote last month of the Duke rape case that she "had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and [sexually assaulted] her against her will -- not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair."

A misguided attempt at sarcasm? "No comment," Marcotte e-mailed Friday. "But thanks for asking!"

U.S. Treasury Adviser To Leave; Post Played International Role (WSJ)

By Elizabeth Price

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Treasury Department's top international-policy adviser, Timothy Adams, is resigning after seven years with the Bush administration.

Mr. Adams, a 45-year-old Kentucky native, led efforts to give the International Monetary Fund more power to crack down on members' economic policies, particularly countries that meddle with exchange rates to gain an advantage in international trade.

He also played a role in getting the IMF to overhaul its governance structure to give Asian countries more clout in decision making and pushed the powerful Group of Seven industrial countries to deepen the engagement with emerging economic powers, including China, Brazil and India.

In his resignation letter, Mr. Adams said his responsibilities to his wife and three young children were "incompatible" with the job's demands. Since becoming undersecretary for international affairs in 2005, Mr. Adams has spent much of his time traveling to more than 40 countries. He previously was chief of staff to former Treasury Secretaries John Snow and Paul O'Neill.

Pelosi To Fly In Air Force Plane (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The Defense Department has agreed to furnish House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) with a jet big enough to fly nonstop coast-to-coast, despite complaints from some Republicans that the request was causing friction at the Pentagon.

Drew Hammill, a spokesman for the Speaker, said Friday that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for “clarification” on rules governing her use of military planes. After Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker was granted access to military transport for additional security, given the person in that job is third in the line of succession to the presidency.

The plane used by former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for frequent trips back to his Illinois home was a small, Lear-type jet, according to a Republican leadership aide. But that plane needs to refuel every 2,000 miles and could not make the nonstop haul to California.

“The Air Force determined that [Pelosi’s] safety would be best ensured by using a plane that has the fuel capacity to go coast-to-coast,” Hammill said. “All we’re asking for is what Hastert had.”

Hammill pointed to the busier Congressional work schedule as a reason why it was necessary to avoid lengthy layovers, especially in Plains States, where harsh winter weather could cause further delays.

“There’s a certain amount of inefficiency and risk involved in stopping and having to refuel,” he said.

On Friday, Pelosi’s office waded into the growing public relations battle over how the Speaker travels and with whom. The Washington Times reported last week that Pelosi was demanding permanent access to a large military jet for herself, her staff, other Members and supporters.

A Bush administration official and a senior Hill Republican said that Pelosi’s requests were causing serious friction in the Pentagon, which views them as a strain on a system that is charged with providing military transport for Cabinet officials and top generals and commanders. A permanent large plane for Pelosi, the Hill Republican said, would mean less availability for other high-ranking officials.

“The Department of Defense offered Speaker Pelosi the same aircraft” as the one used by Hastert, said one senior Republican who has spoken extensively with Defense Department officials about Pelosi’s requests. “She found it was not big enough for staff, supporters and other Members.”

But Hammill denied any substantial controversy with the Pentagon brass. "Were not talking about major negotiations here. We're talking about a few phone calls seeking clarification."

One administration official said that the new Speaker had asked that a plane be designated for her use in traveling to the Democratic retreat late last week in Williamsburg, Va., which is 152 miles from Washington, D.C.

Hammill confirmed that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for guidance regarding the use of military aircraft for Congressional retreats.

"The request was to clarify whether retreats are covered," Hammill said. "We had the knowledge that Hastert had used [a military plane] for a retreat on one occasion."

Ultimately, Pelosi did not use the plane to travel to the retreat; the administration official said that request had been denied.

Hammill said that so far, the California Democrat had only used the Air Force plane for a single January trip back to San Francisco. He added that Pelosi asked the Pentagon a number of questions regarding how the plane could be employed, such as whether it could be used solely for official business or also for political travel. The Speaker's office also requested clarification on who can legally travel on the plane in addition to the Speaker, such as staff and supporters.

Hammill said the Pentagon has yet to respond to these specific queries. Defense Department officials did not return repeated calls to comment for this story.

Lawmaker access to military jets may be even more important now that the House has instituted new gift rules that prohibit lawmakers from using corporate jets under any circumstances.

One Republican leadership aide said Hastert routinely flew commercially, usually on United Airlines, back to his Illinois district until Sept. 11, 2001. At that point, the White House decided for security reasons the Speaker should have access to a military plane for his travel.

Despite the lack of clear restrictions on the plane's use, the leadership aide said Hastert decided to use the plane solely for official business and not for political travel, which would have required reimbursements to the government of several thousand dollars per hour of use.

Hastert sometimes traveled on the plane, which was described as relatively small, with other staff and occasionally his wife.

"We would not use it for political business," said the leadership aide. "We would take corporate or commercial."

"There were no clear rules," the aide added.

The White House would not comment on the issue and referred all questions to the Defense Department, which responded with guidance on appropriate Congressional foreign trips.

Under Defense Department rules, Members of Congress typically fly military planes for official foreign travel or for domestic trips to military bases. Before Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker had to abide by the same rules as everyone else.

Reached by phone on Friday, ex-Speaker Jim Wright (D-Texas) said that he typically flew commercial like everyone else.

"I traveled almost exclusively by commercial jet. I didn't have access to a military plane that I was aware of," Wright said. "I do have some memory that someone called me and said there would be one available if I needed to use it, and I don't think I ever did take them up on that."

US Public Sector Faces Talent Drain (FT)

By Rebecca Knight In Boston

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The US federal government faces a massive talent drain in the coming years as many senior government officials reach retirement age and fewer bright young people opt for careers in public service.

About 90 per cent of senior managers in federal government are eligible to retire in 10 years, and more than 40 per cent of all federal employees will be eligible for retirement by 2010, according to the Council for Excellence in Government, a non-partisan research group.

At the same time, fewer young people are choosing to work for the federal government. Many top US colleges and public policy schools report that the number of graduating students going into public service has decreased. For instance, at Columbia

University's School for Public Affairs, 73 per cent of the graduating class went to work for federal, state or local government in 1979, compared with 36 per cent who choose public sector work today.

Anne Marie Slaughter, dean of Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, told the Financial Times she has observed a "brain drain both to private sector and the non-profit sector".

"Students don't see the government as a place you can make a difference," she said. "The common perception is that if you go into the private sector, you're an economic entrepreneur, if you go into the non-profit sector you're a social entrepreneur, but if you go into government, you're a bureaucrat."

President John F. Kennedy once enticed the best and brightest of young people into careers in public service by saying: "Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country."

However, the Vietnam war, the Watergate scandal and the subsequent political apathy coupled with the changing economics of the marketplace – especially the rise of non-government industries – resulted in fewer of the best and the brightest choosing government work.

Stephen Bosworth, the dean of Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, said he believed one of the biggest reasons for this was pay. "Students have an opportunity to earn significantly more money in the private sector," he said.

The government also has a reputation among young people for having a slow and confusing recruitment pro-cess, according to Paul Light, a public service professor at the Wagner School at New York University. "This is stunningly evident at the college level perhaps because government is rarely a presence at job fairs and rarely mentioned by career counsellors."

Linda Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, said the federal government was trying hard-er to attract young workers by increasing its recruitment on college campuses and through television advertisements.

In addition, she said, the government was overhauling its hiring practices, expanding its health benefits and student loan forgiveness programmes.

Job Shadowing Sheds Light On Defense Work (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The first questions were right to the point: Is there a lot of paperwork in applying for a federal job? What's the easiest way to get a security clearance?

The questions came from Washington area high school students participating in the Information Technology Job Shadow Day at the Defense Department, one of 26 agencies hosting events last week aimed at recruiting the next generation of computer professionals into government.

As the shadow day activities underscored, many federal agencies are trying to build a recruitment pipeline that goes beyond colleges and into high schools, where teenagers can be introduced to federal work through summer jobs, internships and scholarship programs.

"We're hitting all ages," said Joyce France, director of the management services directorate for Defense's chief information officer. "We want to reach back to high schools, and show them how critical and important information technology is, and grow these students for the Defense Department and the federal government and for private industry."

Like other parts of the government, Defense is concerned about its aging workforce. The department has about 69,000 technology professionals in its civil service ranks, and officials estimate that 10,000 will be eligible to retire at the end of this year.

Not all of them will leave, of course, but Defense officials are looking to the future and want to make sure that teenagers understand the importance of math, science and English courses as building blocks for technology careers.

For the job shadow day, the Pentagon revved up briefings and tours worthy of visiting dignitaries.

Lt. Gen. Michael W. Peterson, the Air Force chief information officer, welcomed one group of students. Army Maj. Jim Enicks, who has served in Iraq and currently works for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, shared his experiences with another. Civilian executives and managers, including France, Debra Filippi and John Venit, offered advice and fielded questions.

DOJ_NMG_0127017

Tour stops for the students included the National Military Command Center, which links the defense secretary to other top government leaders during emergencies; the office of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates (who was not in); the Pentagon courtyard; and the 9/11 Memorial Chapel.

One group of students started their Pentagon day with a "talk show" segment taped by the Pentagon Channel, the in-house TV and Web broadcast service.

Two Defense computer scientists, Alex Eisen and Kunal Johar, urged the students to look into education scholarships provided by Defense and to think about what they want out of life and how a technology career might help them achieve personal goals.

Defense officials told the students they looked for potential hires who had good grades and had tried to apply their skills, by building a Web site or by using commercial software to compile data.

About 30 Washington area students participated in the Defense shadow day, coming from Ballou Senior High, Benjamin Banneker, the Edison Academy, the Fairfax Academy and T. C. Williams.

They were part of an estimated 280 students attending technology job shadow days across the government, drawn from 27 area high schools. The schools included Anacostia, Cardoza, Chantilly, Frederick Douglas, Gaithersburg, Springbrook, West Potomac and Wheaton.

The government's effort was organized by the Federal Chief Information Officers Council, an interagency group, in partnership with the Association for Federal Information Resources Management, a nonprofit group; and Junior Achievement, a group dedicated to educating young people about business and economics.

Last week's events marked a reinvigoration of technology shadow day. It was last held in 2003, drawing about 100 students from nine high schools for visits at nine agencies.

Doris McGuire, a co-chair with Ned Kieloch of the information officers council's student outreach subcommittee, said organizers went into the event hoping to match past participation and double the turnout. The advance planning paid off.

She said the students turned in feedback cards with comments, such as "I had a first-hand experience of what people do at work" and "How cool is that!"

Jonathon Glad, a senior at Thomas Edison High School in Alexandria, told reporters that he decided to participate in the shadow day because of his interest in technology and he wanted to see the Pentagon. He said he thinks technology will mesh with his career plan -- to join the Army after completion of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps program.

The Green-Zoning Of America (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

One of the best of the many recent books about the Iraq debacle is Rajiv Chandrasekaran's "Imperial Life in the Emerald City." The book tells a tale of hopes squandered in the name of politicization and privatization: key jobs in Baghdad's Green Zone were assigned on the basis of loyalty rather than know-how, while key functions were outsourced to private contractors.

Two recent reports in The New York Times serve as a reminder that the Bush administration has brought the same corruption of governance to the home front. Call it the Green-Zoning of America.

In the first article, The Times reported that a new executive order requires that each agency contain a "regulatory policy office run by a political appointee," a change that "strengthens the hand of the White House in shaping rules that have, in the past, often been generated by civil servants and scientific experts." Yesterday, The Times turned to the rapid growth of federal contracting, fed "by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does."

These are two different pieces of the same story: under the guise of promoting a conservative agenda, the Bush administration has created a supersized version of the 19th-century spoils system.

The blueprint for Bush-era governance was laid out in a January 2001 manifesto from the Heritage Foundation, titled "Taking Charge of Federal Personnel." The manifesto's message, in brief, was that the professional civil service should be regarded as the enemy of the new administration's conservative agenda. And there's no question that Heritage's thinking reflected that of many people on the Bush team.

How should the civil service be defeated? First and foremost, Heritage demanded that politics take precedence over know-how: the new administration "must make appointment decisions based on loyalty first and expertise second."

Second, Heritage called for a big increase in outsourcing — "contracting out as a management strategy." This would supposedly reduce costs, but it would also have the desirable effect of reducing the total number of civil servants.

The Bush administration energetically put these recommendations into effect. Political loyalists were installed throughout the government, regardless of qualifications. And the administration outsourced many government functions previously considered too sensitive to privatize: yesterday's Times article begins with the case of CACI International, a private contractor hired, in spite of the obvious conflict of interest, to process cases of incompetence and fraud by private contractors. A few years earlier, CACI provided interrogators at Abu Ghraib.

The ostensible reason for politicizing and privatizing was to promote the conservative ideal of smaller, more efficient government. But the small-government rhetoric was never sincere: from Day 1, the administration set out to create a vast new patronage machine.

Those political appointees chosen for their loyalty, not their expertise, aren't very good at doing their proper jobs — as all the world learned after Hurricane Katrina struck. But they have been very good at rewarding campaign contributors, from energy companies that benefit from lax regulation of pollution to pharmaceutical companies that got a Medicare program systematically designed to protect their profits.

And the executive order described by The Times will make it even easier for political appointees to overrule the professionals, tailoring government regulations to suit the interests of companies that support the G.O.P. — or to give lucrative contracts to people with the right connections.

Meanwhile, never mind the idea that outsourcing of government functions should be used to promote competition and save money. The Times reports that "fewer than half of all 'contract actions' — new contracts and payments against existing contracts — are now subject to full and open competition," down from 79 percent in 2001. And many contractors are paid far more than it would cost to do the job with government employees: those CACI workers processing claims against other contractors cost the government $104 an hour.

What's truly amazing is how far back we've slid in such a short time. The modern civil service system dates back more than a century; in just six years the Bush administration has managed to undo many of that system's achievements. And the administration still has two years to go.

A Bid For Better Student Loans (WP)

By Michael Dannenberg And Phillip Longman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The average graduate of a four-year college now sets off in life burdened by almost $20,000 in student loans. Among those graduating from four-year private schools, it is not uncommon to owe $40,000 or more. Responding to this unprecedented burden on Americans seeking to improve themselves, the House recently passed a bill that, on average, would reduce the loan interest paid by college students by about $30 a month.

That's welcome relief. But by forcing banks to compete for the right to make government-guaranteed student loans, we can do much more to ensure that young Americans are not sunk by debt before they get a chance to start their careers and families.

How much could interest rates and government subsidies for student loans fall without causing banks to stop lending? Probably a lot, though no one can say for sure because there is no market mechanism for determining the price of student loan subsidies. Instead, the federal government guarantees banks that the student loans they issue will be repaid in full, and then, through the political process (i.e., after listening to bank lobbyists), promises banks a profit set in law by formula. Separately, Congress also sets the interest rates that borrowers pay.

Those terms leave the good folks who make student loans with little to complain about. Loan giant Sallie Mae makes a 43 percent return on its cost of capital while incurring virtually no risk. Such rich rewards suggest that guaranteed profits on guaranteed student loans could be cut substantially without reducing the number of Americans who can obtain such loans. But finding exactly the right subsidy price or market-clearing interest rate for student loans is not something Congress or anyone else can divine in the absence of a market.

Fortunately, there is an easy solution: Make lenders bid for the right to sell federally guaranteed student loans.

As the commercial says, when bankers compete, you win. The right to originate loans guaranteed against default by taxpayers is something of great value that the government currently gives away for free to the banking industry. Why shouldn't banks have to bid against one another to secure this sure source of profit, especially when it's the taxpayers who create this "business opportunity"? Banks could compete by offering the highest bid for the right to sell guaranteed student loans to designated schools or by agreeing to accept the lowest amount of subsidy.

How much revenue would such an auction raise? It's hard to say exactly in the absence of a market. But recently, one of the country's largest lenders, the Missouri Higher Education Loan Authority, sold off half its portfolio of student loans at a premium of 7.1 percent. This hints at the market value of government-guaranteed student loans and suggests that taxpayers could save $15 billion to $20 billion over the next five years if Washington relied on market mechanisms instead of backroom politics to establish subsidy rates.

We could use all that extra revenue to benefit needy college students directly through grants or by cutting interest rates on their loans. Or we could extend the No Child Left Behind Act into high schools, as the Bush administration wants. Really, we should do all three.

The idea of such an auction is hardly radical. The government auctions off its Treasury debt, as well as spectrum licenses and offshore drilling rights, among other things. These auctions are not without their flaws, but they are preferable to the government simply giving away public assets to the well-connected.

From the borrower's perspective, loan terms would not change. Banks with winning bids would be required to make the same government-guaranteed loans that are available today.

Yes, the auction system might reduce the number of lenders, but the difference wouldn't be much. According to the Education Department, 32 lenders control 90 percent of the market, and one, Sallie Mae, already owns more than half of all outstanding federal family education loans.

Besides, in the event of poor service, colleges that don't like the winning bidders would retain the option of shifting to the government's own Direct Loan program, which provides the same loans under the same terms and conditions as the subsidized bank alternative. And if borrowers are upset with the winning bidders' service, they could refinance with another lender, as millions who hold consolidated student loans already have.

The American system of financing higher education needs reform, and soon -- but we must do it by moving away from the current system of government price controls. Conservatives should approve of a system that lets a market mechanism determine the cost of student loans, while liberals should applaud the dismantling of one of the country's most egregious examples of corporate welfare.

On Race And The Census: Struggling With Categories That No Longer Apply (NYT)

By Brent Staples

Imagine the Census Bureau announcing that it would end the practice of asking people to identify themselves by race beginning in 2010. Black elected officials and their allies in the civil rights community would fight the proposal tooth and nail by arguing that racial statistics were necessary for enforcing civil rights laws — especially the Voting Rights Act — and that dropping race from the census would dilute black political strength. Enemies of affirmative action would jump for joy, believing that they had finally won.

But these antagonists aren't the only factions in the fight. A growing number of demographers and historians who are fully sympathetic to the civil rights struggle would probably be happy to see the word "race" disappear from the census as well. There seems to be an emerging consensus that the system of racial classification that has dominated national politics and the census for nearly two centuries is so fraught with imprecision — and so tainted by racist ideas that have been disproved by science — that it should eventually be dropped altogether.

This view has been percolating among census historians for years. But it has gained traction since the 1990s, when there was a pitched battle over a proposal that would have added a "multiracial" category to the 2000 census. A compromise allowed people to check more than one box for race. But that change only fueled the debate by revealing a conflict between the fixed racial categories that have long dominated American life and a different sense of identity that's clearly on the rise among younger Americans.

Most Americans think of racial categories as objective, even benign, descriptions that are part of the social fabric. But the historian Margo Anderson writes that official statistics on "race" or "color" were inaugurated into the federal statistical system in the early 19th century. By then the government had embraced the view that people of African descent were from genetically inferior ancestral groups and could never escape subordinate status.

Armed with this view, the Census Bureau became the fountainhead of 19th-century racist dogma. The bureau reported, for example, that free black people were disproportionately insane, thus supporting the view that slavery was the only suitable status for them. It actively promoted the eugenicist view that Americans of African descent were so inferior and ill equipped to survive that they would eventually become extinct.

The bureau during this period was obsessed with the notion that sexual contact between people of African and European dissent was polluting the theoretically "pure" white society. The belief that the so-called "races" had been set apart by God and nature led to the popular theory that children of mixed ancestry were akin to mules, which are sterile, and would die out after a single generation.

With an eye out for what the government saw as racial abomination, census wardens went house to house, eyeballing ostensibly white people for traces of creeping "blackness." This period marked the rise of the so-called "one-drop rule" — which defined as black anyone with any African heritage at all. That often meant banishment from jobs, housing and public schools set aside for whites. The "one-drop rule" has been stripped of its worst penalties. But it is still evident in the census, as Kim Williams of Harvard points out in her recent book, "Mark One or More: Civil Rights in Multiracial America." For example, people who checked both "white" and one minority race in 2000 were counted in a single-race minority group.

The system of racial classification used in this country will never be scrubbed clean of its racist origins. Indeed, the seemingly innocuous act of assigning people to "races" still sets them sociologically and biologically apart in a way that scientists and anthropologists have long since rejected. The Americans who checked more than one box in 2000 seem to reject this fixed, "one drop" formulation of race.

Many people now see race as a facet of personal identity that changes from time to time or even from place to place. In a follow-up survey just a year after the initial 2000 census, for example, about 4 of 10 people who had listed more than one race decided to change their responses. Kenneth Prewitt, a Columbia University professor and former census director, wrote in the journal Daedalus in 2005 that these people seem to see race not as a fixed demographic fact, but as "something closer to an attitude toward oneself."

The 2000 census suggests that we are gradually moving away from the rigid, racialist system of classification that has long dominated this country and toward a system that sees racial identity as more fluid. Even historians and demographers who sympathize with the civil rights struggle and who recognize the need to document discrimination now see that the "one-drop rule" will not be sustainable in the new, multiracial America. We may be stuck with the old formulation for the moment. But it's no longer a matter of if it will fall away. It's a matter of when.

Exports And Free Trade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

President Bush's trade promotion authority expires in a few months, and along with it the ability to strike new free-trade deals. So it's worth highlighting that some of the fastest-growing destinations for American products are the countries with which we've signed trade-opening accords.

DOJ_NMG_0127021

According to the U.S. Trade Representative's office, U.S. goods exports have climbed by some 26% among the 10 countries with which the U.S. has signed accords since 2001. Meanwhile, goods exports to the rest of the world have only grown by 13% across the same period.

The differential is even larger over the 12 months through November 2006 for new free-trade partners Australia, Chile, Jordan and Singapore. U.S. exports to those nations rose at a rate of 40.5%, compared with 14.4% to the rest of the world. No doubt this reflects the commodity (copper) boom in Chile, where, for example, Caterpillar has been able to double its exports of heavy equipment.

But bilateral free-trade agreements have also made those markets more accessible by sharply reducing tariffs on U.S. manufactured goods. These export markets have been especially important to manufacturers during the recent U.S. housing and auto slumps, helping to keep American workers employed.

The U.S. had three free-trade accords when Mr. Bush took office, and his Administration has put in place 10 more. While these trading partners represent only 7.3% of world GDP, they are the destination for 42% of U.S. goods exports. Agreements with the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica and Oman have passed Congress and await implementation, while pacts have been signed with Peru and Colombia, and still others are in the works.

We don't want to sound like mercantilists here. The freer flow of imports is arguably even a more important by-product of free trade, because imports allow U.S. consumers to buy more at cheaper prices and because they make American companies more efficient and competitive. In developing countries, imports also help to disperse political power by opening up cartels and monopolies to competition.

However, the new trade "populists" in Congress like to claim that U.S. exporters are getting a raw deal from Bush trade policy. As the export facts show, the truth is precisely the opposite.

Moving Toward Greater Drug Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration is making encouraging moves to strengthen its regulation of drugs that are already on the market. But the changes fall far short of what's needed to protect millions of unsuspecting patients whose adverse effects may show up only after years of use.

The agency has traditionally focused on the drug-approval process to determine if a drug is safe and effective. Unfortunately, by that time a drug has typically been tested in only a few hundred or a few thousand patients — too few for many kinds of adverse effects to become apparent. Once the drug is being used by millions, the agency has limited powers to halt sales that begin to look risky.

Last September, the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a report decrying the big imbalance between premarketing and postmarketing regulation. The report, which had been requested by the F.D.A., made some 25 recommendations for strengthening the agency.

The F.D.A had already been moving to strengthen its safety assessments but now has developed a more comprehensive approach. One notable venture is a pilot program to assess the safety of a few breakthrough drugs about 18 months after they are marketed. The F.D.A. will collaborate with the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Medicare and Medicaid programs, and other groups to track drugs in use. It will publish results on its Web site. Such steps should greatly improve the agency's ability to monitor the use of drugs in the real world.

Even so, Congress needs to give the agency more money and more teeth: including explicit powers to impose conditions on drugs that begin to look risky, to require additional testing and even to yank drugs from the market.

Alter: No More Excuses For Bad Teachers (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

The crazy thing about the education debate in the United States is that anyone with an ounce of brains knows what must be done. Each political party is about half right. Republicans are right about the need for strict performance standards and wrong in believing that enduring change is possible without lots more money from Washington. Democrats are right about the need to pay teachers more but wrong to kiss up to teachers unions bent on preventing accountability.

As President Bush's flawed (but landmark) No Child Left Behind (NCLB) program comes up for reauthorization this year, the onus is on Democrats. Will they cave to their party's biggest special interest—or do what most of them acknowledge in private is essential? Among Democratic presidential candidates, supporting accountability with teeth and more charter schools should be a litmus test for anyone serious about proving he or she is not just another hack.

The good news is that we're getting some leadership in New York, long a bastion of mindless paleoliberalism. Gov. Eliot Spitzer unveiled his first budget last week and it offers a grand bargain on education—much more money in exchange for much more accountability—that should be a national model. Predictably, State Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, in the pocket of teachers unions, objects to Spitzer's plan to allow for more charter schools, even though thousands of low-income parents are on waiting lists to get into them. The president of the United Federation of Teachers, Randi Weingarten, called the new governor and tried to buffalo him on charters. She failed.

Spitzer seems game to fight his own party's instinct to pander. "The national Democratic Party has got to understand that real education reform is a central issue both politically and for our economic future," he told me last week. "We have to get our arms around the idea that if there's no performance, you must remove those responsible for the failure." It's a sad commentary on Democrats that they've allowed "educational accountability" to become a winning issue for the GOP.

In New York City—home to 1,400 schools, 80,000 teachers and 1.1 million students—Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg (a huge improvement over his predecessor, Rudy Giuliani) is showing what accountability means. First, he won mayoral control of the school system, a prerequisite for getting anything done in a big city. Now his tough-minded schools chancellor, Joel Klein (a Democrat), is moving forward on an important new plan to slash administrative layers and empower individual schools. The idea is to make each principal "the CEO of the school instead of an agent of the bureaucracy," Klein says. More than 300 New York principals are signing performance contracts that give them more control in exchange for being accountable. Klein means business: "If your school gets a D or an F, I'm gonna fire your ass."

A big accountability problem nationwide is teacher tenure, which is almost automatically awarded whether a teacher is good or not. If he's not, he gets to commit educational malpractice for the next 40 years. In New York, Klein wants to toughen standards for receiving tenure, and he has already succeeded in ending union "bumping rights," where lousy teachers with seniority can bump good, younger teachers and move into a school where a good principal doesn't want them. Above all, a principal must have control of who teaches in his or her building. All other reforms depend on it.

At the five-year mark, NCLB is a mixed blessing. While Bush has sharply increased federal aid to at-risk schools, he broke his 2001 funding promises. Where's the cash to attract talented teachers? But once the Democratic Congress addresses the money problem and works out some testing kinks, the real fault of NCLB will become clear: it doesn't go far enough.

It's time to move from identifying failing schools to identifying failing teachers. That sounds obvious, but until now it hasn't happened in American education. "We need a management tool that can show whether Ms. Jones can teach long division," says Margaret Spellings, Bush's sensible secretary of Education. Too many educators are still caught in what Klein calls a "culture of excuses." The excuse du jour is that NCLB is "punitive." But Spellings has a point that basic assessment is both right and popular: "I don't think parents see reliable data as punitive."

Do Democratic presidential contenders? Education Week rated Iowa and New Hampshire as having the two least-accountable state education systems in the country. Uh-oh. Let's hope the press and public are prepared to call candidates to account if they undertake a primary-season panderfest.

OTHER NEWS:

A Bounce For Bush (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127023

It's not really too surprising that George W. Bush's visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange last week marked only the second time that a sitting president had made such an appearance. (The first was Ronald Reagan in 1985.) After all, most politicians probably think it's better to be seen as a representative of the common man and Main Street than of shiny-suited financiers and Wall Street.

But Bush's big problem right now is that instead of Main Street or Wall Street, he might be more associated with Haifa Street, the lethal "street of fear" in Baghdad where U.S. and Iraqi troops fought insurgents last month. So Wall Street's not a bad alternative for an embattled president dealing with a foreign policy nightmare, especially when he can talk up what's turning out to be a vibrant economic boom. On the same day that Bush visited the NYSE and gave an upbeat speech at historic Federal Hall in Manhattan-"consumers are confident, investors are optimistic," the president declared-the Commerce Department reported that the U.S. economy grew at a snappy 3.5 percent pace in the fourth quarter of 2006. "This was a strong number," says Joel Prakken, chairman of Macroeconomic Advisers in St. Louis, "that showed the year really ended strong."

Investors agreed, pushing the Dow Jones industrials up nearly 100 points. The economy's performance was especially impressive considering that it wasn't so many weeks ago that economists were whispering that the fourth quarter might be a "one handle"-meaning growth between 1.0 and 1.9 percent. Now instead of a "hard" or "soft" landing, bearish investment pros are talking about a "growth scare" where a surprisingly robust economy would push the Federal Reserve into raising interest rates. (The Fed, in its placid statement last week, seems to be worrying less about both weak growth and rising inflation.)

The fourth-quarter spurt brings the economy full circle. Growth started fast in 2006, up 5.6 percent in the first three months of the year, but then weakened dramatically as the housing market tanked, oil prices rose sharply, and auto production slackened. Gross domestic product grew by only 2.6 percent in the second quarter and 2 percent in the third. Yet for the year, the economy expanded by 3.4 percent-better than the 3.2 percent rate in 2005 despite all those challenges.

Even though many Americans own houses worth less than they were a year ago, they continue to spend like NBA rookies after draft day. Real personal consumption expenditures-a measure of consumer strength-rose 4.4 percent in the fourth quarter. Helping consumers afford their spending habits was a 5.4 percent jump in real disposable personal income. For the year, it climbed 2.7 percent vs. 1.2 percent in 2005. The recent drop in gas prices "means that consumers had more money in their pockets than they expected," says Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner, "and they spent it." Vitner also notes that lots of those dollars went toward buying ever cheaper flat-panel televisions. "They just flew off the shelves."

Most Agree: Housing Crunch Isn't Over Yet (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Housing is proving to be one of the biggest wild cards in the economy in 2007 as analysts are deeply divided about whether the worst in the downturn is over or there is much more pain to go.

Only 9% of economists say the housing decline ended in 2006, according to a USA TODAY survey of 55 economists taken Jan. 18-24. Another 42% said the downturn will end in the first half of the year, and 45% said housing will bottom out in the second half.

"This is one of those hot-button issues," says Christopher Rupkey, chief financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi. He estimates the downturn ended last year. "I don't know why people are so pessimistic."

When housing bottoms out is key for the economy. Thus far, the fallout has been small. The economy grew at a faster pace in 2006 than in 2005 even though sales of previously owned homes fell 8.2%, the biggest drop in 17 years, the National Association of Realtors says.

But the economy may not be able to shrug off further declines, A.G. Edwards & Sons chief economist Gary Thayer says. Lower energy prices and a strong job market have thus far helped consumers weather the housing downturn. But going forward, those two factors may not be big enough to offset further weakening, Thayer says.

"Seeing things stabilize and hearing reports that housing is stabilizing is good for consumer confidence," he says.

The NAR's index of pending home sales, which is adjusted for seasonal variations, rose in December at the fastest pace since March 2004. The level of unsold homes on the market appeared to have peaked in July, the group says.

But Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says although recent housing data have been upbeat, they have been skewed by warmer-than-usual weather.

"That brought out a few more buyers and allowed for more building in the Northeast," he says. Vitner says the warm weather "pulled sales forward." Come spring, housing activity will be slower than normal, he says.

"I haven't met a home builder yet who thinks things have bottomed out," he says.

Economist Tucker Hart Adams says the housing market won't stabilize in 2007. The combination of resetting adjustable-rate mortgages, homeowners unable to keep up with payments on so-called exotic mortgages such as interest-only loans, and other debt will lead to higher foreclosure rates and more homes on the market, she says. "It's really optimistic to think that it just took a little adjustment and everything is fine," she says. "It's one time I would like to be wrong."

Renters Will Dig Deeper In 2007 (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Renters be warned: Landlords are expected to raise apartment rents for a third-straight year in 2007, forcing tenants to turn over a growing chunk of their pay and making it harder to save for a home, a report to be issued today by Marcus & Millichap finds.

With the projected rise of 5% this year, rents would be 14% higher than at the end of 2004, the report says. Over the same period, paychecks are expected to rise 4%, adjusted for inflation.

The widening gap is likely to worsen the crisis for workforce housing, especially in coastal cities, says Hessam Nadji, a managing director at Marcus & Millichap, a real estate investment brokerage. "This is a national trend. We're seeing rents rise in the majority of markets, and we see this continuing for at least three years."

From 2000 to 2004, most landlords couldn't raise rents because so many tenants were leaving to buy houses or condos. To feed that buying frenzy, about 300,000 apartments were converted to condos for sale in the past three years. Now, even with 92,000 new rental units this year, the stock is still too little to meet rising demand.

"It's horrible. I'm going to pull my hair out," says Veronica Gonzales, 25, CEO of an event planning firm in Manhattan, where rents are expected to jump more than 7% this year, the sharpest increase in the USA. Gonzales has been hunting for six months for a place in the city for $2,000 a month. Unfortunately for Gonzales and other apartment dwellers, rents are rising because the payment gap between renting and owning remains wide. Even with this year's increase, the national median rent will be $943 a month, only 60% of the median mortgage payment of $1,566.

Renters will get a bit of a break in places such as Miami, Las Vegas and San Diego, where investors bought thousands of condos, hoping to flip them for a quick profit. Since the market faltered in late 2005, many of those condos have been empty, and investors are seeking tenants to help pay the mortgage.

Mohamed Amar bought two Las Vegas condos in 2005 that he's trying to rent. "I thought it was a good investment," says Amar. "But when I tried to put it on the market, the developer started cutting the price, and they killed everybody." Yet, even in these cities, the report says, rents will rise this year.

Democrats Expect GOP Bailout (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is watching more than two dozen House Republicans for signs they are ready to call it quits in 2008.

The Democrats believe a wave of Republican departures can help them cement their House majority.

“Democrats are on the offense and Republican seats that open up due to retirements are at the top of our bull’s-eye list,” said DCCC spokeswoman Jennifer Psaki.

Given the GOP’s new minority status in the House, Democratic strategists think some veteran Republicans will head into retirement while some younger Members will opt to run for other offices. Democrats also believe that ethics scrapes could force a handful of GOP incumbents from office.

"Being a seasoned Republican in Washington right now is like being a fifth-year senior in college whose fraternity was kicked off campus," said one Democratic source close to the DCCC who did not want to be named. "Why would you want to stay if you can leave, make more money and avoid being in the minority?"

Even though many of the 27 districts in question are notable for their Republican tilt, House Democratic strategists, emboldened by wins in the previous cycle in Republican territory such as Kansas and close calls in GOP bastions such as Wyoming, believe they can put many open seats in play.

Of the districts that the DCCC believes could become open, only New Mexico's 1st district, where Rep. Heather Wilson (R) eked out a 879-vote win over Democrat Patricia Madrid in November, and Delaware's at-large district preferred Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) to President Bush in 2004. Wilson is seen as a possible Senate candidate if Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) retires next year.

Republicans argue that if Democrats are counting on picking up seats such as Louisiana's 1st district — which gave Kerry only 29 percent of the vote, and where Rep. Bobby Jindal (R) is running for governor this year — then the GOP will take back the House in 2008.

"The National Republican Congressional Committee is optimistic about the energy, excitement and dedication of our incumbents to reclaiming the majority," spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said. "We also plan to be on offense around the country, reclaiming seats that have historically been in the Republican column.

"Wishful thinking and spin on the part of the Democrats is not going to do anything to obscure the fact that their freshmen and vulnerable are already making mistakes and casting bad votes for their districts," Boulanger added.

Democratic strategists familiar with the DCCC list obtained by Roll Call acknowledged that the likelihood that a particular Republican Member will retire, or that their party can even take advantage of a vacancy, varies greatly from district to district.

Topping the Democrats' list of pickup opportunities among potential retirees is Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.).

House Democrats made their biggest gains in the Midwest and Northeast in November and practically wiped out Republican moderates.

Castle, who suffered a minor stroke last year, may mount a Senate race if Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) vacates his seat to concentrate full time on his presidential bid. Democrats also believe the 67-year-old Republican incumbent might decide now is a good time to leave a Congress that increasingly has seen his party move to the right and become dominated by Southern conservatives.

But a spokeswoman for Castle — like aides to most of the Republicans on the DCCC's watch list — denied that her boss, who just won a ninth term, is ready to leave Washington.

"He was just appointed to the NRCC executive committee," said spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk. "It's kind of hard to say he's not going to run again when he's leading the effort to get the Republicans back in the majority."

That didn't stop the DCCC from deploying an operative to the First State last week to scout for potential candidates. The Democratic Party in Delaware is ready to target Castle, who won with 57 percent of the vote, even if he does not step down, according to a knowledgeable Democratic source.

Democrats picked up 11 House seats in the Northeast last year, and while they failed to knock off Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), they did not focus on Castle at all, which likely makes him an even more inviting target this time.

The DCCC also hopes to duplicate its success taking down Republicans caught in ethical storms. In 2006, Democrats ousted Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) and won open seats in Republican districts that had been held by indicted former GOP Reps. Bob Ney (Ohio) and Tom DeLay (Texas).

The Democrats' list demonstrates that they hope the ethics issue will play again in 2008.

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) reportedly is under FBI investigation, which has Democrats dreaming about his Inland Empire-based 42nd district, even though it gave Bush 62 percent of the vote in 2004. The same goes for the neighboring 41st district, where Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), former Appropriations Committee chairman, also is being scrutinized by federal authorities.

Both have hefty campaign bank accounts. Miller confirmed through a spokesman that he plans to seek a sixth term.

DOJ_NMG_0127026

A spokesman for Lewis, Jim Specht, said: "He's never speculated this early. He's focused on what he's supposed to be doing, which is providing the best possible service to his constituents and returning the Republicans back to the majority."

While Lewis has not committed to running for re-election, Democrats acknowledge that others on their list, such as Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.), are probably long shots for retirement.

Renzi, who was held to 51 percent of the vote in November amid allegations of wrong-doing in connection with a real estate transaction, looks like someone running for re-election. Republican leaders, including House Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), are hosting a reception at the Westin Kierland Resort & Spa in Scottsdale, Ariz., on Feb. 17 to benefit Renzi.

Renzi's office did not comment for this story.

Other Republicans made the DCCC list for various reasons.

Rep. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.) seemed to invite the DCCC to come after her when she won a seventh term by barely 1,000 votes in the Equality State in November, where only 29 percent of the electorate supported Kerry in 2004. Cubin's office did not respond to telephone messages.

Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.) had to be coaxed into running for an 11th term by GOP leaders, though a Gallegly aide told Roll Call late last year that his boss would run again in 2008.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio), who will be 83 on Election Day 2008, said he hasn't formulated his plans for next term yet.

Can Republicans Count On A House Snapback? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg, Roll Call Contributing Writer

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

Most surge elections, during which one party makes sweeping gains in the House of Representatives at the expense of the opposition, have been followed by a surge back toward the other party two years later.

Will the 2006 elections produce the same snapback, with substantial Republican gains, or can Democrats minimize their losses, securing their control of the House after next year's presidential election?

The history of recent surges and snapbacks is pretty clear. In 1964, during the Democrats' anti-Goldwater surge, Democrats knocked off 39 GOP incumbents and won eight Republican open seats. Two years later, the Republicans snapped back, defeating 39 Democratic incumbents.

The wave that accompanied Ronald Reagan's presidential victory in 1980, which ousted 27 Democratic officeholders and secured 10 Democratic open seats for the GOP, beget 1982, when 22 GOP incumbents were bounced from office. And the wave against President Bill Clinton in 1994, which took down 34 Democratic House Members and turned a stunning 22 Democratic open seats red, produced 1996, when 18 GOP incumbents lost bids for re-election.

Snapbacks are not inevitable, of course. In the Watergate year of 1974, Democrats knocked off 36 Republican House Members seeking re-election and seized 13 GOP open seats, and two years later the parties lost almost equal numbers of incumbents (seven Democrats and five Republicans). Republican seats that went Democratic because of Watergate generally stayed that way for at least a couple of elections.

In November, Democrats knocked off 22 GOP incumbents and added eight Republican open seats. That means that the number of Republican incumbents defeated in their bids for re-election in 2006, while substantial, was below (and in some cases well below) the number of incumbents defeated in earlier waves.

In the three snapback elections mentioned above, the party that lost a large number of incumbents one year knocked off at least half as many of the opposition's incumbents two years later. Sometimes the snapback was even stronger, as in 1964 and 1966, when equal numbers of incumbents lost in consecutive elections.

But none of the examples noted above is exactly replicated in the scenario for 2006 and 2008. Both the 1964 and 1980 waves occurred in presidential years, which meant that the snapbacks occurred during a midterm election. The 2006 wave occurred in a midterm year, and any snapback, if there is one, would take place in a presidential year.

One wave/snapback sequence — 1994 and 1996 — did occur in a midterm election, followed by a presidential year. But 1994 was Clinton's first midterm election, while 2006 was President Bush's second, and that's a significant difference for many reasons. For instance, Clinton was able to run again and remake himself after only two years in office.

Moreover, the Iraq War was crucial in contributing to the formation of a Democratic wave in 2006, creating an environment that is unique in the recent history of surges.

The war could continue to pose problems for the Republicans in 2008, and if so, that would minimize the chances of a snapback. Even though Bush will not be on the ballot in 2008, he still could be a factor that undercuts the appeal of his party and enhances Democratic prospects up and down the ballot. If independents continue to reject the GOP, Republican candidates will have a hard time reclaiming districts that they lost last year.

The possibility of a GOP snapback also is minimized by the nature of the '06 wave. Almost half of the districts that turned from Republican to Democratic are either competitive or Democratic-leaning, and as long as the freshman Democrats in those districts don't stumble badly, history suggests that they will be difficult to dislodge.

Former Republican Congressmen Charles Bass (N.H.), Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Jim Leach (Iowa), Anne Northup (Ky.), Rob Simmons (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.) didn't lose because they were terrible candidates. They lost because they were in marginal seats or in districts carried by Al Gore in 2000 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. It will be very difficult (though obviously not impossible) for the GOP to retake those districts, even if former Members run again for their former seats.

It also seems unlikely that GOP open seats that went Democratic in November in Iowa, Colorado, New York and Arizona suddenly will snapback to the Republicans.

So where are snapbacks most likely?

Republican chances of reclaiming seats lost in 2006 undoubtedly are strongest in fundamentally Republican and conservative districts. That means that Democratic House freshmen such as Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Nick Lampson (Texas), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and possibly Jerry McNerney (Calif.) are at greatest risk.

In addition, a couple of Democratic incumbents who almost lost despite the strong wind at their backs — Georgia Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall — surely have to consider themselves at considerable risk.

Obviously, the presidential contest will have a strong impact on the election year, as will the Democratic Congress' performance, party fundraising, candidate recruitment and retirements. We won't know for months which party will have the edge in House races in 2008, but it's likely that divided government will make it difficult to oust incumbents — and that should improve Democrats' chances of maintaining their House majority in next year's elections.

Eighty Percent In GOP See Return To Majority (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

A wide-ranging survey conducted recently by Rep. Scott Garrett's (R-N.J.) office provides a glimpse into the overall mood of the House's 202 Republican lawmakers now serving in the minority. The seven-page document was hand distributed to Congressional offices Jan. 17, and responses were culled and presented at the annual GOP retreat at the end of January.

Roll Call obtained a copy of the original survey last week, prompting Garrett's office to agree to review the results of the poll Friday. Sixty-one Members, or 30 percent of the Republican Conference, responded to the questionnaire. All responses were anonymous.

The most overwhelming response was that more than 80 percent of respondents said they believed the GOP could win a majority in the 2008 elections.

Members also were asked to rate the issues that resulted in Republicans losing the House on Election Day, and the overwhelming majority said that the ongoing Iraq War, federal spending issues, and the scandals surrounding former GOP Reps. Duke Cunningham (Calif.) and Mark Foley (Fla.) were the dominant reasons. "Nothing else was close," said Garrett's spokesman, Will Holley.

In fact, social issues were at the very bottom of the scale. For instance, the survey listed Congress' intervention into the case of Terri Schiavo in 2005, which received one of the lowest rankings in the survey. "I barely got anything, it was really low," added Chief of Staff Michelle Presson. "Social issues actually were pretty low overall; people were definitely more interested in the fiscal side."

Another question asked of Members was whether the GOP was better served in the minority by working with Democrats to get things done, or to fight back and attack their agenda. Not surprisingly, more senior Members leaned toward compromise, while the younger Members leaned toward battle. "There's a generational split on that, definitely the younger Members are not going to sit tight," Presson said.

Additionally, Members were asked whether they should pursue a conservative or more moderate legislative agenda, and a "large majority" said a conservative agenda, Holley said.

In line with that, a majority of Members who responded also identified themselves as on the "more conservative end of the spectrum," Presson said.

Those responses are tied to a broad feeling within the Conference that they need to fight Democrats, particularly on fiscal and spending issues. Garrett's office said that already is starting to play out on the House floor in debates over the $463.5 billion fiscal 2007 spending bill. While GOP leaders and Appropriations ranking member Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) voted against and urged a "no" vote on the bill, 57 Republicans sided with Democrats.

On the other side of the aisle, Republicans said Democrats' use of outside groups aligned with their party and a message that touched on many of the GOP's long-standing identifiers helped seal the GOP's defeat.

Holley noted that groups such as MoveOn.org were in districts like defeated Rep. Chris Chocola's (R-Ind.) six months before Election Day. Left-leaning groups "went out early, they started to chip away, and then the [Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee] came in and finished it up," Presson said.

When asked what Democrats were credited for doing right, Presson said, "They stole our ideas, they ran as Republicans." Presson pointed to candidacies such as Sen. Bob Casey (Pa.), a pro-life, pro-gun Democrat who defeated Sen. Rick Santorum (R).

"They finally woke up to the fact that you have to accept some people who may not believe in everything you believe in," she said. "The question is: How long can they afford to have those people, one, not back in their districts and, two, voting on things that play really well with the Democratic base but not with the independent voters that put them in office?"

Garrett, a Member of the Republican Policy Committee, was given the green light to conduct the survey by RPC Chairman Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.). His office said it was undecided if these pulse-check surveys would become a routine matter for the Conference.

Cole: NRCC Will Sit Out Primaries (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The National Republican Congressional Committee will not take sides in any House GOP primaries this cycle, NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) said in an interview Friday.

Cole also said that he will refrain from doling out personal endorsements and campaign contributions in primaries while he is chairman.

Cole's decision partly is due to the wishes of House Republicans, who in a recent closed-door meeting were fairly unified — and vocal — in their desire that the NRCC avoid playing kingmaker in contested primaries. But Cole also attributed his policy to a belief that candidates who navigate a primary without help or anointing from Washington, D.C., insiders emerge battle-tested for the general election and in a better position to secure the support of grass-roots Republicans.

Cole said he will not be endorsing any primary candidates as the 4th district Representative from Oklahoma because he believes his job as NRCC chairman doesn't allow for a distinction — and because such a move could be interpreted as a de facto endorsement by the committee.

"We're not going to be in primary situations. Our membership has made it pretty clear that they don't want us to do that," Cole said. He added: "There were a number of primaries I was in last cycle because of personal relationships. I don't have that luxury this time."

Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC chairman in the 2004 and 2006 cycles, took a slightly different view. During his tenure at the committee, the NRCC openly involved itself in at least one key primary, with Reynolds bestowing his personal endorsement on a primary candidate in an open or Democratic-held seat at least twice.

Reynolds' record on this front was mixed — and his moves angered some Members of the House Republican Conference. But some Republicans believe he was right on strategy, and say Cole must allow himself the same flexibility if the GOP is to have a shot at regaining the majority.

"If you seriously want to attempt to take the House back, you want to ensure the best candidate possible is running," said one Republican operative with experience running House races. "You can't do that if you're afraid of taking a risk."

Typically, the four Congressional campaign committees don't endorse in primaries as a general rule, though each cycle usually brings with it a few exceptions. It also is common for the committees to work behind the scenes on behalf of their preferred candidates, while maintaining an air of public neutrality.

In the previous cycle, the NRCC openly jumped into the primary in Arizona's 8th district, where staunch conservative Randy Graf was battling three moderate Republicans who were seen as a better philosophical fit for the moderate GOP seat and better positioned to beat the Democratic nominee in the general election.

The NRCC, believing Graf couldn't beat likely (and eventual) Democratic nominee Gabrielle Giffords, backed then-state Rep. Steve Huffman in the GOP primary. The NRCC spent money on independent expenditure advertising in an effort to aid Huffman, only to see him lose to Graf anyway.

Some Republicans believe this early pre-primary rebuke by the NRCC left Graf crippled in the general election, with almost no chance of beating Giffords, who went on to win handily. Had the committee refrained from playing in the primary, some critics say, Graf might have been able to beat her.

Still, Reynolds' strategy was successful elsewhere.

In 2004, in his capacity as the Congressman from the 26th district of New York, Reynolds personally endorsed now-Rep. Charlie Dent (R) in Pennsylvania's 15th district. Dent defeated two other primary challengers, winning 51 percent of the vote, and went on to win the open seat in the general election.

Last year, Reynolds personally endorsed Iraq War veteran Van Taylor in Texas' 17th district GOP primary. Taylor was seen as the most attractive candidate to take on incumbent Rep. Chet Edwards (D) in the solidly Republican district.

But after beating former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson in the primary, Taylor was beaten handily by Edwards in the general election.

Cole, a political consultant by trade before ascending to Congress in 2002, maintained that he is very unlikely to deviate from his vow to stay out of primary contests. However, there are exceptions.

If a GOP primary included a Republican candidate who is a racist or an anti-Semite, or exhibits other qualities that are extremely anathema to the values of the Republican Party, the committee would move to aid that candidate's opponent, Cole said.

Also, should a Republican incumbent draw a token primary challenger who is not in any real position to win the nomination, the NRCC will not sit on its hands and wait until after the primary contest to work on behalf of the incumbent's re-election. In the case where an incumbent Member attracts a serious challenger, those situations will be handled on a case-by-case basis.

"We will monitor races we think are important, but will not try and affect the outcome," Cole said. "We're really not in the game of picking winners and losers."

Madame front-runner

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has a definite lead among 10 Democratic hopefuls in the 2008 presidential race, according to the American Research Group, which polled 600 Democratic and independent likely voters in both Iowa and New Hampshire on Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. Mrs. Clinton is favored by 35 percent of Iowans and 39 percent of New Hampshire respondents -- compared with 18 percent and 13 percent in each state, respectively, who favored John Edwards.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois mustered 14 percent and 19 percent, "undecided" was cited by 13 percent and 21 percent, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack 12 percent and 1 percent. The rest, including Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, only managed to garner the favor of between 1 percent and 2 percent of the respondents in both states, the survey found. It has a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points.

Nader raiding

Republican strategists can count on it: Democrats may strut their stuff on Capitol Hill, but still quibble among themselves. Asked his opinion of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader got crabby, indeed.

"I don't think she has the fortitude. Actually, she's really a panderer and a flatterer. As she goes around the country, you'll see more of that," Mr. Nader told CNN yesterday. "I think her main problem may well be right in New York City, [Mayor] Michael Bloomberg."

"You like Bloomberg?" asked anchorman Wolf Blitzer.

"I'm saying he'll give more diversity for sure, and he'll focus on urban problems," Mr. Nader replied, noting that he would never vote for Mrs. Clinton and is partial to Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich.

"We have got a money horse race now," Mr. Nader said. "The press and the polls are gravitating on cash-register politics as if there's a bar graph to see who's going to raise the $100 million or $200 million, [Senator John] McCain or [Senator Barack] Obama or Hillary. That's very unhealthy. That's rancid politics."

Still right-of-center

Sen. John McCain says it's only Washington insiders who think his 2008 presidential bid is in trouble because he supports President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

"I think there's that, maybe, perception inside the Beltway. But outside, a lot of Republicans are rallying to this belief that we need to have a strategy that can win and realize the consequences of failure," the Arizona Republican told ABC yesterday.

"Many people trust my judgment because they've known me for many years," he said. "I think we're doing just fine, and I think polls indicate that. We're still a right-of-center party. This nation is still a right-of-center nation. And I believe the Democrats are the left-of-center party. So, do we need to make significant adjustments, learn the lessons of the 2006 election? Absolutely."

The 'owe' factor

"A key supporter of Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support," wrote Ben Smith of the Politico.com yesterday.

The comments were made by Illinois state Senate President Emil Jones during the Democratic National Committee's black caucus at the Washington Hilton this weekend and "angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists," according to Mr. Smith.

Mr. Jones asked his audience, "How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" and later implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel and drag down a successful member of their community."

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant, told Politico, "The heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats. The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton."

Snow no-show

American Spectator senior editor Quin Hillyer thinks Tony Snow should consider a run for the U.S. Senate. Yes, that Tony Snow, White House spokesman.

"Conservatives have been desperately searching for a champion who knows how to communicate, how to engage and inspire the public, ever since Ronald Reagan left the scene. What has been missing in the interim is not merely some acquired skill or a trick of communicating, but a communications talent that is married to a genuine, heartfelt, long-developed set of beliefs. It's the marriage of communication with philosophy that is needed; one without the other won't do. Snow is clearly genuine," Mr. Hillyer wrote in a Jan. 31 column.

"Is this, then, an endorsement of Tony Snow for president in 2008? Not exactly. But it is a suggestion that Snow has a great deal of the 'right stuff' for which conservatives have been looking, perhaps enough of the right stuff to make the idea worth pondering for 2012 or even 2016 (he's only 51 right now).

"If Snow can't exactly pull off a race for president in 2008, there is another public office he ought to consider. Virginia's senior U.S. Sen. John W. Warner will be just shy of 82 when the next election rolls around."

The notion piqued the interest of U.S. News & World Report's Paul Bedard, who went right to the source yesterday, asking Mr. Snow if he intended to pursue office.

"I am absolutely Shermanesque," came the reply. "After this job, the best I am likely ever to have, I'm going to do something that will enable me to spend much more time with the family."

Tough choices

Retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor left the Supreme Court because of her ailing husband, not because she was ready to retire, according to Newsweek. She had once planned to follow the tradition of previous justices, who work until they drop, essentially.

"Most of them get ill and are really in bad shape, which I would've done at the end of the day myself, I suppose, except my husband was ill and I needed to take action," she said.

Mrs. O'Connor, 76, currently divides her time between Washington and Arizona, where she cares for her husband, John, who has Alzheimer's and now resides in a Phoenix care center. She still has an office at the Supreme Court, still draws a salary and fills in as a federal judge. She also recently served on the 10-member bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

"I wasn't sure I should do it. It was so out of my field of judging. I don't know anything about the military," Mrs. O'Connor said, though she wouldn't weigh in on President Bush's rejection of the group's suggestions for a gradual withdrawal of troops.

"There are probably no perfect answers," she said.

Born Again Supply-Sider? (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain, who echoed Teddy Kennedy on taxes when he ran for president in 2000, sounds more like Jack Kemp as a 2008 candidate. "I've never voted for a tax increase in 24 years," he told me last week. "Never, ever, not under any president, including President Reagan, and I will never vote for a tax increase, nor support a tax increase."

He wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent. ("If I didn't vote to make those tax cuts permanent, it would have the effect of a tax increase.") He supports radically scaling back the estate tax and does not now favor upper-income increases in the Social Security tax. McCain gets tax policy advice from conservatives, including supply-side founding father Arthur Laffer. "I may have changed some of my views," the senator said. "You learn over 24 years."

Thus, McCain passes the Republican tax litmus test, as he did not in 2000. That may be why McCain has lost liberal journalists and other non-Republicans entranced by his campaign against George W. Bush. McCain pained these former admirers by making peace with Jerry Falwell and advocating more troops in Iraq, but it is his current position on taxes that most aggravates them.

In an Iowa presidential debate on Jan. 15, 2000, he confronted Gov. Bush: "Your tax plan has 36 percent of it going to the richest 1 percent in America. . . . I think that we ought to give the tax relief to the people who need it most." In 2001, he broke party ranks to oppose President Bush's tax cut. Interviewed by Stephen Moore of the Wall Street Journal in November 2005, he preached class warfare in defending that vote: "I just thought [Bush's tax cut] was too tilted to the wealthy, and I still do. . . . We have a wealth gap in this country, and that worries me."

In contrast, McCain told me he voted against the Bush tax cut "because of my concerns with no commensurate restraint in spending." He said, "We are all happy with results of the tax cuts as far as revenues are concerned, and they have been justified."

He added, "I am glad the tax cuts had the effect they did." So did McCain regret voting no? "I can't tell you that I cast exactly right votes over the years."

McCain sounded most like Kemp when he told me: "I want everyone to be rich. I worry about inequities. I think that corporate greed is hurting their image. But trying to enact some kind of legislation that would take money from the rich and give it to the poor, that's just out of the question."

He has not yet joined his confidant, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), in wanting to raise the cap on taxable income -- taxing the rich -- as part of general Social Security reform: "I have not taken any position that would either increase taxes or raise the cap." McCain's economic policy chairman is Douglas J. Holtz-Eakin, former head of the Congressional Budget Office. The senator has reached out to California financier Gerald Parsky, a former assistant Treasury secretary described by McCain as "very important to me." That was also how he labelled Laffer, who has been counseling him the past year. McCain's longtime political ally, former Texas senator Phil Gramm, advises him frequently. While McCain conceded disagreement among them, "the people that advise me, I guarantee, are very conservative economists."

It is difficult to measure how much the transformation of McCain from taxer to tax-cutter has contributed to his fading popularity among Washington's media elite, but the romance is gone. The change, however, has not boosted McCain's stock in Congress, particularly the House. Conservatives justifiably complain about his positions on global warming and campaign finance. But McCain was fighting congressional earmarks before it was popular, and that has antagonized Republicans. So do comments like the ones he made to me that Republicans "have spent more and increased the size of government more than at any time since the Great Society." Passing the litmus test on taxes will not make McCain popular with the House GOP elite.

McCain Calls New Advisers 'Good People' (NYT)

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Senator John McCain said Sunday that several aides brought on to his presidential campaign were "good people," despite his own past criticisms of their work for others in the past.

Appearing on "This Week" on ABC, Mr. McCain was asked about a front-page article in The New York Times on Sunday noting that Mr. McCain's political team includes advisers who tried to skewer him in the 2000 primary against George W. Bush. And Mr. McCain has brought on members of the team that produced the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement in 2004 questioning the Vietnam War service record of Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, which Mr. McCain had criticized.

"These are good people who were doing as they were instructed," Mr. McCain said Sunday. "They are people who shape the message, don't dictate it."

Asked whether, as The Times reported, the hirings suggested that Mr. McCain would be "running a different kind of campaign this time around," he said: "Am I going to respond to a negative attack if there is one? Obviously, I would do so, but I hope we would do so in an honorable fashion. We will run an honorable campaign."

Edwards' Health Care Plan Includes Taxes (AP)

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Sunday his plan for universal health care would require higher taxes and cost up to $120 billion year.

"The bottom line is we're asking everybody to share in the responsibility of making health care work in this country. Employers, those who are in the medical insurance business, employees, the American people — everyone will have to contribute in order to make this work," the 2004 vice presidential nominee said.

"Yes, we'll have to raise taxes. The only way you can pay for a health care plan that costs anywhere from $90 (billion) to $120 billion is there has to be a revenue source," the former North Carolina senator said.

Edwards said his plan would aim to provide health care coverage for the 47 million people who currently lack it and reduce the cost of health care coverage for middle-class families, partly by making health care programs more efficient.

Edwards cited health care insurance premiums that he said have risen 90 percent over the past decade.

"We want to make sure everybody's covered. We want to help middle-class families with the costs. We want to try to create competition that doesn't exist today," he said.

To accomplish all this, Edwards said he would expand Medicaid and a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children, and provide federal health care subsidies. He said he wants employers to play a bigger role, either by offering coverage or buying into "health markets" that would include a government plan.

Edwards said he would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes.

On the war in Iraq, Edwards sought to distinguish himself from one of the Democratic front-runners, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Edwards, who served on the Senate's intelligence committee, repeated earlier statements that his vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq was a mistake.

"My vote was wrong and I take responsibility for it," said Edwards.

He added, "I think anybody who wants to be president of the United States has got to be honest and open, be willing to admit when they've done things wrong."

Clinton, who also voted to authorize force, has said "there are no do-overs in life." She says Congress received bad information from the Bush administration going into the vote and she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

"If she believes that her vote was wrong, then yes, she should say so," Edwards said. "If she believes that her vote was right, then she should defend it."

Edwards appeared on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

Edwards Again Says He Was Wrong To Vote For War (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Of the 2008 Democratic presidential contenders who voted to give President Bush authority to wage war in Iraq, only one will have no chance to make a very public U-turn when resolutions opposing the president's new war plan come before Congress in the coming days.

That one is John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator who showed again yesterday that he will find other venues to parlay his Senate vote into an extended mea culpa.

Edwards began drawing attention to his vote in fall 2005, writing an op-ed piece in The Washington Post that began with: "I was wrong."

The soul-searching continued yesterday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"It wasn't just the weapons of mass destruction I was wrong about," Edwards said. "It's become absolutely clear -- and I'm very critical of myself for this -- become absolutely clear, looking back, that I should not have given the president this authority."

Edwards's nationally televised admission was just the start of a lengthy public dissection of the errors he said he made in casting the most important vote of his Senate tenure.

Some believe that kind of introspection has helped Edwards build a bridge to the most vocal anti-Iraq-war quarters of the Democratic Party and may help distinguish him from one of his chief rivals for the party's nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.).

During yesterday's broadcast, Edwards said he believes that "anybody who wants to be president of the United States has got to be honest and open, be willing to admit when they've done things wrong."

"If she believes that her vote was wrong," Edwards said when asked about Clinton, "then, yes, she should say so. If she believes her vote was right, then she should defend it."

Clinton has not retracted her vote to authorize the war, saying "there are no do-overs in life." But she has made no secret of her distaste for the war.

On Friday, she defended her support for a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq but also said she is ready to press for tougher action.

DOJ_NMG_0127034

"John Edwards is fully aware that Senator Clinton has been a strong and consistent critic of the war and has taken responsibility for her vote," said Phil Singer, a Clinton campaign spokesman. "Instead of attacking the character of fellow Democrats, she is working to stop President Bush's escalation and bring an end to the war."

Edwards's apologies have earned him respect in some quarters of the antiwar movement.

Tim Carpenter, national director of Progressive Democrats of America, said in a recent interview that he believes many in that camp "have really reacted to some very strong statements [by Edwards] on the war. What he has shown is a capacity to grow and to learn."

Darcy Scott Martin, who runs the antiwar True Majority Action PAC, said yesterday that she can sense candidates are "searching for a level of credibility" on the war.

"It's pretty clear," she said, "that antiwar people don't really have a candidate yet. And he's trying to capture those people."

One candidate who will not have to develop a strategy to justify early backing of the Iraq war is Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who expressed strong opposition while still a state senator in Illinois. Russert asked Edwards whether Democratic voters would say, "On the big issue of the war, Obama was right, Edwards was wrong."

"I was wrong," Edwards replied, but he added that voters should also consider "who has the depth, the maturity, the judgment to be president of the United States."

During the interview, Edwards also gave new details of his plan for universal health care, which he said would require new taxes.

He said he would propose spending $90 billion to $120 billion a year to expand Medicaid, provide subsidies for people who lack coverage, ask employers to take on additional coverage needs and create what he called "health markets" around the country to create some efficiencies.

"Yes, we will have to raise taxes," he said. That would start, he added, by repealing the tax cuts introduced by Bush during his first term.

Familiar Face, But A New Tone (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — John Edwards has no intention of getting lost in the shuffle.

Faced with what he always knew would be a tough race against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination and now the challenge of convincing his party that he is also a better alternative than Senator Barack Obama, Mr. Edwards is trying to muscle his way past them and the rest of the field, in part by staking out early and provocative positions on the big issues.

On the war in Iraq, Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, not only came out for a complete withdrawal within 12 to 18 months, but he also challenged his Democratic rivals who are still in government to confront President Bush more directly. And on Monday, Mr. Edwards will set out a plan to provide health insurance to the 46.6 million Americans who do not have it, stealing a march on Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats on what is shaping up to be one of the biggest domestic issues of the presidential race.

Appearing on “Meet the Press” on NBC on Sunday, Mr. Edwards said he would raise taxes on people making more than $200,000 a year to help pay for the plan, which he estimated could cost up to $120 billion a year.

Mr. Edwards, his party’s nominee for vice president in 2004, has taken on a sharper tone since that campaign ended in defeat.

He is campaigning as a harder-edged economic populist now, which he says represents more a change in tone than in substance. He says he is both more electable and more authentic than Mrs. Clinton, and more experienced than Mr. Obama.

The rapid emergence of Mr. Obama has scrambled the Democratic field in a way that poses a particular challenge for Mr. Edwards. He now faces intense competition for the role of fresh-faced change agent. His appeal to voters who feel disenfranchised by the economy and aggrieved by the war must now carry over the similar message being developed by Mr. Obama.

But in the battle to be the most credible alternative to Mrs. Clinton in the Democratic primaries, Mr. Edwards has built some early advantages.

He has avidly pursued labor support, marching on picket lines in Miami, Las Vegas and Chicago, pushing for state minimum wage increases and speaking at union conventions. He is offering proposals on the war, health care and the environment that are more audacious and more specific than those of his rivals.

His efforts have paid substantial dividends. He leads in early polls in Iowa and is near the top in New Hampshire surveys. He is ahead of his principal rivals in organizing in the two new early caucus and primary states of Nevada and South Carolina. He has a solid financing base in trial lawyers and antiwar Internet activists, high name recognition and experience on the campaign trail.

Mr. Edwards acknowledged that he was running as a very different candidate this time. He said he had grown and matured and learned from his mistakes, and has told friends that he really was not ready to run for president in 2004. He has spent the past two years directing a poverty center at the University of North Carolina and traveling the country and world to learn about the problems that will confront the next president. He said he had learned more in the past two years, a period that included the recuperation of his wife, Elizabeth, from a life-threatening encounter with breast cancer, than in his six years in the Senate.

"I, like all of you, have evolved," Mr. Edwards said last week to a sizeable crowd at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H. "It is not enough to do small things. Baby steps and incremental change are not enough. We need transformational change."

Mr. Edwards said such change would involve considerable sacrifice by Americans who can afford it, in the form of higher taxes for the wealthy to pay for health care for those who do not have it now and voluntary reductions in the use of fossil fuels to address global warming. He said the nation had more important priorities than balancing the federal budget.

He has clearly migrated to the left in the past several years. He has repudiated his 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq and has called on Mrs. Clinton to do the same. He said nonbinding resolutions on the war, like those supported by Senators Clinton and Obama, were meaningless.

Some critics and aides to rival candidates say all of this is nothing more than an opportunistic rebranding to attract labor and Internet support to mount a viable primary challenge to Mrs. Clinton and the unexpected threat from Mr. Obama.

Others say that though Mr. Edwards is a credible contender, like anyone running an insurgency against the establishment candidate, he will not be able to fall back on the top-tier institutional and financial support that will rescue Mrs. Clinton if she should stumble in the early states where Mr. Edwards appears strongest.

"He has a distinguishing message, he has deep committed organizational help as a result of the work he's done both with unions and other groups around the country, and he's leading in Iowa," said John D. Podesta, who served as chief of staff in the Clinton White House and is now an adviser to Mrs. Clinton. Despite all that, Mr. Podesta said, Mr. Edwards will have trouble overcoming Mrs. Clinton's broad and deep support.

Mr. Podesta cited the example of Gary Hart in 1984, who ran as a progressive alternative to the establishment candidate, former Vice President Walter Mondale. "He couldn't convert his early strength into the nomination," Mr. Podesta said. "There was enough time and enough influence by the party elites to backstop Mondale when he took some early blows."

The John Edwards of the 2004 campaign is still recognizable today: the youthful face, the story of the son of the mill worker who made good as a trial lawyer fighting for the wronged against the powerful.

But his campaign voice is different, at times angry and more impatient. He said that in his last campaign he was handicapped first by his inexperience as a national candidate, and then by his subordinate role as Mr. Kerry's vice presidential nominee. He said that this time he was more seasoned and unshackled, which he believes gives him advantages over his two most prominent rivals, Senators Clinton and Obama.

Americans assume they know Mrs. Clinton, he said, "But what is unknowable is what will happen during the course of the campaign, what it will reveal about the character, the integrity, the decency of the candidates involved." He said that Mr. Obama had no idea what was about to hit him. "The intense spotlight of a national campaign is an experience that is unique for any American," Mr. Edwards said. "You may think you know what it's like, but if you haven't been through it, you don't."

He said he had seen the impact of free trade on workers in the United States and abroad and now doubted whether he would again support permanent normal trade relations with China, which he voted for as a senator. He said he probably would support the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act again, but would demand stronger protections for domestic civil liberties.

He displayed another difference from 2004 at the meeting at Dartmouth last week. A student asked him whether he would support a law allowing for full marriage benefits for gay men and lesbians.

He said he had grown up as a Southern Baptist in a conservative small town and was torn by the concept of same-sex marriage. “I’ll admit I’m personally conflicted about these issues,” he said. “I am not personally for gay marriage, but it troubles me that I’d use my own experience as the basis for a policy decision.” He said that while he opposed same-sex marriage, he supported civil unions for gay couples and all anti-discrimination laws.

Mr. Edwards said later that had he been asked the same question in 2004, “I would have finessed it and given a formulaic answer.” He added, “I just find it easier to be more candid now.”

Mr. Edwards and his aides are counting on the work of the past two years to help overcome his biggest challenges. He has hired a new campaign manager, David E. Bonior, former Democratic representative of Michigan and an unreconstructed pro-labor liberal, and is hoping for organizational help, if not endorsements, from politically active unions. Mr. Edwards makes a point of greeting bartenders, kitchen workers and hotel clerks at all his campaign stops.

Anna Burger, secretary-treasurer of the Service Employees International Union, which has 1.8 million members, said the union would not necessarily endorse a candidate in the Democratic primary, but she spoke warmly of Mr. Edwards.

“He’s been in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago and Boston talking to hotel workers,” Ms. Burger said. “He believes deeply in the rights of working people.”

What is unknown is how he, and all the other contenders, will stand up under a full year of scrutiny in a primary process that began earlier and promises to be more intense than ever.

Fineman: Dem Candidates Come Out Swinging (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

John Edwards played defensive back in high school, and waiting offstage to speak, he looked eager to get onto the field and hit someone. That is what he did (rhetorically) in the first scrimmage of the 2008 presidential campaign last Friday. Speaking to the Democratic National Committee after Sen. Barack Obama and before Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, he accused Senate Democrats (that is, Obama and Clinton) of caving in to President Bush's Iraq escalation policy. Democrats had to use all their "vigor and tools and strength" to block the surge and begin a withdrawal. "Americans are counting on us not to be weak, political and careful," he said. "It's time for political courage."

Isn't it a little early to start calling your opponents cowards, even if you don't do it by name? Not this time: nasty is in season already. One reason is the insane money scramble, which literally raises the stakes. And with such a demographically diverse field, chances for emotional collisions abound. When Sen. Joe Biden called Obama "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Hillary's minions didn't focus on Biden; they focused on Obama, who was accused by some black leaders of not being indignant enough on behalf of his own racial heritage.

But the real flash point is Iraq. Hillary's idea of threatening to pull support for the Iraqi government would produce "nothing but disaster," Biden told The New York Observer. He was equally critical of Edwards's plan to call home 40,000 troops now.

Senators are bumping into each other as they move left. Sen. Chris Dodd says Democrats should stage a new "authorizing" vote on the war itself. "The original justifications are gone—discredited," he told me. Obama unveiled his own Iraq plan, which sets a March 31, 2008, deadline for removing all American troops unless the Iraqi government meets tough conditions.

Going "negative" on the war is tricky for Obama, who says he wants to walk the high road. At the DNC, he hushed the crowd with a sermon about how politics should not be "blood sport." But his campaign brags that he was "alone among the candidates in opposing the Iraq war" from the start, and in his speech he proclaimed that he was "opposed to this invasion publicly, frequently and before it began." No blood, but a sharp jab.

Edwards embodies the darker tone. In a hotel "holding room" after the DNC meeting, he was a tougher, more combative character than the one I had met eight years ago. Now you see the Dennis Quaid grin less often. "I've grown up," he said with a shrug.

And he brims with what seems like resentment at Democrats who won't support national health insurance right now (take that, Hillary) or who "talk about labor's concerns only in front of union audiences" (take that, Obama). "I want people to know exactly what I stand for." That sounds like an obvious enough game plan, but it is one he didn't have when he took the field four years ago.

Obama Confronts 'Outsider' Dilemma (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

In the nearly three weeks since Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) made his unofficial debut as a presidential candidate, his senior advisers have been holed up in a temporary office on Connecticut Avenue NW, feverishly working to translate the huge excitement about his candidacy into a political strategy.

For all the buzz about his running, Obama did not enter the race with the conventional weapons of a presidential candidate -- a deep database of donors, a tactical road map for winning primaries or even a sign marking the entrance to his ad hoc campaign headquarters. Obama is only now starting to build a political infrastructure that matches his growing support.

But the challenge for Obama is not just assembling the nuts and bolts of a national campaign on the fly. He must, his advisers believe, do so in a way that reflects the distinct, next-generation message of his candidacy, or at least avoids making him look like every other politician in the race. "I would sooner lose the race than lose having him the way he is," said David Axelrod, his chief media strategist.

While acknowledging that there are "certain immutable realities of the process," Axelrod insisted that "the kind of things we do over time will be emblematic of the campaign that we're running. And if we are doing it right, they won't be identical to everyone else's."

That vague mission -- not unlike the one that faced both Howard Dean and retired Gen. Wesley K. Clark as relative outsiders who came late to the 2004 presidential race -- is in the hands of a growing group of respected, if not exactly unconventional, operatives who have had to spend an inordinate amount of time in the past few weeks simply mastering logistics. Led by David Plouffe, the campaign manager, the team spent the day of Obama's exploratory-committee announcement answering phones and taking down volunteers' phone numbers.

Now the advisers are beginning to implement a broader strategy. In contrast to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who spent the first two weeks of her official candidacy trying to project strength and inevitability, Obama will seek a more pared-down image that focuses on the substance of his message ("the audacity of hope," as his book title put it) rather than on proving his ability to win a general election.

Obama gave a glimpse of how his campaign will look and feel on Friday, when he delivered somber remarks at the Democratic National Committee meeting that left the audience hushed at points. No one passed out "Obama" posters; the candidate took the stage without any music, unlike some other Democratic contenders who bounded to the dais to the blaring sounds of rock-and-roll oldies.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope," Obama told the crowd. "They say, 'Well, we want specifics, we want details, and we want white papers, and we want plans.' We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope. And over the next year, over the next two years, that will be my call to you."

From Washington, Obama headed to Fairfax for an event that his advisers said illustrated his campaign strategy even more directly: a student rally organized through the online networking site Facebook.com. Thousands of students attended the Web-driven event at George Mason University -- evidence, the Obama campaign said, that the popularity of its candidate will spread virally through the electorate rather than as a result of paid television ads or campaign mailings.

"Our campaign will never be the most rigid, structured, top-down, corporate-type campaign in this nomination battle," said senior Obama adviser Robert Gibbs. "There are plenty of other people that can do 'politics as usual' far better than we can. But I hope we have a campaign whose support continues to expand even faster than you can put a fence around it."

Matt Bennett, a senior adviser to the Clark campaign in 2004, described the phenomenon as trying to "ride a tiger."

"It's the toughest thing to do in presidential politics, which is to walk the line between maintaining your genuine attractiveness to the grass roots and becoming a credible national candidate, because often those things are in direct conflict," he said. "He is the candidate that is exciting this huge mass of people, and he cannot let them down in a fundamental way. But he has also got to do the blocking and tackling that candidates do."

To that end, the Obama campaign spent the weekend moving its headquarters to Chicago (far away, they note, from the sprawling Clinton offices on K Street) and organizing Obama's official campaign debut this Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

And they are already bumping up against the realities of riding his booming grass-roots support while obeying the conventions of running for president. Logistical concerns, such as how much time to spend campaigning in Iowa and New Hampshire, are at odds with the imperative for him to prove his seriousness in the Senate.

The task of raising millions of dollars to survive the primaries is competing with Obama's core image as a fresh face -- a familiar dilemma for a professed outsider, but one that his advisers and rivals alike believe he can overcome.

Perhaps most important, Obama's strategists are scrambling to manage expectations. "Given the need to build a fundraising infrastructure and the fact that we do not accept contributions from federal lobbyists and political action committees, raising $8 to $10 million in the first quarter would be great news," spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said.

"An Obama campaign clearly has tremendous fundraising potential in the long term," Pfeiffer said. "But it is absurd to assume that we should raise as much or more than others who have been building fundraising networks for years and years."

Rivals in the Democratic contest contend that he could raise as much as $40 million, potentially raking in $1 million in a single Hollywood fundraiser, and will all but fail an early test of his viability if he comes up with less than former North Carolina senator John Edwards before April. Edwards is expected to raise as much as $15 million in the first quarter, and Clinton is expected to raise as much as $30 million, though both of those campaigns, like Obama's, insist they could take in less.

"By all accounts, Obama is poised for a huge fundraising quarter," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson, predicting that Obama will raise $25 million or more. Wolfson played down the notion that Obama's campaign needs time to get up to speed. "You can build an operation fairly quickly if you know what you're doing, and I suspect they know what they're doing," he said.

Still, Clinton spent more than $30 million during the 2006 election cycle, much of it on building an infrastructure, including a donor database, that could be used in her presidential bid. That puts a gulf between her and her rivals, including Obama. "Nobody has ever come to the table with the built-in advantages that Hillary Clinton has," said Jim Jordan, a Democratic strategist advising Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) in the race. "She has had decades to build this organization, and clearly has been running for president more or less for six years, on top of everything else that was previously built for her husband."

Obama "started later than other people, and that's going to show for a while," Jordan said. "But ultimately that's not what's going to decide whether he wins."

Instead, he and others said, Obama will rise or fall on his ability to continue coming across as the candidate who is different, new and charismatic.

"If he tries to run a traditional campaign -- that is run, staffed, managed and operated in a traditional way -- he is playing to his opponents' strengths, both in terms of going head-to-head where they're going to be really strong, but also in terms of undermining a good chunk of his message," said Chris Lehane, a former spokesman for Al Gore who is not currently on the payroll of any presidential campaign.

It remains to be seen how the kind of nontraditional campaign Lehane envisions would work in a round-the-clock news environment. Would Obama decline to respond to attacks? Or to skewer his rivals? Or to answer activists' questionnaires? Or to give detailed answers about his views on policy? Or to play pop music and blast red-white-and-blue confetti at his events?

For now, the answer is yes.

"I think he is very focused on the fact that he doesn't want to lose his essential self in this process, and if he does -- and if what he projects and delivers is just more of the kind of politics people have become accustomed to -- it would be a disappointment to him, and to them," Axelrod said.

"It's not just how he delivers the message but how we deliver the message, and what kind of relationship we develop with our supporters," he said. "If this campaign is what it should be, this is not going to be the hoisting of an icon. It's going to be the movement of millions of people."

Black Rift Widens Over Obama (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 5, 2007

A key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still "owe" Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians.

The comments by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists.

"How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" Jones asked in a speech Friday to more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC, according to people who were there.

Jones, a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel" the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community.

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant who was at the caucus meeting, said Jones' words and the heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats.

"The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton," he said.

Jones spoke after the DNC's chief of staff, Leah Daughtry, told the group that she and the DNC would remain neutral in the 2008 presidential nominating contests.

"This is no time for neutrality," Jones said in an interview Saturday. "We have a well qualified candidate, and I urged them to get behind his candidacy."

"I didn't mention Clinton by name," he said.

But the remarks by one of Obama's longtime political mentors in Illinois was widely taken to refer to a debt felt in the black political community to Bill Clinton, who enjoyed deep black support in the White House and rewarded black allies.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., who is now mounting her own campaign for the presidency, is trying to collect that debt by pushing hard for the endorsements of black political leaders, an effort that could force Obama onto an explicitly racial terrain that clashes with his national image as a figure of new, post-racial unity.

But while Hillary Clinton continues to lead in polls of African-American voters, Obama's extraordinary potential as a black presidential candidate has a powerful appeal to many black voters and officials.

Jones concluded his speech with a reference to the jobs and appointments Bill Clinton had given blacks, including many people in the room, and asked when they would stop owing the Clintons for that patronage, attendees said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said one person in the room who doesn't currently support either Obama or Clinton. "It was one of those moments when you say, 'I can't believe he just said that.'"

Jones' call was received frostily by Clinton allies, including Minyon Moore, the former White House aide who now heads Hillary Clinton's black outreach, and former Clinton and Gore campaign aide Donna Brazile, according to some attendees.

Moore walked out of the room when Jones stopped speaking, according to two people who were there. Moore said Sunday she'd left because she had somewhere else to be, and that she would "agree to disagree" with Jones.

Neither Moore nor Brazile could be reached for comment. But another Clinton supporter who was who at the meeting said Clinton's camp took Jones' remarks as an affront.

"The feeling was, 'Who is [Jones] to tell us how to be black?' " said the Clinton supporter, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said Jones is "a mentor of the senator" but wouldn't comment on the substance of his speech. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson declined to comment.

But there was no doubt in the Washington Hilton that Jones struck a nerve. Black Democrats were walking around the hotel Saturday repeating - in jest, but not without an edge - Jones' refrain of "How long? How long?"

Good for Mr. Jones!!! Great for the democratic party. It's about time for the African American vote not to be taken so lightly. We Black Americans must vote on the issues and what is in our best interest. Up from the ranks a leader for the democratic has emerged to be reckon with, his name is Sen. Barack Obama....

Well, just what percentage of Americans even have 401K's? Hmm? And how many people of those earn the median yearly salary. The wealthy have lots of money in 401K's and stocks. Not Middle America, and surely not the poor. So don't confuse reality with half-baked statements. The bottomline is that most average people are spending home equity and money that should be going to savings to pay for rising college expenses for their kids, healthcare coverage, and interest on their credit card debt.

by Hardie on 02.04.2007 at 10:49 PM

The mainstream media recently made big news over the fact that personal savings are currently as low as they were during the Great Depression. And now here come the parrots, eager to reguritate what the media have spoon-fed them.

For the record, the government calculates savings as post-tax income minus spending, and investments are counted as spending. You read that right - investments are counted as spending. So, have you been buying stocks, or contributing to an IRA or a 401(k)? Then you are part of the "problem" because you have been spending too much and not saving enough! It's time to plan for the future by avoiding the record-setting market and putting more money into your passbook savings...

RE: drbillybob

"We are in the midst of a robust and growing economy...."

Praising and relying on a market-based economy is like showing-off the pristine exterior of a flashy McMansion while hiding the leaky basement and rotting beams. The economic storm hovering on the horizon is being stoked by a saggy housing market, low personal saving rates, rising healthcare costs, high deficits, high national debt, and the out of control multi-billion dollar costs of an unecessary war. Check Ben Bennake's testimony before Congress. Of course you're welcome to your flash McMansion view of the economy built by the dodgy team of Bush and Co. Afterall there's nothing like a Wall Street paint job to hide the cracks, especially if it is 100% stock market guaranteed. Unfortunately it will soon be clean up time for the Democrats.

by Happydad on 02.04.2007 at 05:01 PM

You left out surging deficit, shrinking Medicare and Social Security funding, the lowest individual savings levels since the Depression, and the largest non-discretionary spending levels in American history. Not to mention rising bankruptcies and home foreclosures, and rising debt levels of senior cisitzens that have to choose between food and prescription drugs.

Why is that?

You suggest that our economy needs improvement and that a democrat will save us from our problems "... a the candidate that will deliver healthcare and a better economy."

How can you say this? We are in the midst of a robust and growing economy with low unemployment, record productivity, low inflation, stable interest rates, rising wages, low taxes and surging markets.

Just because the dominant media won't tell you this is no excuse for ignorance.

The only debt one imagines African-American voters have is to themselves and to the candidate that will deliver healthcare and a better economy. If you think Obama can deliver most of this while battling the Republican party and while enacting his vision go for it. Frankly the fact that Obama would let his surrogates roil the waters between members of the African-American community does not speak well for his "I'm a unifier" vision of things. If I were the Clinton's I'd stay out of this and watch from the sidelines, while courting the Hispanic community. At least the latter have no trouble identifying their interests. The African-American communitly meanwhile is like a circular firing squad.

by yankeejoshua on 02.04.2007 at 02:34 PM

I think the anonymous supporter said it best: "Who is he to tell us how to be black?" You can expand this to include my question: "Who is anyone to tell me how to be a Democrat?" Even if I am a staunch supporter of the Clinton agenda, does that automatically translate into my absolute rejection of all other viable Democratic candidates? It is interesting to hear Obama supporters using the exact divisive political jargon that he has been actively seeking to shut down. If you tear down the Clinton White House to build the Obama Black House, isn't it still all about race? I thought we were "post racial". We're all aware of the social stratification of racial groups and the continuation of institutiional racial discrimination in Corporate America. Yet, am I the only person disturbed by the fact that everyone keeps clapping for Obama because he's made it this far? It's like we EXPECT Blacks people to not aspire to be the president, or senator or representative. How sad is that? I have a question to Jones, or anyone else for that matter, who thinks all Blacks should support Obama. What about Black women? Aren't they choosing between the first Black president and the first woman? What's more important to those voters, being Black or being a woman? Both identities are influential and cannot be summed up by arguing that Hillary is the past because of her husband. She has significant support among Black voters not only because of Bill, but because she, too, has been an advocate for not only Blacks, but many social minority groups. Hillary also represents great change in that a woman will finally lead this country. Many people may feel that she is more electable and will go with her as the surer bet to advance their political goals. We should not underestimate this aspect of the race.

ps This is not a stump speech for Hillary, but to point out that you can't base arguments on race OR gender alone. I am so sick of people saying Hillary cannot be commander-in-chief becau

Maybe it shouldn't matter who is commenting on this article, black or white. The solution seems simple to me as an outsider: vote for the candidate who puts forth the best ideas, and whose life shows she or he puts those ideas into action, regardless of skin color.

I never thought the day would come that I defend Bill Clinton, but being angry at him over the fact that, during his administartion, 400,000 more blacks were incarcerated than in the previous two Republican administrations is not only foolish, it smacks more than a little of racism.

America saw crime rates fall during much of the 90's. Why? The smart money - and even half of the dumb - says crime rates fell because more criminals were in prison. And if people assert that racism is the reason that blacks are incarcerated at rates disproportionate to whites, is sexism then the reason why males are imprisoned at higher rates than females? Of course not. Men go to prison far more often than women because men commit far more cromes. And among men, black men are incarcerated at higher rates than white men because black men commit a disproportionate number of crimes.

JTH,

I'm glad to know that there are still a few of us African Americans who do not drink from the Clinton Kool Aid. It seems that there is pervasive selective amnesia throughout our community. To expound on your well crafted list of failed policies that were devasting to our community, more than 400,000 more African American were incarcerated during the Clinton Administration than the two previous Republican administrations, resulting in 1 in 3 African American men now under criminal justice supervision. He did a terrific job of surrounding himself by African Americans to insulate himself from well deserved criticism. As oxymoronic as it may sound, we suffer from both a White savior and White Boogeyman complex. We need both Whites to lead us and Whites to blame for our lack of progress. And unfortunately that presents a no win situation for Barrack Obama.

I think it is a mistake for the Democratic party to fight over the African-American vote over what blacks might "owe" any candidate. They, nor any other Democratic voter owe Clinton anything for her husband's past administration nor is Obama "owed" their vote because he is black. In fact I think it would be best for no candidate in the Democratic party to haggle over any owed votes because of any origin or legacy. As someone who sits much more to the right of the Democratic party this is one of the public debates regarding the party that turns me off and much of the rest of the country. Blacks do have some issues that the majority of their race may agree on, but blacks are a part of every social and economic class and discussing their vote as if their race should be voting for one candidate as a whole and as a race is patronizing and it doesn't make their "leaders" like Mr. Sharpton or Mr. Jackson look like anything other than demagogic and naive. With all of the issues coming up in the next election the fact is a debate over the "black" vote shouldn't be fought so publicly by the Democratic candidates, there are far more important matters and realistic matters to argue over.

by jth on 02.04.2007 at 12:32 PM

What do the Blacks owe the Clinton's? I'm serious. During the Clinton Administration one million innocent BLACK human beings were slaughtered in Rwanda. The Clinton Administration did nothing, said nothing, looked the other way. Sudan and North Africa arabs had a profitable enterprize with 'chattel slavery of BLACK Africans' and another half a million were murdered. Sierra Leone became a mecca for the child forced labor trade, especially the diamond industry. There is no telling how many children were murdered and maimed. And these were all BLACK children. Liberia was a mess. It wasn't until President Bush sent some marines in that the country became stablized. They were crying out for Clinton to do something but he looked the other way. And we know the tragedies in Congo, Uganda, and religious and tribal conflicts in Nigeria started during those years. However, he (Clinton) did save some white folks in Bosnia. Also, is everybody aware, during the Clinton years, that more young African-American males were incarcerated into our penal system, mostly non-violent drug offenses, then during any other two presidential administrations? So again I asked," what do blacks owe the Clinton's?"

While I am not a supporter of Hillary Clinton, I am a bit uneasy with the idea of supporting Barak Obama at this time. I think that Mr Obama has a great future and would very likely make an excellent president in the future. However, I think it would be best for both him and the country if he is given some time to mature into a much more significant candidate in the future. I fear that as president he would be another Jimmie Carter; namely, great talent and statesmanship but insufficient political savy for the top job of President. We don't want to see our first black president fail for lack of a little bit of time.

by drbillybob on 02.04.2007 at 11:10 AM

How many Americans really know Obama's positions on economic or social issues? Most of us know he has the luxury of opposing the Iraq war now that it is not going as well as expected - he never had to vote on it!

This public and media fawning over his candidacy is amazing to me. And what do we hear from the press? "Is America ready for a black President?" This is crap. America's number one advertising icon is Tiger Woods. The Cosby Show and now Oprah dominated ratings in the 80s/90s/00s.

If Obama loses, it's because he is damn near a socialist and should be recognized and reported as such! Remember that old notion about "content of character"?

Hillay is yesterday; Obama is tomorrow. Beware media pundits: We have yet to vote. If you shove Hillary down our throats, we will throw up.

Gore Resists Push For '08 Run (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Former Vice President Al Gore is basking in the global spotlight for nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar, but a growing number of Democrats want him to make another bid for the presidency.

He says he is interested in a "different kind of campaign to try to change enough minds" to solve the global-warming problem, but that doesn't stop people from asking.

Mr. Gore spoke to 1,500 Silicon Valley leaders gathered Friday for the annual "State of the Valley" conference, hosted by Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network. The audience sent the Democrat questions via text-messaging during the speech. The first on the list, projected on jumbo screens to Mr. Gore's left and right: "Will you run for president?"

He tried to dodge the question, rolling his eyes and inspiring laughter from the crowd, but he couldn't avoid the probing glances in the crowd or the attendee who shouted, "Please?"

"I don't have any plans to run for president, but I appreciate the request," he said, after a pause.

Not everyone is convinced, and "Draft Gore" movements are sprouting across the country.

"A lot of people are very excited, not only about Al Gore's potential candidacy, but about his ideas," said former San Jose Mayor Tom McEnery, a Democrat. "Very seldom in politics do ideas drive candidacy."

The problem is that Mr. Gore doesn't seem to want to renew his political career, and nothing about his lifestyle suggests that he'll mount a bid. His friends and former advisers say privately that he is happy with his life as a somewhat regular -- albeit wealthy -- public figure.

He closes events to the press while other Democrats seek headlines. His Web site, AlGore.com, is far from a campaign site.

DraftGore.com organizers say 2000 Democratic nominee should give it another try, calling him the "conscience of the Democratic Party" for his early opposition to the Iraq war.

"Given his unmatched experience and leadership on issues of moral imperative, Gore is increasingly seen as Democrats' best bet to win back the White House," the site declares.

Supporters say he wouldn't need to mount a traditional campaign because he is so well-known.

"I'll wait as long as necessary to see if Gore will jump in," wrote Markos Moulitsas, founder of the liberal DailyKos.com. "That's ultimately my guy this cycle. And even though I don't think he'll run, he's really got all the time in the world to make a final decision. It's not as if he'll need the full year to get his name-recognition up or make the case for his candidacy."

Donna Brazile, Mr. Gore's campaign manager in 2000, told voters recently: "Wait till Oscar night. If Al Gore has slimmed down 25 or 30 pounds, Lord knows," the Allentown (Pa.) Morning Call reported.

Mr. Gore on Friday did not appear to have lost any weight. The Academy Award winners will be announced Feb. 25. Mr. Gore's global-warming documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," is contending for two Oscars.

Some other Democrats have suggested that if Mr. Gore is named the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in October, he could easily wait to announce a presidential run until Dec. 10 when the award would be presented.

Also looming is the expected release of his new book, "The Assault on Reason," which will explore the "damage" he says has been done by the Bush administration "to the functioning of our democracy," according to a description on Amazon.com.

Russell Hancock, Joint Venture's chief executive officer, introduced the former vice president as "the one man who has done more than any other American to bring these issues to the forefront of the nation's consciousness."

Mr. Hancock later said Mr. Gore seems to be done with politics.

"He's done that. Now he's going to save the world," he said.

Aart de Geus, CEO of semiconductor software giant Synopsys, agreed.

"I'm thinking that ... looking back 100 years from now that may be a bigger impact than any president of the U.S. would have had," Mr. de Geus said. "In that sense, the platform that he's taken of dealing with global warming may be a more important platform than anything else he could do."

Mr. Gore's talk was held the same day the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) released a summary of a forthcoming report authored by scientists from more than 100 countries predicting the earth's temperature will rise by 2 to 11 degrees by 2100.

He told the leaders that they are on the forefront of innovation and said business will profit from technology's efforts to stop climate change or slow its effects.

He explored the valley's evolution from being the birthplace of electronics and the computer to the Internet and biotechnology.

"It's abundantly obvious that clean tech, green tech ventures ... will be a new pathway that attracts a lot more energy and time and investment," he said.

Mr. Gore, a member of Apple Computer's board of directors and an adviser to Google, seemed comfortable in the valley, which he called his "second home."

He spoke in a calm, patient voice, telling self-deprecating jokes and chatting about laws of thermodynamics in between jabs at the Bush administration.

'08 Hopefuls Hash Out Pressing Issues Of '07 (USAT)

USA Today, February 5, 2007

As the next presidential campaign gets underway, USA TODAY asked two former governors who are planning bids to discuss their positions on the Iraq war, climate change and immigration.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, and former Wisconsin governor Tommy Thompson, a Republican who was secretary of Health and Human Services in President Bush's first term, spoke Friday at the J.D. Power convention in Las Vegas.

The forum was moderated by Susan Page, USA TODAY's Washington Bureau chief. Comments have been edited for space and clarity.

On Iraq

The Senate is going to begin considering a resolution Monday (today) that would express opposition to President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq. If you were in the Senate, would you vote for or against this resolution?

Thompson: I would vote against the resolution. President Bush was asked by the (Iraq) Study Committee, by the American public, by the electorate to try something different in Iraq. He's come up with a program that was really brought to the fore front by Gen. (David) Petraeus, who is the commanding general in Iraq. And Gen. Petraeus sincerely believes that the surge capacity will stabilize Baghdad and will allow the government to work. We should give this opportunity a chance to work.

Give President Bush and the new deployment and the government of Iraq, which is really now starting to step up, (Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's) government, give it a chance to work. I'm not confident that it's going to, but at least I think we should support the president and the troops in the field at this point in time.

Vilsack: The president's escalation plan is about to make a big mistake even bigger. I was in Iraq last March talking to Gen. (George) Casey, who at the time was in charge. It was his belief that we had about six months to give the Iraqi government the ability to stand up, and at that point it was time for our troops to come home.

The reality is that an escalation is not the answer. I believe Congress actually has to go further than that resolution. I think it is time for us to take our troops out of harm's way. It's time to have the Iraqis assume full responsibility for their security.

We've been there four years, 3,000 lives lost, over 20,000 injuries, and hundreds of billions of dollars spent. I think it's time to ask the Iraqis to assume full responsibility.

If U.S. forces withdraw now, does that mean the United States has not met an obligation it owes to the Iraqis who have worked with us and supported us there?

Vilsack: We have absolutely met our obligation. We created an opportunity. We spent four years, longer than we were in Europe during World War II. We sent many of our brightest and best. We are undermining our military. As commander in chief of the (Iowa) National Guard, I know full well what has happened to our National Guard as a result of this long-standing war. We are not as well equipped as we need to be for the future.

When I was over in Iraq last March, I had an interesting experience. In speaking to an Iraqi security officer — this was a man who was being trained to protect the prime minister and Cabinet officials — he got very agitated when he started talking about the United States.

He said, "Why can't you, America, keep us safe?" This was a man being trained to keep his people safe. It's clear the mind-set needs to change in Iraq. As long as we are there, the mind-set will not change.

We have got to force them to make the tough decisions that only they can make.

Gov. Thompson, you said "terrible mistakes" were made in the execution of this war. Who is responsible for those terrible mistakes?

Thompson: People got lulled into believing that we moved so rapidly in Iraq that the Iraqi people were just going to stand up and embrace us. They didn't do that. We didn't put enough force in there to protect the borders.

No. 1, when you go to war, as Colin Powell has said, go in with the force to win. We didn't do that. We went in with a slimmed-down force because we thought we were so good and so able to defeat the enemy so quick that we didn't need a big army anymore. That was the mistake.

Second thing we should have done is allowed the Iraqi army to stand in and be able to continue to support the borders and prevent other people from coming in from Iran, Syria, and Jordan. We didn't do that. Those were the two big mistakes.

Do you think President Bush is ultimately responsible for these mistakes you've identified?

Thompson: The president is the ultimate determiner. The president is responsible. He's the one that is going to reap the successes but also the failures. Success has a thousand fathers, and failure has but one.

But Congress has a role to play. Congress, you know, needs to step up. The Department of Defense, the generals — I mean, the president, I can assure you, did not set up this war plan. This war plan was set up by the generals in the Department of Defense. He agreed to go ahead and execute on it, but it actually is a plan by the generals. So the generals in the Department of Defense have a big role and a big responsibility for the failures.

On other adversaries

Do you think the administration should be negotiating directly with Iran and Syria?

Thompson: I believe strongly that the United States should take the leadership — not alone, but in conjunction with all the European countries that support our philosophy, our way of government, Japan and our allies. (We should) have a conference, have a summit and develop a unified position. America cannot do it alone.

Vilsack: We have made a mistake over the course of the last several years in not having direct discussions with Syria, Iran, and North Korea. We in all areas have made situations that were quite dangerous be more dangerous.

The reality is that in Iran, you have extremists and moderates. Our position in not engaging has emboldened the extremists and marginalized the moderates. It's important for the United States as a great nation to always be willing to talk. The fact that you talk doesn't mean that you capitulate, it doesn't mean that you don't negotiate hard.

By failing to do so, we clearly exacerbated the situation in Lebanon. We clearly allowed the Iranian government to become more extreme in its rhetoric. We obviously made a very dangerous situation in North Korea much more dangerous.

On climate change

Do you support raising mileage standards for cars?

Thompson: The president has come up with a plan that's going to reduce the reliance on gasoline and fuel by 20% by 2018. I think that's a step in the right direction. In order to (combat global warming), the standards are going to have to be raised.

Vilsack: I think we need to change the debate about this. I'm not so sure it's about miles per gallon. I think it's about emissions per tailpipes. I think we ought to be taking a look at a different structure and a different system to regulate emissions from tailpipes.

It gets you into a discussion of how you expand renewable fuels and energy production in this country. … We need to see a rather significant expansion in this country of renewable fuels. The reality is so long as we continue to import the level of oil we are importing, we are literally funding both sides of the global insurgency that we are confronting.

On immigration

Do you support providing a way for illegal immigrants to gain legal status while remaining in the USA?

Vilsack: These are people coming across the border seeking to do what? Seeking to do right by their family. It's pretty hard to criticize them for trying to have a better life for their family. I'm not critical of them. I am critical of governments that don't create economies that will allow them to be able to live at home and raise their families.

There are currently between 12 and 13 million people who are here in an unauthorized fashion. If we were to try to deport all of these people based on the current system that we have in place, it would, I'm told, take 238 years to complete that project. That's not feasible.

In this country, when you violate the law, you're held accountable in some way. You're either put in jail, but most often you're required to pay a fine. I think these folks should have to pay a fine. I think they should have to pay back taxes, because that's only fair to the rest of us. I think they should be put at the back of the line, given no preference, and be given the opportunity to earn their way to citizenship.

If they're not interested in doing that, then I think it's at that point in time to ask them to leave. But if they are interested in doing it, I think we ought to give them a pathway to citizenship.

Thompson: There is no question that there has to be a procedure to take care of the 12 million individuals who are unauthorized or illegal in this country.

The truth of the matter is, we have laws on the books, and you should not be able to have amnesty. … I think what they really need to do is, they have to go back to their country and apply. They've got to go to the back of the line and allow those individuals who come into this country legally really to have preference.

To say to the other 12 million that have not obeyed the law that you're automatically going to be (allowed to stay) in this country is wrong. They should have to go back and petition.

On health care

We have 46 million Americans who lack health insurance. What is it that the federal government should be doing differently on this issue?

Vilsack: The federal government and state governments need to cooperate together to provide universal coverage. But every politician is likely to say that. I think one of the things that Secretary Thompson and I will absolutely agree on is that this system needs to be changed from a health care system to a wellness system.

We have to really focus on driving health care costs down. And one way you can do that is by preventing illnesses to begin with. So as we take a look at redesigning the health care system, we have to incorporate significantly wellness components, both in the way we insure, what we incent, what we encourage, and even how we educate parents and children.

Thompson: The government is not doing nearly enough on health care. No. 1, we spend $2 trillion on health care in America. That's 16% of the GDP. In seven years, ladies and gentlemen, that's going to go to $4 trillion, to 21% of GDP, unless we make a change. …

Out of that $2 trillion, 75% of the costs of health care go to chronic illnesses. These are items that you have to personally change, like tobacco smoking, like obesity, like sugar diabetes.

None of us would set up a health care system, in which we wait for people to get sick and then spend thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to get you well. You've got to start preventing. We have to go to a wellness system.

You're going to have to cover the uninsured. …We've got to cover everybody in America on health insurance. It would be cheaper. It would stimulate the economy.

A Massachusetts Conservative (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

MOUNT PLEASANT, S.C.-In his stump speech to supporters gathered among the shrimp boats on the bank of Shem Creek, Mitt Romney makes no mention of hot-button issues like abortion or the role of religion in politics. But when the speech is finished, the Republican presidential hopeful is swarmed by reporters asking only hot-button questions: Will conservative voters believe that the formerly pro-choice ex-governor of Massachusetts is now antiabortion? How did he make the conversion? Will evangelical Christians back a devout Mormon like Romney?

Romney, in a tailored suit and flawlessly coiffed hair, insists that voters are more concerned with other issues, like "How are we going to beat the jihadists? How are we going to be competitive with Asia? How to improve our schools and healthcare."

And yet answering those hotter-button questions may hold the key to whether Romney has a shot at winning the Republican nomination. Romney has so far sold himself as the more conservative alternative to front-runners John McCain, who riled many conservatives by supporting a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and opposing a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, and likely contender Rudolph Giuliani, a supporter of gay rights and abortion rights. In doing so, however, Romney is battling his own past. He admits to being "effectively pro-choice" as recently as two years ago. "Voters can respect a politician who changes parties," says Republican strategist Scott Reed. "But it's more difficult for a politician that changes philosophies."

Competition. While convincing social conservatives that he has become one of them, Romney must also develop broad enough appeal to be seen as truly competitive with McCain and Giuliani. A CNN poll last week had Romney winning support from just 7 percent of Republican-leaning voters, compared with 32 percent for Giuliani and 26 percent for McCain. Still, with Hollywood-style charisma, a résumé that includes a big win in the bluest of states, and a team of marquee activists and aides, Romney is probably the strongest White House hopeful that most Americans have never heard of. "You want to ask some presidential candidates who aren't well known, 'Why did you decide to do this?'" says Whit Ayres, a GOP strategist. "With Romney, you can see a path to go all the way."

Even before leaving office, Romney raised his profile among conservatives by fighting the Massachusetts Supreme Court's 2003 decision to legalize gay marriage. He helped prod the state legislature into voting to put the issue before voters in a referendum. Romney also began trumpeting his new antiabortion stance, tracing his conversion to a 2004 meeting with Harvard scientists. Romney says one scientist told him cloning human embryos was not a moral issue because they were destroyed within two weeks. "It struck me that we had so cheapened the value of human life," Romney tells U.S. News, "that someone would feel that racks of human embryos being created ... was not a moral issue." Now, Romney is drawing parallels between his own antiabortion conversion and that of Ronald Reagan, who as governor of California signed a liberal abortion rights law. Mark DeMoss, an evangelical publicity executive who organized a meeting between Romney and evangelical leaders, says he was won over by Romney's story about the Harvard scientists: "To hear him tell it, it's almost like Paul's road-to-Damascus experience in the New Testament."

A Presidential Also-Ran, Kerry Adjusts To What Passes For A Normal Life In The Senate (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

DOJ_NMG_0127048

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Senator John Kerry keeps to himself around the Capitol. He is always rushing somewhere, head down, disappearing into elevators. A Senate loner for 22 years, Mr. Kerry seems all the more isolated now as he darts past the media hordes around the next set of presidential seekers, colleagues that include Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama.

Even in the best of times, Mr. Kerry's face hung droopy and funereal, one of the most weary in American politics. Today, Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the exit poll president-elect for a few hours in November 2004, endures the peculiar pariah status that his party reserves for its losing nominees.

"America does not tolerate losing, even though it's through losing that we learn the most," said David Thorne, the twin brother of Mr. Kerry's late first wife, Julia Thorne, and his closest friend. "People want fresh faces. Or they think they do."

As the 2008 campaign begins in earnest, Mr. Kerry has been forced to adapt to something resembling a normal Senate life. This has been no small challenge for a man whose identity has long been steeped in becoming president, or trying to.

Last week, days after he announced he would not run again, Mr. Kerry said there was no point to dwelling on what might have been. "You know, that's such a waste of time right now," he said in a Capitol hallway interview. "I came close, but so what? I didn't make it, so move on. Just go forward. There's no sense going backwards."

Mr. Kerry ratified his status as Dead Candidate Walking in an emotional speech on the Senate floor two weeks ago. "We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," Mr. Kerry said, referring to his 2004 campaign.

Only two colleagues attended his announcement, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a fellow Massachusetts Democrat, and the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada (another, Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, walked in late). "I have concluded this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign."

The grave Kerry face was on stark display that day, his voice breaking at times. When it was over, Mr. Reid hugged him and said he loved him, and then Mr. Kerry left the chamber by himself.

His announcement could have been a dignified valedictory moment. But the enigmatic Mr. Kerry is often misunderstood, and several news reports said he had cried when saying he would not run; in fact, he choked up earlier in his speech when talking about an Army captain he had met in Iraq who had been killed.

No matter, the photo of Mr. Kerry breaking down ran prominently in the Drudge Report and elsewhere. It buttressed the notion of John Kerry as the forlorn loser who had finally bottomed out. It also served as a grim visual to another round of Kerry abuse, conjuring up the caricature of him as a helmet-haired, flip-flopping elitist.

"Who will the windsurfing caucus back now?" a columnist for The Boston Herald wisecracked. A cartoonist for The Times-Picayune of New Orleans mocked Mr. Kerry as saying, "Actually I was for another White House bid before I was against it." A few days earlier in a new book, Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic National Committee chairman, became the latest party bigwig to pan Mr. Kerry's 2004 campaign.

Mr. Kerry says he finds it "freeing" not to be a presidential candidate. "Hopefully, the things I say and do will not be taken in the light of a presidential race anymore," he said. "And I think that's positive."

He will seek re-election in Massachusetts next year and says he is looking forward to immersing himself in Senate life, particularly on issues related to the Iraq war. Mr. Kerry has sought counsel from Mr. Kennedy, who himself returned to the Senate after a bitter primary defeat and went on to have a storied career as a lawmaker.

Yet to many eyes, Mr. Kerry will always be trapped in yesterday's news and lingering disappointment. He is a member of the tiny club that knows what it is like to lose an election to George W. Bush — to blow an election, by some accounts.

At least Al Gore was allowed to slip away, grow a beard and come back when he was ready. Mr. Kerry had to return to his very public job, hear all about how "winnable" his race was, how "unlikable" a candidate he was and how ridiculous it would be for him to consider ever trying again. His name elicited instant eye-rolls among many former supporters.

But Mr. Kerry held out hope. Last year, he campaigned for Democrats, wielding an impressive e-mail list, bankroll and political network. He kept his options open. Until, finally, he shed what had been the guiding aspiration of his career seemingly from its outset.

"Your heart goes out to him," Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, said in a brief interview a few days after Mr. Kerry said he was not running. "It just isn't easy to shift your ambitions away from something that's been his ambition for a long time."

Running for president — or losing — hardly makes Mr. Kerry unique among senators (scores have run, but no sitting senator has been elected since John F. Kennedy in 1960). But Mr. Kerry stands out for coming so close, and people who know him say it has made it all the harder to give up. "He is a stubborn, competitive guy, and it must have been very, very hard to get those words out," said Jim Jordan, a former Kerry campaign manager.

Senate colleagues and staff members say Mr. Kerry struggled to reintegrate himself in the Capitol after losing to Mr. Bush. He was never much a creature of the Senate to begin with, an outcast with few close friends there and a reputation for aloofness and occasional grandstanding. His solemn bearing betrayed a certain joylessness in his job. ("John Kerry walks into a bar," goes the Washington version of the old joke. "Bartender says, 'Hey, Senator Kerry, why the long face?' ")

Shortly after he returned to work, Mr. Reid gave him a stern talking-to and urged him, in so many words, to get off his high horse and rejoin the team, according to a senior Democratic staff member.

But after laying the groundwork for a return engagement, Mr. Kerry stumbled just before November's midterm elections, when he told what he called a "botched joke" that appeared to denigrate the intelligence of American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats distanced themselves from him, Republicans ridiculed him, and Congressional candidates dumped him on the campaign trail.

He was defiant, refusing to apologize at first, offering explanations that he was criticizing Mr. Bush and not the troops. But few people wanted to listen. " 'Please stop it," Don Imus, the radio talk show host and a Kerry friend, urged him on the air. "Stop talking. Go home."

As the 2008 presidential campaign takes shape, friends say it has annoyed Mr. Kerry to keep hearing about how formidable his onetime running mate, John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, might be.

Friends say that Mr. Kerry feels betrayed by Mr. Edwards, whom he defeated easily in the 2004 Democratic primaries and faults for being too quick to second-guess their campaign, distance himself from it and embark on his own 2008 effort.

Mr. Edwards was also spared the flagellation that losing Democratic nominees typically endure. Republicans are kinder to their also-rans. Bob Dole lost to Bill Clinton in 1996, but has remained a gray eminence within the party. Barry Goldwater was slaughtered by President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964 but later became a patron saint of the conservative movement. Richard M. Nixon lost narrowly to John F. Kennedy in 1960 but ran again and won in 1968.

Mr. Kerry and his surrogates always emphasize how warmly he is still received whenever he ventures out of Washington. "John was treated like a rock star in Switzerland," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who traveled to Davos, Switzerland, with Mr. Kerry and other colleagues last month for the World Economic Forum.

Of course, this is precisely the kind of compliment that feeds an impression of Mr. Kerry as a high-society jetsetter who is more at home overseas than among everyday Americans. Sure enough, Mr. Kerry was being pilloried anew by Republicans last week for saying in Davos that the United States had become an "international pariah" under Mr. Bush.

Mr. Kerry genuinely seems not to care about such criticism these days. He still wears his burdens plainly, but the burdens could be shifting.

"You can be more focused when you're not running," Mr. Kerry said. "You can actually get something done on the issues instead of running around as fast as you can."

He is still running plenty fast. Mr. Kerry is hard to catch up to, probably by design. He zooms by, gone before you know it. He was seen dashing through a press-crammed Capitol after President Bush's State of the Union address.

"Can't now; got to go," Mr. Kerry said after a news conference about climate change last week. He was off to the Senate for a vote, then exited by another door 20 minutes later.

"I'm running, I'm running," Mr. Kerry told a reporter. He boarded an elevator with fellow senators and fixed his gaze straight ahead.

What Are Hillary Clinton's Religious Beliefs? (NSWK)

By Susannah Meadows

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

At 13, she met a Methodist minister who became a lifelong friend.

If Hillary Clinton and George W. Bush have anything in common, it is a deeply rooted wariness of outsiders. Both the president and the woman who hopes to succeed him have always relied on a small, closed circle of friends and advisers who have been with them for years. So it's not surprising that there are so many familiar faces on Clinton's new campaign team. Ad maker Mandy Grunwald, pollster Mark Penn, strategist Ann Lewis and others are loyalists from Bill Clinton's White House.

There is another person on Hillary's shortlist of confidants who goes back farther than any of them, but whom you've probably never heard of. The Rev. Don Jones, a Methodist minister who is now 75, was perhaps Hillary's earliest spiritual and political mentor. She has written of her "lifelong friendship" with him. It was Jones who first awakened young Hillary to the civil-rights movement and counseled her on questions of faith. They continued to be in touch as Hillary became a national figure. Years later, he helped her through the darkest period in her life, the aftermath of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

Precocious and confident, 13-year-old Hillary was an active member of her Methodist church in Park Ridge, Ill., when Jones arrived in 1961 to lead the youth group. Fresh from the seminary, he was anything but stuffy in his red Chevy Impala convertible. He carried the Bible, but also the collected poems of E. E. Cummings. Hillary, politically aware even then, was a budding Republican who took after her staunchly conservative father. In long discussions at the church, Jones introduced Hillary to the left. The young minister was determined to show his white, privileged parishioners the world beyond their suburban town. He took them to the South Side of Chicago to hear Martin Luther King Jr. speak. Jones introduced each of them to the civil-rights leader.

But the conversation wasn't all politics. "Hillary would come up to talk to me after I preached and make comments about the sermon, how the hymns, prayers and Biblical passages were coordinated with the message," Jones tells NEWSWEEK. Jones hewed closely to the social-justice tradition of the Methodist Church, preaching that helping those in need was a means of practicing their faith. "I think she responded to my ministry in part for its intellectual content," Jones says. "Her heart responded to the social-responsibility aspects."

Not everyone appreciated the minister's lessons. Within two years, the conservative members of the congregation asked him to leave. Jones landed at Drew University in Madison, N.J., where he spent his career teaching theology. They were in communication while Hillary was in high school and later at Wellesley. During her time as First Lady, he visited the White House nine times. After Bill Clinton admitted his affair with Lewinsky, Jones gave Hillary a Paul Tillich sermon about grace, and how it comes to you when you feel great pain. Jones says he hoped Hillary would pass the words on to her husband. "It was my secret agenda," he says. Sure enough, five days later, Jones received a thank-you note from the president. Last year he saw the Clintons at their home in Chappaqua, N.Y. The senator had called him to invite her old friend to her mother's birthday party.

Though she's been accused of adopting a religious patina for political gain, her relationship with Jones shows that from the time she was young, Hillary was thinking seriously about her faith. She clearly talks more about religion these days, as many politicians do—but her connection to Jones reveals that her Christianity has always been at the center of her identity. "She's not using the language of prayer and God for the first time," says Jones. "While there may be a political dimension, it's authentic."

Jones describes Hillary's beliefs as falling, like her politics, somewhere in the middle of the spectrum. Unlike the extreme left, she understands the limitations of human beings, he says. And unlike the extreme right, he argues, she believes in humanity's potential. She does take seriously the doctrine of original sin. And after a lifetime in politics, she's seen plenty of it.

The Mommy Factor (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

It was striking. On her first foray into Iowa as a presidential candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton was clearly trying to soften up her image. "I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience," she said. "The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom is part of who I am." Wow. Could this be the same Hillary Clinton who told voters way back in her husband's first run for the White House that she wasn't just going to stay home and bake cookies? Or the first lady who tried to redo the nation's healthcare system? Or began collecting national security cred on Day 1 in the Senate by landing a seat on the Armed Services Committee?

The Clintons are a great reflection of the national zeitgeist. So don't take Hillary's appearance in Iowa in pastels lightly: It may mean we've come full circle, baby. After all these years of trying to be one of the guys-talking tough, playing backroom politics with the bad boys (more on those later)-do we now have to tone it down so people will like us again? Have we overcorrected the initial problem? "We can't decide if we want to wear iron britches or if we're sweet," says former Colorado Rep. Pat Schroeder. Remember her moment of fame? She cried when announcing that she would not run for president. "We got a lot of 'We don't want people who cry with their finger on the button,'" Schroeder told me. That happened 20 years ago, and we've tried not to cry ever since (although we love it when men do).

So here's my question: Is this a problem for all women at a certain stage, or is it mostly about Hillary? After all, when Speaker Nancy Pelosi gaveled her first session of the House of Representatives to order a few weeks back, she seemed to present pretty much the perfect, balanced portrait: a tough grandmother. When all the kiddies were invited to the podium, it seemed to be an entirely authentic moment-and a signal that Pelosi is, well, fully evolved. We accept it; in fact, we applaud it. "It was wonderful to watch her with the grandchildren," former vice presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro told me. "If I had done that, I would have been judged as too soft, a mommy, not able to handle the issues." To be fair, Pelosi has an advantage that Clinton doesn't: We haven't tracked her every move, as we've watched Hillary morph from the wife bristling behind the podium to the candidate finally in front of it. Since we seem to have spent more than a decade observing her, maybe she just becomes someone with too many identities for us to sort out-or to decide which is real.

Sure, there's a natural affinity among women for Hillary Clinton when she tells voters that "I expect there will probably be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me." You bet. And there will also be different kinds of girl questions, like the one from the man in Davenport, Iowa, who asked how she would handle the world's "evil and bad men." It was hard not to read something (aka Bill) into her playfully ambiguous response: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" With perfect comedic timing, she let the answer play as the audience erupted into laughter. And although she later denied she was even thinking about Bill Clinton, how could we think anything else? Can this possibly be the new, real, authentic, believable Hillary Clinton?

THE NUMBER alone is breathtaking. As she launches her presidential fundraising juggernaut, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is tasking her biggest financial backers to bring in $1 million or more for her campaign, the New York Times reported. Truth be told, for a fundraiser with a fat Rolodex of rich friends, this isn't quite as daunting as it sounds. Having decided to opt out of the public financing system, not just for the primary campaign but for the general election as well, Ms. Clinton can bring in, or ask her fundraisers to bring in, two checks for the hassle of one: Donors can give the maximum $2,300 for the primary and another $2,300 for the general election. Add in a spouse, and you're at $9,200 a pop. A mere 109 of those, and, voila, the $1 million bundle.

While the senator's not to blame for this state of affairs, the audacity of the $1 million target does evoke distasteful memories of the Lincoln Bedroom rake-it-all-in mentality of the Clinton presidential years. And the unwillingness of her campaign to commit to listing its big bundlers -- as President Bush did during both of his campaigns -- is appalling. A Clinton spokesman couldn't say what the campaign plans to do about disclosure. A campaign organized enough to task fundraisers with bringing in $1 million ought to be organized enough to think in advance about revealing the identities of these, and lesser, financiers.

All this underscores how outmoded and inadequate the system of disclosure has become. Under current reporting rules, there is no way of determining that a bundler has brought in big bucks for a candidate; all that would show up on campaign filings would be the bundler's own contributions. Yet candidates are as indebted to the $1 million bundler as they are to the $1 million check writer.

President Bush, who perfected the system of organizing big bundlers during his two campaigns, with his $100,000 Pioneers and $200,000 Rangers, made it a practice to disclose the individuals on his Web site; most Democratic contenders during the 2004 campaign did likewise. That is an important standard for all candidates to meet during the 2008 campaign. The public is entitled to know the names of the bundlers and, at least within some range, the size of their bundles.

Among some of the leading Democratic and Republican candidates, the plans for disclosure are still unformed even as the bundlers are being recruited. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will provide that information on his campaign Web site; he's also not taking checks, or bundles, from lobbyists. Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) balked at giving out these details last time around; his campaign said that at this point it was committing only to disclose what's legally required. The campaign of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) hasn't yet decided what to do; this should be a no-brainer for a man who's been at the forefront of campaign finance reform.

Reporting this sort of critical information should not be left to the kindness of campaigns -- it should be required. The Federal Election Commission has it within its power to write regulations mandating such disclosure; Congress could also write the requirement into law. In the age of the $1 million bundler, the status quo is intolerable.

OFF THE CUFF, GOV. GETS IN SOME JABS (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

SACRAMENTO — He has staked his governorship on bipartisan agreements, but recordings of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger bantering with aides in closed-door meetings reveal him complaining about lawmakers from both parties, casting some as obstructionist and two-faced.

The recordings, newly obtained by The Times, also feature him chatting about American resentment of illegal immigrants, about his taste for gas-hungry Hummers and about his wife's habit of tinkering with his speeches.

Made by Schwarzenegger's staff last year, the recordings offer a rare window onto the governor's operation and a more complex portrait of Schwarzenegger than typically emerges in public, where his appearances are carefully stage-managed.

In the latest recordings, the Republican governor describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) as a "very sick man" and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) as "a political operator coming from the union background" who evinces no real "passion" about issues. And he worries that a federal plan to build a fence along the Mexican border will send a troubling message.

"Are we looking at Mexico now as the enemy?" he says in the recording. "No, it's not. This is our trading partner."

Married for two decades, Schwarzenegger still seems amused by some of his wife's habits. When Maria Shriver reviews one of his speeches, he says, "she is relentless. I can only talk about things for so many times because then I like to lock it in, even if it's not perfect…. But she goes until the last day…. I said, 'Maria, it's over. It's in the teleprompter.' "

The recordings were made in the first half of 2006. The Times first published about a 6-minute excerpt from similar recordings in September and recently obtained about 3 1/2 hours more. In the excerpts published in September, Schwarzenegger referred to Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) as "hot," a reference to her ethnicity. He later apologized.

After The Times on Sunday asked the Schwarzenegger administration for comment about the latest recordings, communications director Adam Mendelsohn said he was going to release the tapes to other news media. The Schwarzenegger administration had previously turned down public records requests for the tapes.

In a prepared statement, Mendelsohn said the recordings show the governor to be "thoughtful, concerned and focused on solving some of California's most serious problems."

Gary Delsohn, a speechwriter working for the governor, made the recordings in an effort to produce better speeches by capturing the governor's thoughts and speech patterns. Attendees at the four recorded meetings include Delsohn, Mendelsohn, Chief of Staff Susan Kennedy and former aide Bonnie Reiss.

Aides to former Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides copied the audio files from the governor's website last year, something they were able to do because of lax security on the site, state investigators concluded.

Proud of his legislative achievements, Schwarzenegger plans to deliver speeches around the country this year, touting California as a model of bipartisan cooperation. But the recordings suggest that he and his most trusted aides have sometimes viewed his legislative partners with disdain.

DOJ_NMG_0127053

Throughout the conversations, however, the tone is generally friendly, informal. Schwarzenegger sometimes sounds as if he has a cigar in his mouth.

In one exchange, Delsohn thanks the governor for cigars and schnapps.

Schwarzenegger's comments about Perata came early last year, amid negotiations over a proposed multibillion-dollar public works package. A deal ultimately came together, but Schwarzenegger aides at the time viewed Perata as a barrier.

In one recorded conversation, the governor says Perata "is trying to derail everything."

Delsohn asks: "In your past life, did you ever deal with people that could be so petty and so childish?"

"Yeah, in the movie business," the governor replies. "It's the same thing."

He adds: "It is a different level, but, I mean, yes, the movie business has been held up with a hundred-million-dollar movie just because someone doesn't like one scene."

At one point, Delsohn asks the governor how Perata acts in his presence after repeatedly "jamming" him in the press.

Schwarzenegger said: "Believe me when I tell you that it is shocking, and it took me a while to understand it because I am still naïve a little bit about it. Because when he comes in here, he's nice. And I want to work with him. But those guys, as soon as they step out of here or before they come in here, they are absolutely different personalities. They change like this."

Schwarzenegger was even more caustic about Perata in a discussion at a separate meeting about negotiations on the public works bond. He says Perata is "a very sick man." An aide says, "Really?" Schwarzenegger replies: "Yeah, absolutely."

Schwarzenegger's chief of staff, Kennedy, comes in later and reads aloud a memo from Perata to fellow Democrats laying out concerns about the infrastructure package. The governor listens and says: "He's lying. Unbelievable, this guy."

"So while those girls are sitting around pulling their hair …" Kennedy says, and trails off.

Kennedy at one point urges her boss to needle a Republican lawmaker who had said something objectionable in a news story.

"So when you see [Assemblyman] Guy Houston" (R-Livermore), she says on the recording, "just say to him, 'Nice quote.' "

The assemblyman, she predicts, will "pee his pants" at such sarcasm, she suggests.

Perhaps no lawmaker was more important to Schwarzenegger's legislative successes last year than Nuñez. The speaker helped Schwarzenegger pass bills raising the minimum wage, curbing greenhouse gas emissions and offering a program for cheaper prescription drugs.

In one exchange, though, the governor describes Nuñez as an unrelieved partisan.

"So for him," the governor says, "it's all politics. And because of that, everything that happens he sees through those glasses, through the political glasses."

In some ways, Schwarzenegger is equally tough on his fellow Republicans. He suggests the Republicans were unrealistic in having their own expectations for the public works package.

The governor characterizes his message to them: "You are not the majority! I said, When does it get in your mind? You are not the majority."

Invoking his wife's famous family, Schwarzenegger likens his ambitious effort to rebuild California's roads and ports to President John F. Kennedy's call for landing an American on the moon.

He mentions speaking to his mother-in-law, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, who told him "the most frustrating thing for Jack was to sit there and always kind of deal with that. You know, when there was a big idea and he had to go and ask all of those legislators, all of the Congress: 'Think like me.' "

He imagines the resistance Kennedy must have faced: "We still have such high unemployment. The economy has to be stimulated — and here you are worrying about going to the moon?"

At times Schwarzenegger seems to be working out answers, using the conversation with aides to clarify his thinking.

He talks with Delsohn about the wisdom of building a 700-mile fence between Mexico and the U.S. Delsohn asks him if the idea sounds "ridiculous."

"It sounds ridiculous to me simply because the border with Mexico is longer than 700 miles," Schwarzenegger says. "So now we need to know specifics."

DOJ_NMG_0127054

Conceding that it would be difficult for him to say so publicly, Schwarzenegger said that Latinos — because they are so close to their homeland — have more trouble assimilating than, say, Poles, Germans and French. Still, as an Austrian immigrant, he said, "I made an effort. But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

He later made similar remarks at a campaign appearance in Los Angeles. Mexican protesters marching here should not "wave the Mexican flag," he says. "America loves America."

Schwarzenegger also talks eloquently in the recordings about the importance of racial and religious tolerance. He recalls that his mother told him she saw Jews being hanged in public parks in Austria.

He mentions his regard for Nelson Mandela, who was imprisoned for decades for his opposition to apartheid in South Africa.

"Say to yourself every week, 'Now I'm going to reach out to someone that I really didn't care for,' " the governor says. "Or a race or a religion that you didn't care for … Make a point to go and take them to lunch, you know, somebody that is totally different than you."

In an exchange on another day, Schwarzenegger worries about appearances. Working on a speech about the environment, he wonders aloud if his past might leave him open to charges of hypocrisy.

"Before I was a governor, I was both a businessman and an environmentalist because here I was driving Hummers," he says. "I don't know if I want to leave myself open here by calling myself an environmentalist."

Happily recalling a visit to a local Hummer dealership, he describes the inventory and rattles off nationwide Hummer production numbers.

Then Schwarzenegger says California needs environmental protections.

"We have to take care of our state and our state's population growth," he says.

Kennedy responds: "You're such a flaming liberal."

Analysis: Bush's Iran Stance Echoes Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 5, 2007

President Bush's tough new stance on Iran and his military buildup in the Persian Gulf recall some of the drumbeats that preceded the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

As then, the Bush administration is making allegations about Iran without providing proof.

It is suggesting Iran is sending weapons to Iraq, yet offering no evidence the supplies can be traced to Tehran. There are whispers, too, that Iranian intelligence agents were behind the recent abduction and execution of five U.S. soldiers.

Iran is the "axis of evil" country whose nuclear ambitions must be stopped. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is now Bush's primary Mideast nemesis, replacing the late Saddam Hussein.

Bush's efforts to rally public support behind his harder line on Iran have many lawmakers and some from the intelligence and defense world wondering if it is a prelude to military activity.

"We are not responsibly in the region if we don't deal with them," said Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va. "And the situation that we have right now where we continue to talk only about the military side — again, it's half a strategy," he told "Fox News Sunday."

Bush insists he has no plans to invade Iran, only to protect U.S. troops in Iraq.

But in recent days:

_Bush raised the U.S. naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region.

_The administration confirmed that Bush has authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian agents who are plotting attacks on U.S. forces.

_The administration has armed Iran's Arab neighbors with Patriot missiles. The Pentagon halted sales of spare parts from the its recently retired F-14 fighter jet fleet because of concerns they could be transferred to Iran.

Administration critics suggest the White House is exaggerating Tehran's ties to attacks inside Iraq to justify a possible future military assault — just as it manipulated prewar intelligence to build its case for its 2003 invasion of Iraq, they claim.

"He again is convinced that he's on the side of right, fighting against the forces of evil, expressing this somewhat oversimplified view of the world he has," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy analyst for the Brookings Institution and an adviser to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "He's doing what he thinks is right to show resoluteness."

Bush's saber-rattling — rather than reaching out to Iran and Syria diplomatically as recommended by the Iraq Study group and many in Congress — is a risky strategy. Many national security professionals suggest this approach could lead to wider conflict.

If conditions continue to deteriorate in Iraq, "the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and with much of the world of Islam at large," Zbigniew Brezinski, President Carter's national security adviser, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Bush is betting he can help prop up the shaky government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and stop a supply line of weapons and fighters into Iraq.

It's a big bet.

Iran has denied accusations it is supplying weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq. But an official assessment of Iraq by U.S. intelligence agencies said Iran was providing lethal support to select Shiite groups.

Still, the National Intelligence Estimate released Friday said "outside actors" such as Iran and Syria are "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability" in Iraq.

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, said the declassified public document "does not adequately reflect" the degree of concern in nearby Sunni nations about Shiite-run Iran's meddling in Iraq. He disputed suggestions that Bush has overemphasized Iran's role.

In his Iraq speech to the nation last month, Bush said the U.S. would "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced training and weaponry to our enemies in Iraq," citing Iran and Syria.

Critics of Bush's harder line on Iran fall into two camps: those who worry his recent strong talk might lead to a military conflict and those who claim he should have gotten tough earlier.

Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards, for instance, has criticized what he suggests is previous indifference to the Iranian threat.

"In order to ensure Iran never gets nuclear weapons, all options must remain on the table," Edwards says in a hint at possible military action. The vice presidential nominee in 2004 has called for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

For now, time appears to favor Iran, says Anthony Cordesman, an analyst with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Even if the United States and Iraq's Shiite-led government can bring stability, "Iran must now feel it can outwait the U.S., exploit U.S. unpopularity in many Shiite areas, and has every reason to be opportunistic.

"Iran wins to some degree even if it does not exploit the situation. A Shiite-dominated Iraq is going to need Iranian help and support for years to come."

Report Spells Out Dangers Of Attack On Iran (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Military action in response to Iran's atomic programme would be "highly dangerous" with diplomacy still an option, according to a report published today by a group of British non-governmental organisations, think-tanks and trade unions.

"It cannot be said that the potential for diplomacy has been fully explored while direct talks between Iran and the US have not taken place," says "Time to Talk: the Case for Diplomatic Solutions on Iran", from -Crisis Action.

The report warns that US or Israeli attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could lead to civilian deaths, radioactive contamination, heightened conflict in neighbouring Iraq and Afghanistan, al-Qaeda attacks stemming from intensified anti-western feeling, higher oil prices and an acceleration of Tehran's nuclear programme.

Among those endorsing the report is Sir Richard -Dalton, UK ambassador to Iran from 2003 to 2006. He said the report was "wagging a finger" to remind the British government that military action should be "a last resort in self-defence or to prevent an imminent threat".

Sir Richard defended the US and European Union's refusal to negotiate with Iran while Tehran refused to implement December's United Nations Security Council resolution that it suspend almost all its nuclear activities.

However, he argued London should "not just sit back on our heels". It should work "behind the scenes" to ensure the US was ready to supplement international negotiations "when re-quired".

The report appears sceptical that the Bush administration will engage Tehran, arguing "the sidelining" of the Baker-Hamilton report, which last month advocated talks with Iran, "illustrates further the rejection of direct negotiation".

Paul Rogers, professor of peace studies at Bradford university, said "an attack designed to diminish Iran's nuclear capacity would involve trying to kill as many technicians and scientists as possible".

Mr Rogers told the Financial Times that Iran would have "a huge range of retaliatory options", including attacks on the oil facilities of the Arab countries across the Persian Gulf.

At Iran's Isfahan nuclear site on Saturday, Ali-Asghar Soltanieh, the country's representative at the International Atomic Energy Agency, said the nuclear programme was "fully transparent".

Mr Soltanieh was welcoming reporters and IAEA representatives from developing countries on a trip around the facility, which processes uranium ore into uranium hexafluoride, the feeder fuel for the enrichment plant further north at Natanz.

He refused to say whether Iran would install anti-aircraft missiles being delivered from Russia at Isfahan Tor. The site is currently ringed by less sophisticated anti-aircraft guns.

Iran's Role In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

To the Editor:

Re "Bullying Iran (editorial, Feb. 1):

The United States has now resorted to the soft power of disinformation about Iran by leveling false charges regarding Iran's behavior toward Iraq. While Iran has fully supported the new government in Iraq and has signed various trade and energy agreements with Baghdad, the United States government continues to demonize Iran and blame it for America's own failures.

Contrary to your assertion that Iran is sowing chaos in Iraq, Iran is concerned about the growing chaos and the unwanted consequences of spill-over conflict and masses of refugees.

Iran favors a strong, unified Iraq whose sovereignty is not constantly trampled upon by the intrusive Western powers. To this effect, Iran has responded favorably to Iraq's call for a regional forum to discuss the country's dangerous crisis.

Congress Must Stop An Attack On Iran (LAT)

By Leonard Weiss And Larry Diamond

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

DESPITE ANGUISH and anger over the Bush administration's decision to escalate its failing war in Iraq, Congress is unlikely to cut off funding. Even most opponents of the war fear that they could be blamed for not supporting the troops in the field and for a possible descent into even greater catastrophe in the face of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

But nothing prevents Congress from using its power of the purse to prevent an American attack on Iran. President Bush's neoconservative advisors and pundit supporters have been beating the drums of war with Iran since 2003, when the president declared Iran to be part of an "axis of evil." Recall that a senior administration official told The Times that Iran should "take a number" in the wake of the invasion of Iraq. In his recent address to the nation on the troop surge in Iraq, Bush issued more threats to Iran. Now the president has named a Navy admiral to head the U.S. Central Command and dispatched a second aircraft carrier and minesweepers to the Persian Gulf, presumably to prevent Iran from closing the Strait of Hormuz in the event of conflict.

These developments and other administration moves could presage an air attack on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Iran is not innocent of dangerous and provocative behavior. Tehran has supported insurgent groups in Iraq, including helping to provide sophisticated explosives that have killed U.S. soldiers. And Iran's continued development of a nuclear enrichment facility is in defiance of the international community's demand to halt those actions. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repulsive statements about the Holocaust and Israel add to the nervousness about Iran's future actions.

But war is not yet justified, except in the minds of those who have been lobbying for it for years. Iran is still years away from being a nuclear threat, and our experience with "preventive war" in Iraq should teach us a thing or two. Launching another such war without international approval would leave us even more politically isolated and militarily overstretched. Attacking a Middle Eastern country — one much stronger than Iraq and with the ability to cut off oil supplies from the Strait of Hormuz — could inflame the region, intensify Shiite militia attacks on our soldiers in Iraq and stimulate terrorist attacks on Americans and U.S. interests worldwide.

But recklessness, not prudence, has been the hallmark of this administration's foreign policy. Beyond this, the president and vice president subscribe to what some call the "unitary executive," which is a fancy way of saying they believe that Congress cannot prevent the president from doing almost anything he wants. The 1973 War Powers Act, passed in the wake of our disastrous war in Vietnam, allows the president to put U.S. troops in a combat situation under certain conditions before obtaining any congressional authorization to do so. When Bush signed the Iraq war resolution, he issued a statement challenging the constitutionality of the War Powers Act, indicating that he could take the nation to war without obeying its restrictions. Unfortunately, even if the president were to agree to the act's restrictions, he could still attack Iran and have up to 90 days before being required to get congressional authorization for the attack.

What to do? Congress should not wait. It should hold hearings on Iran before the president orders a bombing attack on its nuclear facilities, or orders or supports a provocative act by the U.S. or an ally designed to get Iran to retaliate, and thus further raise war fever.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has warned the administration that it had better seek congressional authorization for any attack on Iran. But we need Senate and House hearings now to put the Bush administration on notice that, in the absence of an imminent military attack or a verified terrorist attack on the United States by Iran, Congress will not support a U.S. military strike on that country. Those hearings should aim toward passage of a law preventing the expenditure of any funds for a military attack on Iran unless Congress has either declared war with that country or has otherwise authorized military action under the War Powers Act.

The law should be attached to an appropriations bill, making it difficult for the president to veto. If he simply claims that he is not bound by the restriction even if he signs it into law, and then orders an attack on Iran without congressional authorization for it, Congress should file a lawsuit and begin impeachment proceedings.

It is, of course, possible that the president's truculent language and actions toward Iran are a bluff, an attempt to rein in its irresponsible behavior.

But the administration's mendacious and incompetent course of action in taking the nation to war with Iraq gives us no reason to provide the president with the benefit of any doubt. And stiffening economic sanctions — at a time when Iran's economy is ailing and the regime is losing popular support — offers a better and safer prospect of exerting leverage.

Another war of choice would only pour fuel on the fires of the Middle East. And the history of this administration shows that if Congress does not constrain this president, he could well act recklessly again, in ways that would profoundly damage our national interest.

India Faces Delicate Diplomacy In US, Iran Talks (AFP)

India will engage in delicate diplomacy this week during talks with Washington on a crucial civilian nuclear deal and with nuclear renegade Iran over energy and regional issues, analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0127058

"India will have to maintain a very fine balance," said C.U. Bhaskar, an analyst with the Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, to avoid raising the ire of, and damaging its economic ties with, both nations.

Energy cooperation will be high on Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee's agenda when he visits Tehran, his first official trip outside South Asia since taking office in May.

His talks on Tuesday and Wednesday come amid growing US pressure on countries for tougher sanctions against the Islamic regime for defying demands to rein in its nuclear programme.

India and Iran are expected to discuss two multi-billion dollar gas deals including a pipeline that would cross Pakistan to help meet demand in energy-hungry India.

Mukherjee is also almost "certain to discuss the situation in the region," an Indian official said, as tension mounts over Tehran's nuclear ambitions and the US military build-up in the Gulf and Iraq.

In Washington, India's special envoy on the US nuclear deal, Shyam Saran, is expected to conclude a deal that lifts three decades of US sanctions barring the transfer of civilian nuclear technology and equipment to India.

The US Congress in December gave the go-ahead to Washington to begin the negotiations with New Delhi, seen as the high watermark of the rapidly warming ties between the two nations.

But the ties did not stop US ambassador to New Delhi, David C. Mulford, last week warning that Washington would be following Mukherjee's Iran visit.

Mulford also told reporters Washington "discouraged" any commercial dealings with Iran. The US has placed economic sanctions on Tehran that include halting cooperation with governments and companies abroad that invest in Iran.

Bharat Karnad, of the New Delhi-based Centre for Policy Studies, said New Delhi had to watch its step carefully or endanger the growing US relationship.

It "is a cross that India has to bear as, to an extent, the successful conclusion of the India-US accord depends on satisfying the US on certain issues," the analyst said.

Analyst Bhaskar and India's former envoy to the UN Conference on Disarmament, Arundhati Ghosh, agreed Mukherjee's visit to Iran was "very important" and the talks with the United States were "delicate."

"In diplomacy, there are always grey areas. The foreign minister's visit is key as it is important not to make Iran feel isolated at this point," Bhaskar said.

"India could play a valuable role as facilitator depending on the situation," he added.

Indian officials, however, dismissed suggestions New Delhi has a "high-wire balancing act" on its hands.

"Not at all," said a senior official who describes New Delhi's engagements with "strategic partner" Tehran on energy and other issues as pursuing the "national interest."

"India, as the prime minister (Manmohan Singh) has stated in parliament and at other times, follows an independent foreign policy. There is no question of any pressure from any quarter. But New Delhi in not in favour of another nuclear weapon state in the region," the official said.

India voted for a resolution last year that threatened Iran with possible UN-sponsored sanctions if it failed to stop uranium enrichment work that could create material used in nuclear weapons, the official noted.

But he added "India is also against the use of force to make Iran stop its nuclear program."

The Indian Giver (WSJ)

By William S. Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

NEW DELHI -- The U.S.-India relationship emanates from shared values, interests and objectives. Our two nations are multiethnic and secular democracies. Our commonalities and the potential for mutual benefit provide solid reasons for strengthening the relationship into a true bond of friendship and partnership.

India's military is the second largest in the world by number of members. As in the U.S., India's military is controlled by a civilian, democratically elected leadership. India has a transparent judicial system and insists upon a vibrant and free press, just as we do. India enrolls more than 100,000 students each year in U.S. colleges and universities -- and an effort is underway to grant more visas to provide even greater access in the future. Each day we see our economies working more closely together than ever before. Consistent with this convergence, the 2.2 million Americans of Indian origin are becoming increasingly influential in shaping the dynamics of the U.S. political stage.

These shared characteristics demonstrate that India and the U.S. are ideal partners in exerting a positive influence in the 21st century. The healthy relationship between the two serves as a working example of cooperation between countries of divergent history and composition. Not only does this allow both to display flexibility and candor in dealing with other nations, but it also furthers the common objective of promoting stability in the world. As a co-founder of the Global Democracy Initiative, India has already demonstrated global leadership as a committed democracy. India and the U.S. are working as partners to secure democracy and to defeat extremism in South Asia and around the world.

The recent U.S.-India civilian nuclear initiative has the potential to engender goodwill and partnership. This initiative finally removes the cinder from the eye, ending decades of misunderstanding and distrust about India's nuclear intent and capabilities. The increasing strategic connections between the U.S. and India should progress to closer military coordination -- and cooperation. Exchanges of technology, strategy and troops advance the capabilities and strategic capacities of both democracies. Such exchanges enable the U.S. and India to engage in coordinated action and to function independently at higher levels of proficiency.

U.S.-India military cooperation has already begun. Cooperative efforts in providing relief following the Indonesian tsunami in December 2004 are emblematic of the new relationship. The armed forces of the two nations have intensified collaboration on bioterrorism, homeland security and cyber security, resulting in further understanding and system interoperability. In June 2005, India and the U.S. signed a "New Defense Framework," including coproduction of military hardware. This will have a profound influence, enabling coproduction of U.S. technology on Indian soil, creating countless jobs and providing India with access to critical spares for its new, high-tech armed forces.

The effects of economic cooperation will shape the destiny of the 21st century. The U.S. and India both share an appreciation for free enterprise and market-driven economic progress to benefit citizens at all levels of society. India has been progressively dismantling its commercial barriers while strengthening intellectual property rights. Opening its infrastructure, insurance, banking, pension and retail markets to foreign competition will go a step further in creating the potential of more than $1 trillion in new investment in India's infrastructure sector where it is needed most.

India can be proud of its economic rise, which places it as the fourth-largest economy, with GDP galloping at a rate exceeding 8% annually. Some economic forecasts predict that India's economy measured in absolute dollar terms will overtake Italy, France and Britain in the next decade.

That said, there is still far to go in terms of India developing first-world infrastructure and delivering world-class education and health care to all its citizens. These challenges can best be met by true partnership and U.S.-India cooperation. U.S. industry stands ready to commit massive investment in the form of public-private partnerships, converting these challenges into opportunity. Already, U.S. defense industry leaders such as Pratt & Whitney, Sikorsky, Honeywell, Lockheed Martin and General Dynamics have committed to significant coproduction with Indian partners, recognizing India's engineering prowess. Likewise, U.S. companies have demonstrated a commitment to work with Indian partners to help India achieve a second Green Revolution. The public-private approach that has worked so well in the U.S., which has brought high technology to all aspects of the economy, can serve as a model for India as its farmers work towards achieving greater agricultural productivity.

Thus, the logic of U.S.-India partnership is clear. Strategically, militarily and economically the U.S.-India partnership makes perfect sense. With closer cooperation, India and the U.S. -- and all citizens of both countries -- will reap the rewards of mutual respect and trust working as equal partners in the 21st century.

In Europe, Pushback Against US 'War On Terror' (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

PARIS

DOJ_NMG_0127060

Reaction in Germany was hardly neutral when a prosecutor in Munich indicted 13 CIA officials last week for kidnapping a German of Lebanese descent and interrogating him in Afghanistan before apparently realizing they had the wrong man. Germans solidly backed the prosecutor.

Since Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld took the unprecedented step, both the right and left in Germany have supported the "rule of law" principles he articulated.

The media have been unified as well. Typical is the centrist Süddeutsche Zeitung: "The justice system has stood up for the rule of law. Whether the government will do so is a different matter. Berlin must push for the kidnappers to be extradited, or ... tried in the USA. But it is unlikely to have that much courage."

The solidarity underscores a shifting tone in Europe. As changes of leadership loom in Britain and France, and capitals contemplate relations with a post-Bush US, Uncle Sam may expect stronger "pushbacks" from Europe, experts here say. Public disapproval of the US-led "war on terror" is also growing, spurring the change.

"There is a deep gap between government policy and public opinion in Europe, and that opinion may be shaping the direction here right now," says Frederic Bozo, professor of European Studies at the Sorbonne in Paris. "Europe doesn't want to upset the careful balance with the US. I don't think there is a united opposition against the US at all. But Europe is setting the groundwork for its own identity."

Gordon Brown, who is shortly expected to take over as prime minister in Great Britain, opposed the Iraq war from the start, and has made no secret that he plans to carve out an independent line on the venerable "special relationship" with the US. Many anticipate that British troops will leave Iraq by the end of the year.

In France, even the avidly pro- American Nicolas Sarkozy, current front-runner in the French elections this spring, stated in an interview taped in New York last week that Americans need to "get interested in the world, and the world will learn to love you."

To be sure, European cooperation with the US on a wide range of areas, including counterterrorism, is extremely strong, even in France, where the Chirac government has steadily gone it alone in Europe in opposition to the Iraq campaign.Yet Europeans have steadily refused to accept the concept and phrase, "war on terror," a sentiment that extends to its application to Iraq.

Last week, European Union officials in Brussels sought to reduce the amount of information given to US agencies on air passengers leaving Europe. An official in charge of data protection for the European Central Bank similarly advised that millions of pieces of financial information being sent regularly to the US after Sept. 11 were in violation of EU privacy codes.

The "secret, routine, and massive access" by US agencies to banking SWIFT codes – needed to transfer in and out of European financial institutions – is "unacceptable," stated Peter Hustinx, the Brussels official responsible for EU data oversight.

Boosting this sentiment is Europeans' recognition that the US is also in flux with an election season starting up, and that President Bush's term appears to be winding down with the United States in a vulnerable position overseas.

The US legal basis for conducting interrogation centers at Guantánamo Bay, for example, has long rankled in Europe.

"Most of the French opinion, many of the German people, a large share of the Labor constituency in the UK, the Spanish, and now Italy, don't just oppose the policy, but the basis of US policy," says Georges Le Guelte, of the Institute for International and Strategic Relations in Paris. "You can't have renditions and Guantánamo and talk human rights at the same time. That is more clear to many of us."

In Italy, prosecutors put out warrants several months ago for 25 members of a CIA team that abducted a Muslim cleric in Milan.

Nor is Europe alone in its willingness to speak more pointedly to the White House about its foreign affairs. On page 1 of last Thursday's People's Daily, a newspaper of record in China, a Chinese official criticized Mr. Bush for inflammatory rhetoric that turned the war in Iraq into a "religious war."

The comment was unprecedented in a state where official decorum is rigidly maintained. (For nearly a decade, China has conducted a brutal campaign of summary executions of Muslims in its far-west Xinjiang region, as documented in human rights reports.)

In the case of the Munich renditions, announced Jan. 31, 13 American CIA operatives allegedly apprehended German citizen Khaled el-Masri in Macedonia in 2004 and whisked him to an Afghan prison called "the Salt Pit." Realizing he was the wrong man, they left him on a hillside in Albania five months later, warning him never to talk of his experience. Mr. el-Masri instead filed suit in a Virginia court. Masri's case was dropped in Virginia after arguments that a trial would jeopardize US security operations.

But with help from Spanish police, the Munich prosecutors discovered the identity of the operatives through flight and hotel records in Palma de Mallorca, where they stopped to relax.

On Friday, in Washington, German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that the Munich warrants were only valid in Germany at present, but that Berlin felt the local court might issue an international warrant, according to German papers.

Ms. Rice said the warrants would not harm US-German relations. Justice Department officials have not responded to approaches by the German prosecutors.

Germany's Rising Political Star (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

BERLIN — She is at her most convincing beyond the camera's flash, but German Chancellor Angela Merkel can work a room, turning pragmatism into an erudite, diplomatic charm that has made her Europe's most commanding leader.

She is neither brash nor rash; as a student she deliberated 45 minutes before jumping off a diving board. But despite her quiet manner, Merkel is rising in stature as British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac are set to leave office. She is not as telegenic as Blair, or as suave as Chirac, but her sober intellectual confidence is increasingly influential.

Berlin has improved ties with the Bush administration even though Merkel has refused to send troops to Iraq and has criticized the treatment of terrorism suspects in U.S. custody. Her government is attempting to revive Middle East peace talks, negotiate an end to the crisis over Iran's uranium enrichment program, improve links with China and build a unified Europe less driven by the traditional German-French axis.

"She does not like grand visions. She's a pragmatic politician," said Gerd Langguth, who wrote a biography on Merkel in 2005. "The atmosphere of how Germany is talking to world leaders has changed. Blair is a political lame duck, so is Chirac. Italy and Spain are not very stable. So for the moment, the German chancellor is more important."

Merkel is using this clout to urge the continent's governments to be aggressive about reform and globalization, pushing especially for the loosening of regulations on business and the strengthening of transatlantic economic bonds to compete with India and other rising trading powers. She has cautioned Europe not to retract into a shell of protectionism.

The warning comes as the German economy is emerging from years of slow growth and high unemployment. Consumer confidence is up, and Germany, the world's third-largest economy, is benefiting from cuts to labor protection and social programs — safety net elements that had been championed by Merkel's predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder. But Merkel, who has been in office 14 months, fears the momentum will slip if more reforms aren't passed to keep Germany competitive in global markets.

The chancellor leads a contentious coalition government whose liberals and conservatives have produced no significant domestic reforms. Such deadlock perhaps makes it politically safer for Merkel to dabble in the world's problems, such as meeting with rock star Bono at the recent World Economic Forum in Switzerland, than to try to calm angry pensioners or thousands of German doctors striking for higher salaries.

Merkel's prominence on the international stage follows Schroeder's insistence that the generation of Germany's politicians that came of age after World War II should reassert the nation's voice in world affairs. The two leaders' styles, however, are different; the current chancellor prefers backroom deliberations to public schmoozing, and bar graphs to catchy one-liners.

"I think Mrs. Merkel is more academic, looking at dossiers and acting only after she understands a problem," said Andreas Maurer, an analyst with the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "Schroeder was much more oriented to media exercises ... and acted much more on emotions."

One of Merkel's foreign policy goals is a European Union that gives a more influential role to the newer, weaker members of the alliance. Once dominated by Paris and Berlin, the EU, which has grown to 27 countries, these days represents a continent of looser borders and more diverse voices.

Germany holds the EU's rotating presidency until July, and Merkel has been traveling to Western capitals, such as Brussels, and to former communist capitals, such as Prague, to find consensus on ratifying a European Constitution to fit everyone.

"The exclusivity of the Franco-German relationship is over," Maurer said. "Merkel is much more inclusive of other countries."

Berlin's strategy also has shifted toward Washington. Schroeder was a fierce critic of the Iraq war and other U.S. policies, but Merkel, who has met President Bush six times since 2005, has appeared more sensitive to European-American relations. The change indicates that the continent's ties to the United States, which were strong during the Cold War, are just as strategic in a new era of terrorism and globalization.

"The U.S. is still the European Union's most important trade partner," Merkel said in Switzerland. "We are also the most important investment partners for each other."

Security concerns have led the chancellor to be active in the Middle East. Her foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, is a key negotiator, along with counterparts on the U.N. Security Council, in the effort to defuse tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions. He also has been working with Washington, the United Nations, Russia and the EU to push for peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

"We know that resolving this conflict or at least making progress would also have an effect on all the other regional conflict," Merkel said last month after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Unlike Schroeder, who was a friend of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin — a circumstance that many analysts say muted German criticism of Moscow's war in Chechnya and human rights record — Merkel is skeptical of Russia. Last year, Merkel, who is a physicist and the daughter of a Protestant minister, irritated the Kremlin when she met with rights groups and opposition figures during a visit to Moscow.

"Merkel is fluent in Russian and she was raised in the former communist" East Germany, Maurer said. "She is using her biography to speak to Europe about Russia."

The chancellor refers to Russia as a strategic partner, but she is unlikely to speak of Putin as a "flawless democrat" the way Schroeder did. She publicly rebuked Moscow several weeks ago when she questioned its reliability as an energy partner after a pipeline dispute between Russia and Belarus temporarily cut oil supplies to Germany.

Germany's largest newspaper, Bild, credited Merkel with bringing "soberness" to Berlin's relations with Moscow. "We depend on oil and gas from Russia, and Russia needs us as buyers.... Germany's interests are in good hands with Merkel. She banks less on feeling than on clear reason," Bild said.

Hamas Attacks Fatah Bases (WT/AP)

By Karin Laub

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip - Hamas gunmen attacked bases of Fatah-allied troops with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades early yesterday, part of a four-day campaign by the Islamic militants to weaken the security forces loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

As night fell, efforts were underway to restore a truce. Gunmen pulled back from their positions, to be replaced by police officers. Both sides began to exchange hostages and joint Hamas-Fatah patrols took to the streets to monitor the cease-fire. Previous truces have broken down quickly.

In the West Bank, a strategy session by Fatah leaders ended in a shouting match, with some participants demanding that Mr. Abbas' party take a tougher stand against Hamas in the struggle for control of the Palestinian government, and others pushing to give a mediation effort by Saudi Arabia a chance. In one particularly angry exchange, participants threw an empty cup and a shoe at each other, witnesses said.

"We all agreed that Hamas has been trying for a long time to impose its control on the Gaza Strip, and Fatah needs to stand up to this policy of Hamas," said Amin Makboul, one of the group's members. Under fierce debate, though, is how to do so.

The infighting among Palestinians has overshadowed new efforts to restart the peace process with Israel. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist and its hard-line approach has drawn international sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy. Mr. Abbas has sought negotiations in the past, but lately has been distracted by the power struggle within his own government.

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said yesterday that Israel must not intervene in the internal Palestinian fighting.

"We need to leave Gaza to the Gazans," Mr. Peres told Israel Army Radio. "Our intervention will not help; on the contrary, it will draw all the fire toward Israel. We need to leave the Gazans to deal with it and hope that it settles itself."

Mr. Abbas, Hamas' exiled leader Khalid Mashaal and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas are to meet in Islam's holy city of Mecca tomorrow for reconciliation talks hosted by Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, the highest-profile mediation effort in several weeks of fighting.

The Palestinian ambassador to Saudi Arabia, Jamal Shobaki, said the meeting will be open-ended and will focus on negotiating a platform for a national unity government and distributing Cabinet positions.

More than 130 Palestinians have been killed in the factional fighting since May. The bloodiest round began Thursday, killing 28 persons and wounding more than 230 in four days.

Since Thursday, Hamas gunmen have attacked more than a dozen security installations in what appeared to be a systematic campaign to weaken Mr. Abbas' control of Gaza.

Late Saturday and early yesterday, Hamas fired mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades at a training camp of the Presidential Guard and Mr. Abbas' nearby office compound in Gaza City. Mr. Abbas was not in Gaza during the current round of fighting.

Palestinians Say Clashes Hurt Their Cause (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 4 — The fierce internal clashes between Palestinian factions have shocked many Palestinians and Arab governments, who fear that the continuing bloodshed is damaging the Palestinian image before the world, Palestinians say.

“This fighting affects everyone’s morale,” said Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian analyst who teaches at Al Quds University here. “We always felt we had this one big asset, our social unity as Palestinians, but to see it shredding, with lives being shed without much concern, is horrible. We’ve lost a lot of sensitivity to these deaths, to those killed by the Israelis and ourselves.”

Even as the Bush administration has moved in its second term to try for significant progress toward peace, Palestinians say their own infighting is making it too easy for Israel to argue that the time is not right to promote a Palestinian state.

Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia have intensified efforts to stop the fighting, some of the worst internal Palestinian violence in years, and to push the warring Fatah and Hamas factions into a unity government of some type, no matter how fragile.

King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia has called a meeting in the holy city of Mecca on Tuesday between the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and senior Hamas figures in the hope of restoring at least a facade of Palestinian unity. “What is happening now is damaging our reputation and our standing with Arab public opinion and with Arab officials,” said Mkhaimar Abusada, a political scientist at Al Azhar University in Gaza. “My feeling is that Arab support for the Palestinians is beginning to evaporate. Arabs are looking at us as fighting ourselves now, not the Israeli occupation, and Arab officials are saying that we’re not very serious about establishing a state.”

Ahmed Abdel Rahman, a former adviser to Yasir Arafat and a member of Fatah’s Central Committee, said that “the Palestinian national enterprise is in danger now.”

Mr. Kuttab, of Al Quds University, said that since the Israelis pulled out of Gaza in the autumn of 2005, “there has been a lot of hopelessness and frustration and disappointment, with people thinking they can solve everything with a rifle.” The political and diplomatic impasse, he said, has fostered violence, and many people believe that Fatah and Hamas are not even sure why they are fighting each other.

"Unfortunately power and violence do produce results in this part of the world," Mr. Kuttab said. "Talk of peace and nonviolence doesn't get us very far, unfortunately."

On Saturday evening in Ramallah, on the West Bank, a fierce argument broke out during a meeting of the Revolutionary Council of Fatah over how to deal with Hamas and the fighting in Gaza, participants said.

The West Bank intelligence chief, Tawfiq Tarawi, criticized some Fatah officials for trying to play "Red Cross" and mediate between Hamas and Fatah, said a security official who was there but did not want to be identified if he mentioned the names of the officials involved.

Mr. Tarawi criticized the former West Bank security chief, Jibril Rajoub, in particular, for blaming Fatah as well as Hamas for the infighting.

During the argument, heated words were exchanged and shoes were thrown, a severe insult in the Arab world. "I have a message from the three Balousha kids," Mr. Tarawi said, referring to three children killed in December on their way to school. Their father, Baha, is a prominent Fatah intelligence official in Gaza. Then he threw his shoes at Mr. Rajoub. The December attack is thought to have been carried out by Hamas supporters.

A consensus emerged from the meeting that Fatah must not bend to Hamas in the Gaza Strip, the unidentified Fatah official said.

Another participant, Amin Makboul, told The Associated Press, "We all agreed that Hamas has been trying for some time to impose its control on the Gaza Strip, and Fatah needs to stand up to this policy of Hamas." But he said there was disagreement over tactics.

The streets were calmer in Gaza on Sunday, as another effort at a cease-fire appeared to be taking hold, and some people ventured out in the morning to buy provisions. But there were clashes during the day, and gunmen from both sides remained on the streets.

Two members of Mr. Abbas's presidential guard died of wounds suffered Friday, and the total of dead since Thursday rose to 28, including 4 children. More ominously, the nephew of Fatah's most powerful figure in Gaza, Muhammad Dahlan, was kidnapped by Hamas on Saturday. Hamas considers Mr. Dahlan its main enemy in Gaza, and Mr. Dahlan is thought to be the unofficial commander of Fatah forces there.

His nephew, Sharaf Dahlan, 21, works for the Civil Affairs Ministry of the Palestinian Authority but helps out in his uncle's office. On his way to Gaza City on Saturday, his taxi was stopped at a Hamas checkpoint. He handed over his ID and was then taken away.

The news emerged Sunday when Hamas officials said he was providing them with "secrets" about Muhammad Dahlan, though aides to Mr. Dahlan say the young man knows very little.

In the fighting that began on Thursday, Hamas forces have taken most of northern Gaza and large areas of Gaza City. Hamas has destroyed or damaged Fatah security headquarters in the north and taken equipment, weapons and files. But Fatah has defended three of its major compounds in Gaza City: the main security headquarters, the Saraya; the headquarters of the preventive security force; and the presidential compound.

Palestinians are deeply upset that each side has gone after symbolic institutions that belong to the other, including the main Gaza universities and their libraries, which have been attacked by rockets and firebombs.

"Everything the Palestinians fought for in the 1980s and '90s is being undermined in a second," said Diana Buttu, a Palestinian and former aide to Mr. Dahlan and Mr. Abbas. "People were shot and killed to ensure universities stayed open. Now we're blowing up our own universities, and UNRWA is threatening to pull out, and no one cares." UNRWA is the agency that cares for and educates Palestinian refugees and their families.

What is more frustrating, Ms. Buttu said, was that "all the infighting diverts attention from the real issues, like the Israeli occupation and Jerusalem, and instead people are focusing on whether a national unity government emerges based on a political document no one cares about."

In Israel on Sunday, the cabinet approved the appointment of Gabi Ashkenazi as the new military chief of staff, replacing Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who resigned over the war with Hezbollah.

Mr. Ashkenazi, 52, an infantryman and former deputy chief of staff, will be promoted to lieutenant general and will command in about 10 days. Some in the Israeli military argue that Israel should consider a major operation into the Gaza Strip to attack Hamas and seize weaponry, but such a move is considered unlikely now. The Israeli Shin Bet intelligence agency told the cabinet on Sunday that intra-Palestinian fighting was not likely to end soon.

Palestinian Factional Fighting May Spread (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

NABLUS, WEST BANK

Violence between rival Palestinian factions Fatah and Hamas surged in the Gaza Strip for a second consecutive weekend, as at least 25 Palestinians died in three days of Hamas-Fatah fighting. The violence spurred Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Meshal to arrange an emergency summit in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, Tuesday.

Despite the mounting casualties and failed cease-fires in Gaza, internecine strife in the West Bank has been limited and mostly nonlethal. But now the violence is threatening to spill over, as Fatah militants in cities such as Nablus embark on a series of kidnappings as a counterpunch to Hamas gains in Gaza.

"Every day they are killing somebody in Gaza," says Da'as Kanna, a Fatah militant who kidnapped and later released five Hamas men from downtown Nablus. "The Al Aqsa Brigades [Fatah's military wing] in the West Bank can't sit by and watch. We are one Fatah."

A new West Bank battle front would expose nearly twice as many Palestinians to the daily skirmishes that have kept Gazans shuttered indoors, and threaten to drag Israeli forces into the fray.

Over the weekend, Hamas militants landed several blows to Fatah's power base in Gaza, capturing facilities throughout the north belonging to the Fatah-controlled security services of the Palestinian Authority. Hamas fighters abducted on Saturday the nephew of former Gaza security chief Mohammed Dahlan, one of dozens to be kidnapped in the violence, and on Thursday intercepted trucks believed to be carrying arms to forces loyal to Abbas.

Meanwhile, Fatah fighters destroyed laboratories, lecture halls, and a library at Hamas-run Islamic University. They also attacked Gaza's A-Shifa Hospital, thought to be controlled by Hamas.

Hamas starts new West Bank force?

Unlike Gaza, where the sides are thought to be evenly matched, Fatah's superiority in men and arms is undisputed in the West Bank. And yet, Fatah militants are spooked by rumors that Hamas is quietly moving to replicate its Gaza Executive Force, or tanfideyeh, in West Bank.

Bassem Ezbeidi, a Bir Zeit University political science professor, expects the Hamas-Fatah conflict to remain confined to Gaza, but cautions that a West Bank flare-up can't be ruled out.

"Fatah has been very provocative by kidnapping," says Mr. Ezbeidi. "Fatah is sending a message that, 'We are strong here and we are reacting to what Hamas is doing in Gaza.' It's a war of messages"

Militants like Mr. Kanna have spent most of the past six years bracing for Israeli incursions into Nablus. Last week, however, he and as many as 30 Al Aqsa Brigades gunmen ambushed the local Education Ministry building to kidnap five men accused of membership in the Hamas tanfidiyeh.

Brandishing an M-16, Kanna tells how he got word that a group of masked Hamas gunmen had unleashed a round of bullets near the Nablus municipality a week ago, and fled to the Education Ministry, which is controlled by Hamas. Kanna says the Fatah gunmen attacked the ministry building because it allegedly serves as a training base for the tanfidiyeh.

"The Ministry of Education has been used by Hamas as a military camp," he says. "The objective was to tell them we do not recognize the illegal Executive Force."

A stairwell gun battle between Hamas and Fatah sent employees throughout the building ducking for cover behind closed doors.

Kanna claims to have extracted confessions from the five abductees, but they were released several hours later as a quid pro quo for Hamas's decision to release abductees of their own in Gaza. The militant says he planned to continue the tactic of kidnapping Hamas members to use as bargaining chips.

On the same day, Nablus council member Fayad al Aghbar – a Hamas politician – was kidnapped at gunpoint live on camera at a branch of the Arab Islamic Bank. Mr. Aghbar was hooded, taken to a refugee camp, and interrogated about his alleged involvement in the Hamas executive force. He was released after being held for 10 hours.

"It was a violent, uncivilized affair," he says, denying the existence of a new Hamas force. And yet, at an anniversary celebration of Hamas's founding several weeks ago, members of its military wing made a rare public appearance. "Hamas is capable of responding to Fatah's aggressiveness in Nablus, but Hamas leadership is not keen to transfer the chaos in Gaza to the West Bank," says Aghbar .

The fighting could draw in Israel

A Hamas activist was kidnapped in the West Bank city of Jenin on Friday, and on Sunday, Hamas offices in Bethlehem were torched, according to the Palestinian Ma'an News service. On Saturday in Nablus, two more Hamas activists were abducted.

A spike in West Bank violence threatens to draw the Israeli army into the fighting because it controls access to Palestinian towns to block suicide bombers and attacks on Jewish settlers in the region.

"If a confrontation is to take place around Ramallah and Nablus," says Ezbeidi, it's likely that the Israeli army will be forced to become involved. "They will find many ways to intervene and that would have destructive consequences for all sides."

To be sure, among the West Bank's major cities, Nablus is perhaps the most notorious as a den of crime where young Fatah militants have been making their own laws long before the outbreak of widespread clashes with Hamas. Prominent Nablus families are reported to be hoarding weapons in case of an escalation of internecine violence in the West Bank.

The recent Nablus kidnappings were condemned as unproductive by Nasser Juma'a, a Fatah legislator from Nablus who used to lead a division of Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades. He accused Hamas of recruiting members in Nablus for its own security force and of "poking the bees' nest" of Fatah armed groups.

If Hamas unveils a new security force in the West Bank, "we will get to a stage like Gaza. It will escalate matters."

Mr. Juma'a says he's hopeful that Mr. Abbas, Mr. Meshal, and Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh will reach an agreement on a unity government this week at talks hosted by Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Shiites Fear Gains Could Be Lost (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah And Rasheed Abou Al-Samh

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

QATIF, Saudi Arabia, Jan. 30 — As young men beat their chests in street processions marking the Shiite Muslim holiday of Ashura in this Shiite stronghold in eastern Saudi Arabia, Ibrahim al-Mugaiteeb looked on nervously, bracing for the region's political conflicts to close in on this downtrodden community.

With sectarian tensions rising between Sunnis and Shiites throughout the Middle East, and pressure growing on the Saudi government by the country's Sunni leadership, Saudi Shiites, who have made great strides in recent years, are worried that those gains will be rolled back.

"Things are dim and dark, and the worst is still to come," said Mr. Mugaiteeb, a human rights campaigner who runs an unlicensed Saudi human rights monitor here in the Eastern Province. "As always the minorities will be most affected when this is done. But it will affect everyone else too."

There are still no Shiites in positions of authority, and Shiites are rarely promoted to managerial positions in government and private companies, Shiite leaders here say. There are also virtually no Shiite headmasters in public schools.

More important, the government has stopped short of actually recognizing the minority, they say. Their hard-won rights have yet to be enshrined into law, meaning they could be rescinded at short notice.

Last week, the Sunni governor of Al Hasa, a mixed Sunni-Shiite town in the Eastern Province, banned all blood drives organized by Shiites. Sunni clerics have stepped up their preaching against Shiites recently, declaring them again to be infidels.

DOJ_NMG_0127067

And earlier this week King Abdullah, speaking of rumors that Shiites are seeking to convert Sunnis, said that such attempts would fail, and that Sunnis would always make up a majority of the world's Muslims.

In recent times, life had been growing better for Saudi Arabia's two million Shiites, who have long suffered religious and economic discrimination. Yet things are growing tenuous again.

After Iran's Islamic revolution in 1979 energized Shiites throughout the region, the allegiance of Saudi Shiites to the state became suspect as the country's Sunni religious leaders began viewing them as a potential fifth column that could bring down the government. When violent riots erupted during Ashura in the early 1980s, the government killed dozens of protesters and arrested thousands, sending many into exile and setting off a decade of repression.

In 1993, King Fahd tried to settle the differences and in 2003 met with a group of Shiite elders who presented him with a petition calling for equal rights. Suddenly, Shiite fortunes turned.

"There were problems before, but with the passing of time and with the insistence of the people for their rights, things have changed," said Sheik Hassan al-Saffar, a longtime opposition leader who has become a primary advocate for engaging with the government. "Saudi politics is much more focused now on delivering rights than ever before."

Sheik Saffar proudly read off a list of some of the important gains the Shiites have made since then: political prisoners have been released and exiles have returned; rituals have been allowed relatively unfettered; Shiites have been allowed to establish meeting halls and build mosques, and they have begun publishing their own religious books and importing some.

Ashura, the holiest period for Shiites, has become something of a litmus test for the change. Just a few years ago the 10-day commemoration of the seventh-century martyrdom of the Imam Hussein, the most defining event for Shiite Muslims, was largely hidden from public view, held in illegal community centers. This week Saudi Shiites burst into the open in the streets of the oil-rich Eastern Province, holding carnivals and re-enactments of the killing.

In Saudi Arabia, the commemorations have grown larger and more colorful. This year, about 500,000 people attended nightly lectures espousing Imam Hussein's virtues and applying the lessons of his life to modern times. Worshipers marched under large posters of Shiite figures as well as posters of the Lebanese Shiite Muslim leader Hassan Nasrallah, and they shared food and gifts, all emphasizing the human battle between good and evil.

Shiites have begun calling for the Saudi government to enshrine their rights, while encouraging residents here to focus their sights on local Saudi issues, not regional or international ones. They say all that they have achieved has been fought for.

"Things have changed here not because the government wanted the change, but because the world itself has changed," said Sheik Nimr al-Nimr, who advocates a more confrontational stance with the government. "We see better conditions not because of government support but because of our demands for change. The government will not give us anything unless we demand it."

Some Shiite leaders read much in the lack of coverage of Ashura in the Saudi news media. "This is one of the most important cultural events for us," said Sheik Fawzi al-Seif, a local Shiite cleric, who notes that the Saudi news media normally cover religious events in faraway places but rarely ever here. "But no one outside of here knows about it."

Sheik Seif said the government had passed up an opportunity to encourage unity and send a signal to the conservative Sunni leaders. But more significantly, he said, the government lends tacit acceptance to those who attack the Shiites by not responding to their actions.

"The big danger we face now is the growing sectarian division in the region and its slow move into the Persian Gulf, which can have explosive conditions," he said. "The fire could reach us very quickly here."

Shiite clerics here insist they are unwilling to have the Shiites used as a political card, either by the United States or Iran. They warn that any confrontation with Iran would put significant strains on the Shiite population, and fear that ultimately it could be split between those supporting Iran and those supporting the government.

"Things were just like this in the 1970s," said Jaffar al-Shayeb, a longtime Shiite campaigner who in 2005 was elected to Qatif's municipal council. He argues that the Shiites have become more politically astute and focused on their internal interests. But still, he worries that could change someday, too.

"Everything seems normal, then an event can come along and turn everything upside down," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127068

Many fear that the dormant militant groups that once existed here could make a comeback as a result. Mr. Mugaiteeb noted, for instance, that cells of Hezbollah in the Hijaz, the Saudi version of the group, could still be put into action.

"If the U.S. attacks Iran, a lot of people will be violent against the Americans, including Sunnis," he said. "What I want to tell the Americans is that this will not be a picnic."

Doubt Persists On Al-Qaeda Casualties In Somalia Strike (FT)

By William Wallis

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Ethiopia is working closely with the US to identify Islamist combatants killed in neighbouring Somalia, but there has been no confirmation yet of the death of targeted al-Qaeda suspects, according to Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister.

Mr Meles said the US had been assisting with DNA testing on suspects killed in recent fighting, including a US air strike on Somalia last month.

Bloodied papers had been found belonging to Aden Hashi Ayro, the leader of the militant Somali al-Shabaab militia who Washington believes protected leaders of an east African al-Qaeda cell that bombed US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. But reported sightings suggested he may have survived, Mr Meles said.

Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys and Hassan Turki, two hardline leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, whose expanding rule over southern Somalia prompted Ethiopia's invasion in December, were "alive and moving in and out of Kenya on the border", Mr Meles said. "We do not have definite information on a number of the key al-Qaeda targets. There are reports that one or two of them might have died but we have no confirmation."

During its six-month rule last year, the ICU coalition of Islamists provided the first semblance of law and order in southern Somalia since the 1991 overthrow of dictator Mohammed Siad Barre. Ethiopia invaded Somalia after leaders with alleged links to al-Qaeda threatened a regional jihad.

At the time, critics feared Ethiopian involvement in installing the weak UN-backed Transitional Federal Government would enflame religious tensions and provide a rallying cry for international jihadists.

Some of the defeated Islamists have threatened an insurgency and there has been a series of attacks on Ethiopian and allied troops in Mogadishu in recent days.

Mr Meles played down the risk of escalation. "If the TFG manages to pull off the plans it has for national reconciliation . . then the remnants of the Islamic Courts and international jihadists will be politically marginalised."

Looking For A Deal This Time? (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

Like any good diplomat, Christopher Hill knows how to dampen expectations before sitting down to hash out a deal. But more than most envoys, Hill, the top U.S. negotiator in talks resuming in Beijing this week over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs, has ample reason to let some skepticism show.

Fifty-two frustrating months into a confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear weapons programs, the six-nation talks established to rein in Pyongyang's atomic breakout have, so far, netted nothing. Nothing, that is, except neglected promises on paper. In that time, North Korea has tested ballistic missiles and an atomic bomb, declared itself a nuclear power, and multiplied its supply of plutonium from enough for one or two bombs to as many as 13-with most estimates now suggesting six to eight.

Even advocates for negotiations increasingly suspect that, despite its decision to rejoin talks, the North has made a strategic choice to stick with nuclear weapons as the ultimate deterrent to any effort to dislodge Asia's most secretive and anti-American regime. Time, it seems, has been working against Hill and others seeking a deal: With Pyongyang's nuclear buildup and its seeming judgment that the administration is tied down by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may believe that he can wait out President Bush and gain global acquiescence to the North's nuclear status. The U.S. bargaining position, says Gary Samore, director of studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, is "really much weaker."

But it is not just the North's prickly intransigence that has made Hill's task look titanic. Policy struggles within the administration have led to fits of incoherence-or simply straitjacketed U.S. officials assigned to bargain with the North. The lines of battle have pitted hawks, who publicly back the negotiations with the communist North but privately see them as a dead end, against those who favor engagement. "We had warfare going on the entire time I was there," recalls David Straub, a former Korea policy aide who resigned from the State Department last year.

A window on these debates opened last month after the resignation of John Bolton, a key hard-liner who served as the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "Six-party talks have not worked," Bolton said in Tokyo. "Over time," he declared, "the only answer to the North Korean nuclear weapons program is the collapse of the regime." Despite repeated professions of support for a diplomatic approach, Bush himself has shown ambivalence at times about dickering with a dictatorship. He jettisoned the Clinton-era outreach to the North and did not conceal his personal antipathy toward Kim.

As the diplomatic stalemate wore on, hawks found a tool with unexpected capacity to reach out and hurt Kim's regime: a crackdown on money laundering, counterfeiting of U.S. dollars, and other illicit, money-making trade. The administration announced sanctions on a Macao bank alleged to be laundering money for North Korea. That happened just before Hill and envoys from South Korea, Japan, China, Russia-and North Korea-inked a joint statement on principles for nuclear disarmament in return for security assurances, normalization of relations, and economic and energy aid.

U.S.: N. Korea Must Live Up To Pledge (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

AP, February 5, 2007

North Korea must live up to its pledge to fully dismantle its nuclear program, the main U.S. envoy to disarmament talks said Sunday, as news reports suggested Pyongyang may be willing to shut down a key reactor.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill made the comments in Seoul, where he met South Korean officials to discuss negotiating strategies before the six-nation talks resume in Beijing on Thursday.

North Korea agreed in September 2005 to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"Frankly, we cannot accept anything less than 100 percent implementation of the September statement," said Hill, who declined to comment on the Japanese news reports Sunday. "The ultimate task for us is to complete denuclearization."

He spoke before a meeting with his South Korean counterpart, Chun Yung-woo.

Afterward, Chun said the two sides had "complete consensus" on their strategy for the upcoming talks.

Japan's Asahi Shimbun newspaper reported on Sunday that North Korea was prepared to close the reactor in its main nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency — though the reactor itself would remain off-limits.

Asahi quoted Joel Wit, a former State Department official who was in Beijing following meetings with chief North Korean arms negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other senior officials in Pyongyang.

The North, however, does not intend to close the site used for its October nuclear weapons test, will not allow inspections there, and is not prepared to reveal details of its nuclear weapons program, the report cited Wit as saying. Wit was accompanied by U.S. nuclear expert David Albright and traveled to Pyongyang on an official invitation, the report said.

At the upcoming disarmament talks, North Korea will also demand to be taken off Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism, the report said. It also plans to demand more than 500,000 tons of crude oil a year to compensate for an aborted project to build two light-water reactors in the country, according to Asahi.

Public broadcaster NHK and Kyodo News agency later carried similar reports.

The North will also insist that Washington take steps to lift financial sanctions against North Korean assets held in Macau, imposed over the communist regime's alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering, the reports said.

U.S. treasury and North Korean officials last week failed to reach agreement over the financial sanctions. But U.S. officials have since expressed optimism that the financial dispute would not disrupt the main nuclear talks.

The United States had supplied 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil annually to the North until Pyongyang received the two light-water reactors as a reward under a 1994 deal to freeze its nuclear program.

The deal was scrapped in 2002, however, when the nuclear crisis re-emerged and North Korea kicked out IAEA inspectors.

The international arms talks, which involve the U.S., the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia, have made little headway since the 2005 accord — the only agreement reached in the process.

Kim Jr. In Macau (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

It's illegal for North Koreans to leave their country without permission -- a crime for which some of those caught and repatriated by China have paid with their lives. There's one North Korean, however, for whom Beijing rolls out the welcome mat: Kim Jong-nam, the eldest son of dictator Kim Jong Il.

According to a report in Hong Kong's South China Morning Post, Kim Jr. has been residing for the past three years in the Chinese-affiliated territory of Macau, where he's been living the high life at five-star hotels, gambling at Macau's famous casinos and relaxing with friends and family.

The paper reports that the North Korean scion makes occasional pleasure trips to Thailand and Hong Kong on Portuguese and Dominican Republic passports. Lisbon denies it, but the Dominican Republic, Macau and Beijing have kept mum. This isn't the first time the younger Kim has turned up outside his homeland. The Japanese caught him and his young son trying to enter Tokyo on a fake DR passport in 2001, apparently trying to visit Disneyland.

While the 35-year-old enjoys himself in Macau, his 23 million countrymen suffer in the world's most isolated regime. Thanks to malnutrition, most North Koreans are a good foot shorter, on average, than South Koreans. Mr. Kim is well fed and reportedly enjoys late-night whiskey and cognac. His life of luxury is a reminder of how North Korean elites profit from the exploitation of the country's workers.

It's also a reminder of another Macau-North Korea connection that Beijing would like to forget -- the laundering of ill-gotten North Korean money at Macau's Banco Delta Asia. After the U.S. Treasury put the bank on a watchlist in 2005, the Macau government froze $24 million in North Korean accounts and other banks refused to do business with Kim's regime for fear of also being cited.

The six-party talks resume Thursday in Beijing, and Pyongyang is demanding that the U.S. lift sanctions on Banco Delta Asia and hand over the $24 million. Doing so would only encourage Kim Jong Il in the pursuit of the illicit activities that make it possible for him to pay off the generals who sustain his regime -- and keep his son living it up in Macau.

To Reach For The Moon (NSWK)

By Melinda Liu And Mary Carmichael

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Western analysts still can't say what Beijing was thinking when it shot down one of its aging weather satellites. True, the recent test was a fine show of marksmanship, destroying a refrigerator-size target sailing at orbital speed 500 miles up (as high as U.S. spy satellites). But was it worth risking a new arms race? Was it even worth the mess it caused? The Union of Concerned Scientists says the test left some 2 million pieces of shrapnel in orbit, each one a threat to any country's passing spacecraft. That's why Washington and Moscow gave up such tests decades ago: the space lanes are already littered with too much potentially lethal debris.

The drifting wreckage is a danger not only to other countries' spacecraft but to China's own ambitions for the heavens — which go far beyond blinding the U.S. military. Beijing put its first man into orbit less than four years ago. Today the Chinese are reaching for the moon. The first step, the launching of an unmanned lunar orbiter, is tentatively scheduled for April 17. A three-man mission will orbit the Earth later this year, and a spacewalk is planned for next year. Two years after that, the plan is to put down a lunar rover, followed in 2020 by a craft that will collect lunar samples and bring them home. Eventually Beijing wants to put people on the moon, although the target date remains undisclosed. "Their timetable is absolutely realistic," says Jim Benson, president of SpaceDev, a private space-exploration company in Poway, Calif. "Some of it actually seems a little conservative."

National pride is a big force behind China's moon program, but not the only one. The Chinese are aiming to do more than "just set up a flag or pick up a piece of rock," says Ye Zili of China's Space Science Society. What are they after? A limitless source of clean, safe energy to feed their voracious economy. The stable isotope helium 3 (3He), a potential fuel for nuclear fusion, was first found in moon rocks brought back by the Apollo missions. It is one constituent of the "solar wind" constantly given off by the Sun. The stuff bounces off Earth's magnetic field, but the moon has no magnetic field, and its surface has been soaking up 3He for billions of years. If you could dig it up and put it into a fusion reactor you would get ordinary helium 4 (as in balloons), ordinary hydrogen (as in H2O) and an abundance of radioactivity-free energy. According to Gerald Kulcinski, director of the Fusion Technology Institute at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, a mere 40 tons would be roughly enough to serve America's electrical needs for a year.

Or so the theory goes. The April mission is supposed to learn more about the distribution of 3He on the lunar surface. If significant deposits are found, China's engineers still need to design the world's first lunar mining machines and send them up—while the rest of us shrink in horror at the thought of strip mines on the moon. And meanwhile someone will have to develop a practical reactor. Kulcinski operates what he believes to be the only working model ever built, a device about the size of a basketball that sucks up far more energy than it produces. "We're not even close to breaking even," he says. What would that require? "It couldn't happen for less than tens of millions of dollars and at least 10 to 20 years," he says.

But don't count the Chinese out. "When you have a communist regime in a capitalist network, you have huge amounts of cash and the ability to direct it," says Lawrence Taylor, a director of the University of Tennessee's Planetary Geosciences Institute in Knoxville. "They could run away with this." And if they fail? At least they will have walked on the moon.

Ban Rankles U.N. With Early Moves (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- Ban Ki-moon is off to a rocky start after one month as U.N. secretary-general, with diplomats complaining that his transition is progressing far too slowly and member states resisting his early proposals for restructuring.

U.N. insiders have questioned his early appointments, saying he is not striking out boldly with his own team, but relying too much on insiders from predecessor Kofi Annan's tenure.

The criticisms, which threaten to overshadow a well-received speech at the African Union summit last week in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, have frustrated members of the transition team and worried Mr. Ban's early supporters.

"He has had a long transition period, and we are a little concerned that we still don't know what he is thinking," said one Western diplomat of Mr. Ban's first month in office. "They haven't briefed us on appointments or priorities. Everything is still a priority."

Some diplomats, U.N. elder statesmen and pundits say that Mr. Ban's team of handpicked aides -- many who came with him from the South Korean Foreign Ministry -- has been slow to reach out for advice from seasoned hands.

Permanent U.N. staff members acknowledge that they should have done a better job of explaining the first two planks of Mr. Ban's restructuring plan, which called for folding the U.N. disarmament department into the political-affairs department and splitting the peacekeeping department in two.

Both proposals received a chilly reception from member states last week. And until the structure of those departments is sorted out, officials say, it will be impossible to choose people to lead them.

A coalition of developing nations and Japan already has forced Mr. Ban to back away from his plan to merge the U.N. disarmament department with political affairs and is resisting a plan cut the disarmament agency's staff and have it report directly to Mr. Ban.

In a letter circulated last week, Mr. Ban said there is a "need for a greater role and personal involvement of the secretary-general in the field of disarmament and nonproliferation."

The letter noted that the existing department has produced little of significance.

"The department needs energizing," one senior U.N. official told The Washington Times, noting that a recent conference to review the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty collapsed because no one could agree on substantive steps.

But that is not the way U.N. delegations are hearing the message.

Developing countries resent Mr. Ban's insistence on acting immediately on the proposal, and in a letter to the president of the General Assembly last week, they insisted that changes be discussed in the assembly's budgetary and management committees, "in a manner that is smooth and nondivisive."

DOJ_NMG_0127072

Regional groups will continue to discuss the proposals this week and will meet with senior members of Mr. Ban's staff.

The backlash against the disarmament proposal "was so predictable," said a frustrated U.N. official, who noted that Mr. Ban had been repeatedly counseled to consult with key players to prepare the General Assembly for change.

"There has to be a plan, and you have to ready the battlefield, and this plan was launched before it was ready," the official said.

There is also concern about Mr. Ban's proposal to split the $4 billion peacekeeping department in two, with one side handling political and military affairs and the other administration and support of 18 peace missions.

Setting up a separate department will mean new high-level posts and increased spending that will either be borne by richer governments or gouged out of other budgets. Neither option has gathered much support, despite an acknowledged need to improve the management of the logistically complex peacekeeping department.

Within Mr. Ban's inner circle, there is a sense of disappointment that their message was not better-received. In conversations this week, several senior officials acknowledged that they should have held earlier consultations with key figures and done a better job of explaining their ideas.

UK Battles Europe's Largest Birdflu Outbreak (FT)

By Clive Cookson And John Aglionby

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The UK authorities were on Sunday killing tens of thousands of turkeys in an effort to contain Europe's largest outbreak of H5N1 bird flu on a commercial poultry farm.

A biosecurity zone has also been set up around the Bernard Matthews farm in Suffolk, as a precaution against the deadly virus spreading.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said on Sunday night that the gassing operation, which has already killed 51,000 of the 159,000 turkeys on the farm, would continue on Monday. Their carcasses are being transported in "sealed, leak-proof lorries" for high-temperature rendering at a plant in Staffordshire.

Three security zones have been set up around the farm in Holton, which is 27km south-west of Lowestoft port on the east coast. Stringent precautions are in force in the 3km inner "protection zone" and 10km outer "surveillance zone". In addition a much wider "restricted zone" covers 2,090 sq km; here poultry have to be isolated from wild birds and all movements must be licensed.

The Suffolk H5N1 outbreak, the first to affect poultry in the country, follows a similar infection among geese in Hungary two weeks ago. Before that, Europe had had no reported cases of avian flu since last August. In Asia and Africa too there is an upsurge of international concern about the spread of the disease, after a few months in which bird flu had slipped out of the news media in most parts of the world.

On Saturday the World Health Organisation confirmed Nigeria's first human death from bird flu – a 22-year-old woman.

In Japan, the National Institute of Animal Health said the country's latest bird flu outbreak, its fourth this year, was caused by the H5N1 virus. Japanese Authorities have already ordered the killing of 93,000 chickens on a farm in Miyazaki prefecture on the southern island of Kyushu.

But the worst affected country remains Indonesia, where at least five people have died already this year, all but one in and around Jakarta. The government last month ordered the slaughter of the tens of millions of unlicensed backyard birds in the capital and the two surrounding provinces.

David Nabarro, the United Nations's bird flu coordinator, on Sunday urged Indonesia to declare a national emergency to fight H5N1 virus, which is endemic in poultry across much of the country. This "focuses the minds of everybody into understanding what's going on", he told the Financial Times in an interview during a visit to Jakarta.

Dr Nabarro was heartened by the new "real momentum to scale up the effort to deal with bird flu" in Indonesia. But he warned ministers against repeating recent statements that some previously infected areas were now bird flu-free.

Brussels said on Sunday that the the UK had followed the correct procedures in dealing with the outbreak and had informed it in good time. The European Commission will on Monday formally endorse the security cordon established by the UK. Then on Tuesday government vets from all 27 member states will discuss how to deal with the return of bird flu.

An EU spokeswoman said she did not expect any internal or external pressure for a trade ban. “Last year there were 14 outbreaks in different member states and no calls for import bans. Trading partners have confidence in our measures,” she said.

French Blacks: J'accuse Racism (WT)

By Elizabeth Bryant

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

PARIS -- France's comfortable image of itself as a colorblind society -- already weakened by race riots in 2005 -- received a further blow last week when a new survey found that a majority of French blacks believe they face discrimination in daily life.

Coinciding with a disturbing television documentary about living as a black person in France, the survey by the TNS-Sofres polling agency is the first of its kind and is galvanizing public debate just weeks before presidential election.

"This is going to change things," predicted Patrick Lozes, president of the Representative Council of Black Associations, an advocacy group that commissioned the survey. "Until now, blacks have never been counted in this country. And I have always said that blacks who aren't counted don't count."

There is no legal way to count France's black population. Census-takers and other government statisticians are barred by law from compiling figures based on religion or race. But the poll, which appears lawful, suggests France's cherished values of "egalite" and "fraternite" remain elusive goals for the nation's estimated 5 million blacks.

Of the 13,000 blacks surveyed, 61 percent said they experienced at least one racist incident within the past year. More than one in 10 said they were frequently the target of racism that ranged from verbal aggression to difficulty finding housing or jobs.

"The findings don't surprise me at all," said Mouloud Aounit, president of the Movement Against Racism and for Friendship Between Peoples, an anti-discrimination group. "Racism exists in our daily life. Look at the Senate, the National Assembly, regional councils. Ethnic representation is totally absent."

"Racism isn't daily, but I face it from time to time," agreed security guard Jacques Bassong, 36, who moved to France from his native Cameroon in 1979. "A little bit at work, at government offices, even in the stores. Some French are more racist than others, but on average, it's bearable."

Until now, much of the hand-wringing about minorities has focused on France's estimated 5 million ethnic Arabs.

The seething anger among young "beurs," French-born children of North African immigrants, grabbed the spotlight in the fall of 2005, when riots spread across France. But it was the accidental deaths of two black African teenagers, reportedly while fleeing police, which sparked the violence in the first place.

Today, only 10 of 577 National Assembly members are black, and all were elected from overseas territories. Blacks remain similarly underrepresented in the private sector, being less likely than whites to find jobs and to be promoted when they do.

Last week, France's Canal+ channel aired a two-part documentary, "In the Skin of a Black," a local spin on the U.S. reality series "Black. White," which aired early last year on the FX cable-TV network.

The French program tracked a series of small and large humiliations faced by members of a white French family that, using heavy makeup, had swapped places with a black family.

"It's important to show to our society what it doesn't see or know," said Mr. Lozes, who wants the government to adopt affirmative-action policies.

French politicians stumping in this year's presidential and legislative races are beginning to grasp the potential power of the minority vote, particularly since a voter-registration drive has been stunningly successful in many low-income areas where minorities live.

Mr. Lozes' organization has not ruled out fielding a black presidential candidate for the coming election. But France has no nationally known prospect comparable to Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, on the horizon.

DOJ_NMG_0127074

"France is in no way ready to elect a Mohammed ... as president of the Republic, unfortunately," anti-discrimination activist Mr. Aounit said.

Seeing What We Want To See In Qaddafi (NYT)

By Hisham Matar

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Paris

SINCE 2003, Libyan diplomats have been hard at work convincing the West that Libya is no longer interested in amassing weapons of mass destruction, blowing up Western airplanes or covertly financing armed movements abroad. Presenting this new face has been largely effective: sanctions, in place since 1982, have been lifted; Libya has been removed from the United States roster of terrorist nations; and the list of international trade agreements continues to grow.

As part of this public relations drive, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi and his officials have been keen to reassure Libyan critics that it is now safe to return to Libya. Unsurprisingly, the vast majority of the hundreds of thousands of exiled Libyans have not returned. However, one did: Idrees Boufayed, a doctor living and working in Switzerland. On Sept. 30, 2006 he returned to Libya for the first time in 16 years. And on Nov. 5, he disappeared.

Throughout its 37-year rule, the Qaddafi government has found as many reasons to arrest its citizens as Libyans have found to abandon their country. Thousands of critics of the Qaddafi regime, inside and outside Libya, have either disappeared or been assassinated. My father, the political dissident Jaballa Matar, disappeared from his home in Cairo in March 1990. We still do not know whether he is alive or dead.

Astonishingly, on Dec. 29 — 55 days after his arrest — Dr. Boufayed was released. The Libyan authorities offered no explanation for his detention. And Dr. Boufayed, who had been a regular contributor to dissident Web sites, has remained uncharacteristically silent ever since. This change in behavior is not unusual: almost all political dissidents fortunate enough to be released have given up their criticism of the regime. The machinery of Colonel Qaddafi's government is as effective as ever.

Now that the United States has incorporated the Libyan regime into its so-called war on terrorism, it is difficult to see what political pressure it can exert on the Libyan government to reform. Western governments have had the power to effect change in Libya only as long as the dictator's government has hungered for the West's acceptance. The short-sighted paranoia with which the war on terrorism has been managed has weakened any moral advantage the United States might once have had.

The cards surrendered were hugely undervalued: the United States could have compelled the Libyan dictatorship to do much more than just hand over its outdated weapons of mass destruction and compensate the families of the victims of the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jet over Lockerbie, Scotland, with $2.7 billion — a sum that would be earned back in trade deals during the first week after sanctions were lifted.

Although America has highlighted the issue of human rights in its negotiations with Libya, none of the countries that now profit from a close association with the Libyan leadership has demanded the release, or even the trial, of the silenced political prisoners who crowd Libya's prisons. No country made it a condition in negotiations that Libya investigate the countless cases of the "disappeared." None of them compelled the Qaddafi government even to address the massacre at Abu Salim prison, where, one night in June 1996, more than 1,000 political prisoners were shot dead.

In its 2003 negotiations with Libya, the United States lost a golden opportunity to link the improvement of Libya's dismal human rights situation to its acceptance into the international community. Indeed, it can be argued that the United States has instead helped worsen human rights in Libya. It has not only defended torture, which has softened the critical gaze on Libya's own practice of torture, but also encouraged the practice by sending Libyans suspected of terrorism to Tripoli for "interrogation."

Furthermore, Colonel Qaddafi has used the new panic — that the Islamist bogeyman will imminently shroud the world under his dark beard — as an excuse to silence the regime's critics. That tactic has fomented rather than curbed religious extremism in Libya as elsewhere.

The impression that a bloodless battle has been won in Libya rests on an inflated notion of the threat the country, even with its rusty weapons of mass destruction, ever posed to the West. It misreads an act of diplomatic negligence toward the rights of the Libyan people as a victory for world peace.

Colonel Qaddafi deserves sole credit for Libya's foreign policy U-turn. He has never found it necessary to devote himself to a single political ideology; his only consistent policy has been to guard his personal political survival. The United States and Britain understand this, but have only exploited it for their own myopic objectives, forgetting that Libya's political development can lie only with its people.

A Palace For Sudan (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Last week China's leader, Hu Jintao, provided Sudan with an interest-free loan to build a presidential palace. With that gesture, Hu demonstrated his contempt for the Western understanding of the world -- and for Western policy toward his own country.

Sudan, you will recall, is the scene of the Darfur genocide. Since the killing began three years ago, the United States and its allies have flown in food and medicines, provided logistical help and money for a token African peacekeeping force, and done their best to isolate the Sudanese regime, which orchestrates the massacres. They have done this not because they have a selfish interest in Darfur but because tossing babies into bonfires is a crime against humanity.

In the run-up to Hu's visit to Sudan on Friday and Saturday, there were hopes that the Chinese leader would back the West's Sudan policy.

China's diplomats are forever reassuring the world about their country's "peaceful rise," and Hu duly expressed support for an expanded peacekeeping force in Darfur. But everything else about his visit demonstrated the gap between Chinese and Western priorities.

Hu called on nations to "respect the sovereignty of Sudan." But since the end of the Cold War, the Western view of sovereignty has grown increasingly contingent. If a nation slaughters its civilians (think Rwanda, Kosovo), harbors terrorists (Afghanistan) or refuses to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors (yes, Iraq), it forfeits its right to sovereignty. It may not be invaded, but it certainly can expect to face sanctions.

Sudan, by these standards, is an easy candidate for sanctions. But China's talk of "sovereignty" is code for the opposite policy. As well as paying for a presidential palace, Hu used his trip to cancel $80 million of Sudanese debt, to announce a plan to build a railway line and to visit an oil refinery that China partly owns, basking in the fact that 80 percent of Sudan's oil goes to his country.

Hu's visit was a statement that, in the Chinese view of the world, the principle of sovereignty trumps even the most appalling human rights abuses: It brushed aside the memory of the Rwandan genocide and the Holocaust. But at the same time, Hu was saying more than that. He was advancing an understanding of modernization that the West discarded 15 years ago.

By pursuing commercial ties with Sudan, Hu was implicitly saying that economic development comes first and that political development is unimportant. This was once the view of Western development organizations, which financed projects in health, education, infrastructure and so on -- but steered clear of human rights, corruption and anything else that could be deemed "political." But in the early 1990s, the Western approach changed. Development experts pointed out that independent courts and newspapers help to limit corruption and so make economic development possible. In the absence of minimal political accountability, aid money is stolen. Rather than helping Africa's poor, it is siphoned off to pay for presidential palaces.

China is not financing a presidential palace by mistake; it is doing so deliberately. It is not financing just any presidential palace; it has chosen a president so odious that his fellow African leaders hold their noses at him. But this gesture is only the tip of the iceberg. To read the accounts of Hu's Africa visit in China's People's Daily is to recall Western development thinking of a half a century ago. "From 1995 to 2003, China administered 43 sessions of the 'Advanced Education and Scientific Research Program' in 21 African countries," the paper's online version crowed yesterday. Development, in this conception, is all about technical transfers. Politics plays no part.

This Chinese understanding of development threatens to undermine the Western one. Western development aid is increasingly linked to measures of good governance, and investment from Western corporations and banks comes with conditions designed to ensure that ordinary people benefit. This promising advance cannot succeed if African dictators can ignore Western conditions with Chinese assistance.

But then there is an even more disturbing question: What does China's policy toward Sudan say about the West's policy toward China? The West is engaging with China on the theory that economic modernization will bring political modernization as well; otherwise, the West would merely be assisting the development of a communist adversary. China's Sudan policy is an assertion that this link between economic and political modernization is by no means inevitable, even in the extreme case. You can construct oil refineries, educate scientists, build ambitious new railways -- and simultaneously pursue a policy of genocide.

Bangladesh On The Brink (WSJ)

By C. Christine Fair And Sumit Ganguly

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

With the world's attention focused on whether accountable government can take root in Iraq, the democratic life blood of a much larger Muslim country -- Bangladesh -- is seeping away with hardly a murmur from the international community. Home to 147 million people and once considered a stable, secular Muslim democracy, Bangladesh is becoming a de facto military-controlled state.

Earlier this month, scheduled elections were cancelled and a state of emergency was imposed when the caretaker government stepped down under military pressure. The government is now headed by Fakhruddin Ahmed, a former World Bank official, along with 10 advisors and no functioning parliament. Mr. Ahmed has pledged to hold elections soon, but all indications suggest that the army is in control. While some foreign and domestic observers are optimistic that the army can clean up the corruption and dysfunctional political structure, this is wishful -- even dangerous -- thinking. The international community must act immediately to compel Dhaka to lift the state of emergency, restore full rights, withdraw the army from the political arena, and establish a specific date for credible elections.

Some 60,000 troops have been deployed in recent weeks and more than 2,000 people have been detained. With a history of prolonged military rule since gaining independence from Pakistan, the army's political adventurism is unlikely to rehabilitate Bangladesh's feeble democracy. The international community has not learned from Pervez Musharraf's similar experiment in Pakistan. Under Gen. Musharraf, democracy has not flourished and the political parties have not become more competent.

The roots of Bangladesh' problems run deep. The political system has been destroyed by an acrimonious power struggle between the Bangladesh National Party, led by the most recent prime minister, Khaleda Zia, and the opposition Awami League, led by the former PM, Sheikh Hasina Wajed. Both have prioritized personal gain above the needs of the state. They have forged Faustian bargains with Islamist groups to maximize their chances of victory. Since the 2001 elections, Islamist parties have become king-makers and enjoy some ministerial positions, which are not earned by their electoral strength. Some of these parties have been linked to terrorist groups.

These terrorists have targeted secular artists and intellectuals, Sufi shrines, the minuscule Ahamaddiya community, and key members of the opposition. In August 2005, within an hour's span, Islamist militants detonated hundreds of small bombs across the country and demanded that Bangladesh become an Islamic state based on Shariah. While some of the most notorious Islamist militants were detained, key members of Harkat-ul-Jihad-Bangladesh and Jagrata Muslim Janata Bangladesh remain at large.

Bangladesh is responsive to public exhortation and receives significant international aid. Donor countries can achieve leverage if they coordinate and render some forms of assistance conditional. Multilateral agencies can pressure Dhaka by convening high-profile meetings to discuss democracy. Some bilateral programs, such as U.S. aid to security forces, are subject to the provisions of the Leahy amendment, which restricts aid when there are human-rights abuses. Public discussions of the Leahy requirements may exert pressure on those institutions that value U.S. security programs. Finally, the U.S. and the Commonwealth (of which Bangladesh is a member) have a suite of punitive measures should there be martial law. The army must be reminded of this to discourage any extraconstitutional action -- and to teach it that the suppression of democracy cannot be a cost-free business.

Russian Retail Politics (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

MOSCOW -- The government recently outlawed foreign migrant workers at Russian retail markets as of April 1. A similar restriction cuts out middlemen by requiring that at least half of all salespeople sell their own produce. The official rationale is that this legislation protects domestic producers. But this politically motivated, hasty decision is more likely to harm Russian consumers and further exacerbate the situation of migrant workers.

The affected markets are vast premises where salesmen pay for counter space and offer produce and other goods such as clothes. Buyers looking for lower prices or fresher produce than in conventional stores find such foods as homegrown or imported fruit and vegetables, homemade preserves, cottage cheese, pickles, meat and fish.

Given Russia's climate, throughout most of the year vegetables and especially fruit are imported from warmer parts of the world. But the law seeks to impose the same pattern on all regions, even though the products and markets in southern Russian and areas beyond the polar circle are not at all alike. Without the choices provided by middlemen, diet options in many places will be reduced to carrots, potatoes, cabbage and little else.

The new regulations were probably a reaction to growing ethnic intolerance, which took an alarming turn late last summer when a riot in the northwestern town of Kondopoga forced non-Slavic residents to flee, and their businesses were looted and burned. The Russian government is concerned about controlling such hostility, especially in an election year, when any sign of autonomous activism is regarded as a potential threat to the political status quo.

Propagation of tolerance is only a marginal policy for the Kremlin -- it would hardly be efficient given the current degree of xenophobia -- so instead it opted to co-opt the spreading nationalist sentiments. In October, President Vladimir Putin called for "additional measures to improve trade in . . . retail markets in order to protect the interests of the Russian manufacturers and . . . the native population of Russia." He reiterated this concern, in a more balanced form, in his annual news conference on Thursday, saying that "labor market issues . . . have not always been settled to the benefit of Russia's own people, its own citizens."

By this time, however, government monitoring had found that migrant workers at the markets were not a national issue: They were in high proportion to natives only in Moscow and the Far East.

This is not surprising, since those regions are the two that experience workforce shortages, making migrant workers a necessity. In Far East areas near China, this need is filled by Chinese workers, many of whom cross the border to sell cheap goods.

The new regulations have already pushed Chinese traders to sell their stock at catchpenny prices and leave. And local news reports indicate that the markets are staying empty: "The benefit of the new regulation looks vague. But the disadvantages are evident," reported a newspaper in Sakhalin, in the Far East. "For the time being there's no replacement for the cheap Chinese goods and southern fruit."

A Moscow official echoed those concerns: "Do we want to leave the Muscovites without tangerines, raisins and dried apricots?"

Other problems are expected because the law enables employers to cancel contracts with migrant workers without a court decision. Significant numbers of migrant workers could find themselves jobless. Meanwhile, Muscovites are unlikely to want the low-paying, menial jobs of market salesmen. "The citizens of Russia don't wait in lines to take those 28 to 30 thousand jobs in market trade that [the new law] will require. This is a serious vacuum that will have to be filled before April 1," the Moscow official said.

These consequences should have been obvious before the law was enacted. But there wasn't much time -- or desire -- for discussion, as is the case when an initiative originates with the president. After Putin asked his ministers to protect native manufacturers at the markets, the cabinet issued a regulation restricting foreigners' presence in retail trade; in less than three months a bill was put together, passed by both chambers of parliament and signed into law.

Such actions corrode what respect for law and lawmaking is left here. Local officials will probably think of ways around the restrictions, and some are sure to take advantage of new opportunities for graft. Still others expect that the absurdity of some provisions and the damage the law is inflicting on consumers will lead to its revision. Indeed, shortly after the new regulations -- drafted by his own ministry at the president's urging -- took effect, German Gref, the minister of economic development and trade, said a full ban on the employment of migrant foreign workers may be postponed.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Another CIA Abduction, Germany Has An Uneasy Role (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

HAMBURG -- The decision by Munich prosecutors to press charges against CIA counterterrorism operatives for kidnapping a German citizen, Khaled el-Masri, won widespread applause last week from German politicians and the public. "The great ally is not allowed to simply send its thugs out into Europe's streets," lectured the Munich newspaper Sueddeutsche Zeitung.

But there has been an awkward silence and no prosecutions in the parallel case of another German citizen, Mohammed Haydar Zammar, who was also covertly abducted in a CIA-sponsored mission after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The difference: German agents were directly involved in the Zammar case, providing crucial information to the CIA about his travels and making a secret trip to Syria to interrogate him after he landed in prison there.

Zammar vanished from public view five years ago but resurfaced last fall in a Syrian courtroom, where he stands accused of training in al-Qaeda camps and faces the death penalty. After insisting for years that they couldn't confirm his whereabouts, German diplomats in Damascus have scrambled to provide him with a defense attorney and consular assistance.

Unlike Masri, a car salesman from Bavaria who was grabbed in an apparent case of mistaken identity, Zammar had previously drawn scrutiny from German and U.S. investigators for his role in the Hamburg cell that planned the Sept. 11 hijackings. German authorities have never assembled enough evidence to charge him with a crime. But given his association with the Hamburg group, few people in Germany have been willing to take up his cause or question the legality of how he was abducted.

"He's seen as being in a different category because there's the impression that he's a bad guy, and he's not around to defend himself," said Cem Ozdemir, a German legislator in the European Parliament and member of a committee that has investigated CIA activities in Europe. "Even if he is a bad guy, he doesn't deserve to be tortured."

Details of the German role in Zammar's disappearance have emerged gradually in recent months as legislative panels in Berlin and Brussels have conducted investigations into CIA counterterrorism operations in Europe.

German officials have said that they were not directly involved in Zammar's seizure and did not know where he had been taken until June 2002, when The Washington Post first reported that he had been arrested in Morocco and secretly transferred to Syria at the behest of the CIA. But the legislative probes have revealed that German federal police made the abduction possible by forwarding details of Zammar's travel plans to U.S. agents.

In addition, German officials have admitted that several German intelligence operatives and investigators went on a secret mission to Damascus in November 2002 to interrogate Zammar. According to lawmakers in Berlin who are reviewing the case, the Germans gained access to Zammar only after cutting a deal with the Syrian government to drop a criminal investigation into a suspected Syrian espionage ring based in southern Germany.

German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble defended the interrogation of Zammar as proper and legitimate. But he drew heavy criticism from other lawmakers when he suggested that German intelligence agents might use information shared by other countries, such as Syria, even if it was obtained as a result of torture.

Guel Pinar, a Hamburg lawyer who has represented Zammar and his family, said it was apparent German officials knew in advance that the CIA had targeted him for "extraordinary rendition," an extralegal tactic under which Islamic radicals have been abducted and interrogated at secret sites overseas.

"Clearly, the Germans at the very least were guilty of being an accessory in terms of his rendition to Syria," Pinar said in an interview. "They knew what they were doing when they gave his travel dates to the Americans. Why else would they do that?"

German prosecutors have not announced any criminal inquiries into Zammar's disappearance, even though his family reported him missing five years ago. Pinar said she has drafted a civil lawsuit on his behalf against the German government. But she said his wife, Rabab Banhaoui, has decided against filing it, for fear it would worsen his situation in Syria.

German authorities have made few statements about the case. The German Foreign Ministry did not respond to several requests for an interview. The German Embassy in Damascus, which has been monitoring Zammar's closed-door trial, declined to comment.

Zammar reemerged last October, when a European Union official monitoring trials in Damascus saw him in a state security court and notified the German Embassy. If not for the chance encounter, Zammar might have remained out of sight forever, Pinar said. "No one in the world would have known," she said.

A spokeswoman for the European Commission delegation in Syria declined to comment, calling the case a "highly sensitive subject."

Zammar, 45, was born in Syria but emigrated to Germany in 1972 and obtained citizenship there. Syrian authorities have charged him with membership in the Muslim Brotherhood, a fundamentalist group that is banned in the country, and with visiting al-Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan. It is unclear whether he is charged with committing any crimes in Syria.

A parliamentary committee is expected to review the German government's handling of Zammar's case later this month. One question is whether information obtained by German interrogators is being used against him in court by Syrian prosecutors, a particularly sensitive issue since he faces the death penalty, which is banned in Germany.

"It is a big problem, I believe, for Germany and the federal government," said Hans-Christian Stroebele, a member of the committee from the Greens party. "It's the duty of a state to help its citizens. But clearly in Zammar's case, the state did not do this."

Former inmates in Syria, including Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who was similarly targeted for rendition by the CIA but later released, have said that Zammar was kept in a tiny cell in a special prison wing. They said prisoners were regularly tortured, and that Zammar -- who tipped the scales at 300 pounds when he lived in Hamburg -- had lost about a third of his weight.

Congress, Spying & The Rule Of Law (PHDN)

By Shayana Kadidal & Ari Melber

Philadelphia Daily News, February 5, 2007

AFTER illegally spying on Americans without the required warrants for several years, the Bush administration is claiming a sudden change of heart.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recently announced that the administration's domestic-spying program will stop bypassing judicial oversight. Instead, it will submit domestic surveillance to review by a federal intelligence court, as required by law.

But before anyone celebrates the "good news" of an attorney general saying he will stop breaking the law, Congress must confront the administration's record of illegal spying and ensure that surveillance is truly back within the rule of law.

This is a big challenge because the administration spent the last six years undermining the traditional tools Congress uses to supervise intelligence by ignoring the law, stalling court oversight and declaring that warrantless spying would continue.

For Congress, that means there is little point in passing another law to restate rules that the administration is openly defying. Public hearings would also be ineffective for reforming or exposing the classified program. So what can the new Congress do?

The only way to bring spying back under the rule of law is for Congress to strengthen the branch of government that makes the law work: the courts.

Unfortunately, the courts, with their traditional deference to the political branches, have been slow to tackle this problem.

There are more than 70 spying lawsuits pending against the National Security Agency or phone companies, but few results so far. One federal district court did rule on the NSA program in August, finding it unconstitutional and issuing an injunction to ban it. But the administration has aggressively appealed and stalled all these cases - and the injunction was stayed on appeal.

Several other leading cases were transferred at the 11th hour into a new court, wiping out almost a year of work. (Justice Department officials claim the cases are "moot" because of the attorney general's announcement. But even if warrantless spying has ceased, plaintiffs are suing for harm caused by past conduct.)

At this rate, the domestic spying program may not even reach the Supreme Court before President Bush leaves office. That's probably no accident.

Yet there is much Congress can do to ensure swift and meaningful judicial oversight. First, there is precedent for providing fast-track review for important cases. Congress can require that the pending cases get accelerated review by either the appeals courts or the Supreme Court. Although the Supreme Court usually gets to choose whether to hear a case, Congress can make the right of appeal mandatory.

Of all the lawsuits, only one offers evidence that the NSA listened to the plaintiffs' calls. But that's because the government has tried to classify and conceal all potential evidence, and then claim that because plaintiffs do not have proof that their own calls were illegally intercepted, the suits are "frivolous" and should be dismissed.

But many challengers reasonably argue that they were harmed by being forced to change their behavior by the news of the NSA's warrantless spying program. (Government whistleblowers won't call reporters, for example, once they know the government is listening to calls with no court oversight.)

Congress can address this problem by making it clear that Americans who were compelled to change their activities because of past illegal surveillance have standing to sue. Guaranteeing a day in court for such challenges would ensure that the NSA doesn't get off the hook on a technicality.

Finally, the new Congress must grapple with the administration's expansive assertions of the "state secrets privilege" to pre-empt legal challenges.

Most spying challengers had to spend months fighting the administration's demand that every case be dismissed without any court proceedings because the program was supposedly "too secret" for judges to consider - even in a closed setting. At least one court has already dismissed a challenge to the NSA program on those grounds.

But today the courts are well-equipped to hear cases with classified information - they routinely do so during criminal trials of former spies. Yet the Bush administration has invoked the secrets claim more than any other administration in history.

To ensure that the courts actually hear the spying cases, Congress should pass a statute curtailing the "state secrets privilege" with precise boundaries to prevent further misuse.

OUR SYSTEM OF checks and balances is supposed to enable each branch of government to assert itself by checking the others. Yet to check President Bush's spying, Congress cannot simply repeat itself by passing another wiretapping statute, or hope the administration's latest announcement will end the abuse.

Congress must strive for the higher ambition of protecting the rule of law itself by empowering the courts to swiftly enforce the laws Congress passed - and review the conduct of the president who broke them.

Wrong On Habeas Corpus (WT)

By Nat Hentoff

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Considering the state of the world, and the divisiveness in this nation, I am seldom startled these days by news from Washington. But an exception was the appearance of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a Jan. 18 hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee in which he stated: "There is no express grant of habeas (corpus) in the Constitution... The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States is hereby guaranteed or assured the right of habeas corpus... there's (only) a prohibition against taking it away."

This is an astonishing dismissal by our chief law enforcement officer of the oldest fundamental right in Anglo-Saxon law that even precedes the Magna Carta of 1215.

Alberto Gonzales is dead wrong.

The Magna Carta has resonated for centuries and states: "No free man shall be taken or imprisoned... except by... the law of the land." In 1679, Parliament passed the Habeas Corpus Act that also extended the "Great Writ" to any citizen arbitrarily imprisoned "beyond the seas." In our country, as the Constitution was being proposed and debated, Thomas Jefferson, then our envoy to Paris, wrote to James Madison insisting that habeas corpus be imbedded in the body of the Constitution as it was. Jefferson even objected that habeas could be suspended during an insurrection or invasion. He didn't want any tampering with habeas corpus. He lost on that clause.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist Papers, wrote that "the practice of arbitrary imprisonments, have been, in all ages, the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny." Hamilton cited the 18th-century English jurist, William Blackstone, whose commentaries are still referred to in courses on the law: "Confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten... is a... dangerous engine of arbitrary government," said Blackstone.

Hamilton was convinced that habeas corpus was such a strong anchor of our rights that he claimed a separate Bill of Rights (the first 10 amendments to the Constitution) would not be necessary. Madison and George Mason overruled him on that.

I would recommend urgently that Mr. Gonzales read the chapter on habeas corpus in professor Leonard W. Levy's "Origins of the Bill of Rights" (Yale University Press, 2001). For many years, Mr. Levy's many books and articles gave given me a continuing graduate-school course on why we are Americans. In "Origins," he also summonsSir William Blackstone into the 21st century, noting that in his 18th-century "Commentaries": "Blackstonedescribed habeas corpus as 'the most celebrated writ in the English law' and available to 'every subject of the kingdom that superseded all other proceedings and should not be evaded or delayed.' " Surely, Mr. Gonzales must have heard of Blackstone during his law-school years as well as our celebrated Chief Justice John Marshall, who rooted habeas corpus into American law. In the 1807 case, Ex Parte Bollman, Marshall congratulated Congress for enacting a system of federal courts that thereby gave judges the authority to issue writs of habeas corpus "this great constitutional privilege." It could be that Mr. Gonzales is critical of Justice Marshall as "an activist judge" because he established the power of the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional through judicial review. But Justice Marshall's opinions on this and habeas corpus remain the law of the land. Accordingly, habeas is indeed guaranteed to every individual in the United States, contrary to the attorney general's statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

I would also suggest to Mr. Gonzales that he look into the chapter on habeas corpus in the four-volume "Encyclopedia of the American Constitution" (Macmillan 1986) of which Leonard Levy was the editor in chief. The chapter emphasizes that "a measure of the state of liberty in the United States is that so much of our constitutional liberties can be taken for granted." It continues: An essential definition of our freedom "from arbitrary authority" is habeas corpus and "the existence of the Great Writ precisely in its taken-for-granted quality plays a major role in supporting and reinforcing the conditions of freedom."

It is a pity that the chief law-enforcement officer of the United States not only does not take habeas corpus for granted, but says that it is not guaranteed to all of us. If our attorney general doesn't know that, consider how many students throughout our school systems may also be uneducated in the Great Writ -- and its history. How would the president do in an unannounced quiz on habeas corpus?

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rebellion Growing As States Challenge A Federal Law To Standardize Driver's Licenses (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Opposition among state officials is turning into an open revolt against a federal law calling for the creation of standardized driver's licenses nationwide that are meant to be less vulnerable to fraud.

Maine legislators started off the rebellion late last month by passing a nonbinding resolution that rejected the law, called the Real ID Act, which Congress passed in 2005. They said that it would cost the state $185 million to put into place and that instead of making Maine's residents more secure, it would leave them more vulnerable to identity theft.

Since then, legislatures in five states — Georgia, Montana, New Mexico, Washington and Wyoming — have voted in committee or on the floor of one chamber to move similar legislation ahead. The bill adopted in a 99-to-1 vote by the Montana House of Representatives would go furthest, ordering state officials there to ignore the federal law.

Unless the federal law is revised, any state that defies it will risk causing major inconvenience for its residents, as noncompliant licenses will not be accepted as a proof of identification at airports, federal buildings or when applying for federal benefits.

What state officials are hoping is that Congress will repeal or modify the law, or at least provide some of the billions of dollars the states claim it will cost to establish the new licensing system nationwide.

The campaign features an odd mix of liberal Democrats, offended by a measure in the law that would effectively block illegal immigrants from getting federally compliant driver's licenses, and conservative Republicans, who see the law as an affront to civil liberties and to states' rights.

"This is a frontal assault on our freedoms," said State Representative Jim Guest of Missouri, a Republican who said he was working with more than two dozen states to pass laws opposing the federal statute. "One state standing alone is not enough. But we are already gaining strong momentum here."

Some states are not going as far as others. Vermont passed a law that would not defy the federal statute but called for more federal financial assistance in carrying it out.

Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, who led the effort in Congress to pass the 2005 law, as well as top officials at the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, said they were disturbed by the growing signs of a revolt.

"Certainly, it is a threat," Mr. Sensenbrenner said Saturday in an interview.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, wrote a letter last week to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking him what would happen to the federal program if individual states opted out.

Mr. Sensenbrenner attributed the growing resistance to the department's tardiness in publishing rules telling the states what they must do under the law, which calls for new licenses to be issued starting in May 2008. He said that had led to misconceptions about the program's costs and vulnerabilities. Mr. Sensenbrenner estimated that the real costs for states nationwide would not exceed about $100 million.

Federal officials acknowledge that with the final regulations not coming out until this summer, it is likely that some states will not be ready to begin issuing licenses on schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0127085

The Real ID Act requires states to confirm that documents submitted to get driver's licenses — like a birth certificate or a passport — are legitimate and that the applicants are in the United States legally. States will also have to check a linked database of state licensing data to make sure that applicants do not already have a license in another state and that they have not been banned from driving elsewhere.

The law effectively requires that all existing licenses be replaced by 2013.

The push to pass the law grew out of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, when some of the hijackers used driver's licenses as identification when they checked in for their flights.

Stewart A. Baker, an assistant secretary of homeland security, said opponents of the new law should remember this recent history.

"I understand there is a sense that states are being asked to do something and not being given the resources by the federal government," Mr. Baker said. "But people are forgetting that this was a 9/11 commission recommendation and a recommendation for a very good reason."

But Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union said the states were raising legitimate issues. The law sets a national standard for machine-readability, most likely using bar-code-like strips where information about the owner can be scanned. This may tempt merchants to collect the data and use it for marketing purposes, Mr. Steinhardt said. The linked national database of all licensing information will also be a target for identity theft, he said.

"Real ID is a real nightmare on a number of fronts," Mr. Steinhardt said.

Lawrence Halloran, deputy minority staff director at the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the growing protests were a way for states to try to force more federal aid for the cost of issuing the new licenses.

"They are saying, 'Pay me,' " he said.

Senators Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, and John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, introduced a bill in December calling for the repeal of the Real ID Act.

The bill has yet to be reintroduced in the new session, with a spokesman for Mr. Akaka saying last week that he was likely to wait to see the draft rules that the Homeland Security Department publishes for public comment before deciding whether to push the cause.

Homeland Security Attracts More Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a move last summer that wasn't made public, the Department of Homeland Security was tapped to join an elite group of seven agencies that would form the heart of America's spy network.

It was a surprise choice by John Negroponte, then National Intelligence director, who selected DHS to join the Intelligence Program Managers Group over more-established entities such as the Army and State Department. That decision perhaps had less to do with the department's mission and capabilities than with the reputation of its chief intelligence officer, Charles E. Allen.

Many officials say Mr. Allen has made progress in trying to transform the 22 squabbling agencies that comprise DHS into better data collectors. But as the intelligence system comes under scrutiny with the expected appointment of a new Director of National Intelligence, DHS and Mr. Allen's efforts there are coming in for a hard look.

Mr. Allen's nearly five decades at the CIA earned him the nickname "The Legend." But his experience has yet to turn DHS and its constituent agencies into top-notch intelligence collectors or analysts, say both DHS's congressional overseers and officials in the department. Since taking over in 2005, he has faced problems such as turf battles with other agencies, staffing issues and pushback from some of his agents.

Mr. Allen's success or failure will be pivotal in determining whether the department, created after the 9/11 attacks, will be a counterterrorist bulwark or a bureaucratic backwater.

Security officials who know Mr. Allen, 74 years old, said it is hard for anyone with experience in the business to dismiss him. "Most of the people he deals with today were trained and shaped by him," said Cresencio Arcos, a retired U.S. ambassador and a former director of international affairs for DHS.

Mr. Allen's career spanned most of the Cold War, in every aspect of the Central Intelligence Agency, from case manager to agent. He also worked as a senior intelligence official on Iraq, Iran and North Korea.

His vision is to turn the department into the prime source of border intelligence, critical infrastructure information and global supply-chain data, and into the conduit through which the government shares information with state and local authorities.

One of his innovations has been sending intelligence officers to state and local "fusion centers." These centers, in 43 locations around the U.S., seek to blend law-enforcement information and intelligence analysis collected at the local level to share with federal officials. He now has officers stationed in 12 centers and expects to have a presence in the remaining centers by the end of next year.

He also established an initiative on the nation's southwest border, sending intelligence officers to El Paso, Texas, to support border and customs agents, and local law-enforcement agencies.

Last week, Rep. Bennie Thompson (D., Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, took Mr. Allen and the department to task for allegedly trying to exclude state and local police from participating in a new federal intelligence unit called the Interagency Threat Assessment and Coordination Group. The group would be based outside DHS at the National Counterterrorism Center and would share information about possible terrorist threats to the country -- a job now done exclusively by DHS.

A number of state officials as well as police officers say that until now Mr. Allen has been working more to control their involvement than to include it. For months, big-city police chiefs have stressed that they are on the frontlines of counterterrorism efforts, needing access to real-time threat information to be able to respond to the possibility of an attack. Acting Washington D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier told senators two weeks ago that DHS policy of not sharing threat information unless the threat is "imminent" does not work because imminent is "too late."

Intelligence officials say Mr. Allen sees DHS representing the interests of state and local officials and that including them in the unit would undermine DHS, by making the department's input redundant or unnecessary. Mr. Allen says he isn't opposed to including police in the unit, which is due to start work today, after it becomes better established.

DHS has faced tension with other agencies since its creation. Senior counterterrorism officials from rival agencies routinely criticize DHS intelligence about terrorist threats and suspicious activities in the U.S.

Mr. Allen agrees that DHS intelligence reports have relied heavily on information from other agencies but that his focus recently on core areas such as border security is beginning to result in more unique DHS information making its way into the president's daily briefings.

Last week, Mr. Allen met with Mike McConnell, the retired admiral chosen by President Bush to succeed Mr. Negroponte as the country's spy chief, to explain why the department deserved a seat in the Intelligence Program Managers Group. The group meets weekly with the director of National Intelligence to discuss strategy and chart the direction of foreign and domestic intelligence operations. The other members are the CIA, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the National Security Administration, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the National Reconnaissance Office and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency.

Adm. McConnell, who couldn't be reached to comment, was taking stock of institutions he was inheriting. Mr. Allen said he argued that the department -- which has fewer than 1,000 intelligence officers and a budget smaller than most local-police departments -- has a unique mission to prepare for terrorism. That, and the fact the some of the country's oldest and most experienced law-enforcement agencies, like the Secret Service and Customs and Border Protection, led Homeland Security's efforts were more than enough reason to keep DHS in the group, he said.

"Where I am throwing down my marker is, I do not want the other members of the national community working without my knowledge with DHS components without me being briefed and knowing what they are doing," Mr. Allen said.

John Gannon, a former CIA deputy director of intelligence and former colleague of Mr. Allen's, said Congress and the White House haven't given Mr. Allen the resources or authority to make his department work. In some cases, the White House ended up creating other entities, like the National Counterterrorism Center, that undermined DHS's intelligence efforts by giving it the responsibility for threat analysis that DHS was created to do but failed because it was spending its energy trying to knit 22 agencies into a new department.

Until recently, DHS had problems attracting analysts and agents with intelligence clearances. For those who joined, the department sometimes didn't have desks or computers for them because of funding shortfalls. (Its budget is secret.)

Some law-enforcement agencies inside the DHS have been openly resisting efforts by Mr. Allen to get more involved in their operations, trying to direct their collection efforts and get them to report directly to him rather than to their agency heads. One senior intelligence official at U.S. Customs and Border Protection said the direction that Mr. Allen is pushing the department ultimately will improve its ability to detect and thwart terrorism and turn it into a major intelligence player. But that still appears to be a long way off, the official said.

WAR NEWS:

Senate To Challenge Bush's Iraq Plan (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

DOJ_NMG_0127087

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The Senate will on Monday -challenge President George W. Bush's proposed Iraq strategy with a debate on a non-binding resolution opposing the plan to send additional troops. However, several senators from both parties on Sunday warned it was unlikely to win the 60 votes needed for approval.

Republicans loyal to Mr Bush have attempted to undercut any political fallout from a resolution that would put on record the depth of cross-party dissent on the Iraq strategy. Their tactics include threats to filibuster a vote on the resolution and a "divide and conquer" strategy to allow votes on alternative resolutions.

Senator Lindsay Graham, a Bush loyalist, has proposed a competing resolution that lists benchmarks for the Iraqi government to achieve but supports the troop surge. He on Sunday said on Fox News: "A non-binding resolution is a political exercise that does nothing but harm to the war effort and it's a small moment for the Senate."

The debate comes as the Bush administration is preparing on Monday to submit a budget seeking an additional $100bn to pay for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, and an additional $145bn in 2008, Rob Portman, director of the office of management and budget confirmed yesterday.

Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, on CNN accused Republicans of "obstructionism" and warned that if the resolution was blocked, "a month or so down the pike there will be much stronger action".

There are dangers of a more serious confrontation with the White House if Congress chooses to exert its constitutional power over government spending and cuts off funds, as it did during the Vietnam war.

Republican John McCain, who is co-sponsor of the resolution with Mr Graham, criticised those who backed the bipartisan, non-binding resolution – including several Republican senators. He said it was more honest to vote to cut off funds than to pursue a vote of disapproval, "which is fundamentally a vote of no confidence in the troops".

The White House sought to address congressional unease ahead of the debate. Mr Bush on Saturday attended the annual retreat for Democrats for the first time since 2001. He said he welcomed "debate in a time of war" but mollified critics by noting that disagreements did not mean they were unpatriotic.

In Senate, Passage Of Iraq Resolution Uncertain (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

As the Senate launches a historic debate Monday over whether to oppose President Bush's new strategy for the Iraq war, the outcome may well turn on a few votes on both sides of the aisle.

Though not binding on the president, a vote in favor of a resolution to reject his plan to add 21,500 US forces in Iraq would be Congress's first against the war since it authorized the use of force in 2002.

Some backers of a compromise resolution worked out by Sens. John Warner (R) of Virginia and Carl Levin (D) of Michigan say it would be a first step toward pushing for more forceful moves, such as curbing war funds or setting a timetable for troop withdrawal. Opponents, including most Republican senators, say it would send a message of disunity to US friends and foes abroad and undermine prospects for success.

Both sides are weighing the risks of action – or inaction.

It may seem like an easy decision for Democrats, because polls show both the war and the president to be unpopular, says John Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "But if they succeed in hastening the withdrawal, and disaster results, they could wind up with some of the blame, so that's tempering the move to put some teeth in the resolution," he says. "If they put teeth in the resolution, they may be the ones to get bitten."

The risks for Republicans are different but no less sharp. "Association with an unpopular war is hurtful, as they saw in 2006 election," notes Mr. Pitney. "But if they're seen as abandoning President Bush, they could alienate a lot of primary voters and look like flip-floppers. For Republicans, it could become a character issue."

The Warner-Levin resolution calls for shifting responsibility to the Iraq government for dealing with sectarian conflict, but also specifies that nothing in the resolution should not be interpreted as "precipitating any immediate reduction in, or withdrawal of, the present level of forces." About 140,000 American troops were serving in Iraq before Mr. Bush laid out his plan on Jan. 10 to send 21,500 more.

The measure also rules out "the elimination or reduction of funds" because it could "endanger United States military forces in the field."

On the eve of debate, at least 12 Republicans were backing the Warner-Levin measure or were inclined to support it.

For Democrats, there is pressure to produce a bipartisan vote against the president's plan. But their own Sens. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut say they will oppose the resolution because it isn't strong enough.

DOJ_NMG_0127088

A competing resolution – sponsored by Sens. John McCain (R) of Arizona, Joseph Lieberman (I) of Connecticut, and Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina – calls on Congress to provide "the full support necessary" to carry out the US mission in Iraq, including 11 benchmarks it says the Iraqis must meet.

"This debate is just beginning, and we intend to make a strong case that we believe that this mission ... can succeed," said Senator McCain at a briefing last week.

Senator Lieberman, who during his reelection campaign last year lost the Democratic primary largely over his support of the Iraq war, says a nonbinding resolution against the surge "will have no effect on what is happening on the ground, will discourage our troops and encourage those they are fighting."

Despite disagreement over the endgame in Iraq, consensus is growing on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue regarding benchmarks the Iraqi government should be required to meet. These include a commitment to send additional Iraqi security forces to Baghdad and a fair distribution of government resources, including oil revenues, regardless of sect or ethnicity.

"They've got to pass an oil law. They've got to amend their constitution so that all segments of that society feel that the government is for them," Bush said Saturday at an issues conference in Williamsburg, Va., to applause from House Democrats in attendance.

Back on Capitol Hill, more than a dozen Republican senators have expressed doubts about Bush's plan to add to forces in Iraq. But GOP leaders said Friday that all 49 Republican senators will block the move to a vote on the Warner-Levin resolution – including Senator Warner – unless Democrats allow votes on three other resolutions, including one that opposes a cap on troop levels and curbs on war funding.

In the run-up to Monday's debate, lawmakers have two new pieces of information. One concerns the cost of the war. Monday, Bush is expected to ask Congress to approve $245 billion for war costs through fiscal year 2008 (October 2007 through September 2008), in addition to the $70 billion already approved for the current fiscal year – higher than many senators had expected.

The other is a long-awaited report by US intelligence agencies, which concludes that prospects for success in Iraq are "daunting" even if new moves do stem violence. Given the "current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene," Iraqis will be "hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation" in the next 12 to 18 months, according to unclassified conclusions of the National Intelligence Estimate released Friday.

Moreover, the Congressional Budget Office predicts that the cost of putting the additional troops in Iraq will be greater than the White House estimate of $6 billion. A CBO report released Thursday put the cost at between $9 billion and $13 billion for a four-month deployment, and between $20 billion and $27 billion for a 12-month deployment. A two-year deployment would cost about $49 billion, the report said.

GOP Threatens To Block Vote On Iraq Resolution (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A debate over President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq is set to begin in the Senate today, but it's not clear whether there will be a vote.

Republicans are threatening to use the filibuster, a parliamentary blocking maneuver, to prevent a vote on a resolution that expresses disapproval of the troop increase.

It may be the only way for Bush supporters to prevent a bipartisan vote of no confidence after the release of an intelligence report that painted a grim picture of the situation in Iraq. Further darkening the mood: continuing violence, including a car bomb explosion Saturday that killed 137 in Baghdad.

On CNN's Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, predicted Sunday that Republicans would filibuster the non-binding resolution, which he called "inconsequential." Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, on the same program, accused Republicans of "obstructionism."

"Debate is going on in every schoolyard, in every state, in every city of this nation. It should go on in the Senate of the United States as well," she said.

Democrats say there are enough votes to put the Senate on record in opposition to the troop increase. "There is a bipartisan majority of the U.S. Senate opposed to the president's plan to deepen our military involvement in Iraq," Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, said Sunday.

Reid does not have the 60 votes it would take to overcome a filibuster. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican, can block a vote. A test vote is scheduled for this afternoon. At issue are how many resolutions the Senate will consider and how many votes it will take to pass them.

McConnell wants votes on three resolutions: one opposing the president's policy; one offering qualified support; and one putting the Senate on record as opposing cuts in funding for troops in Iraq. Reid does not want to put the Senate on record opposing funding cuts if he cannot pass the resolution opposing the president's policy. McConnell, however, is insisting that 60 votes be required for approval.

Some Democrats, such as Sens. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, don't want a vote that could keep Congress from later using the power of the purse to force an end to the war in Iraq.

Opponents of the troop increase, including Nebraska Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel, argue that a diplomatic effort involving Iraq's neighbors is the only solution for the escalating violence. "We are not going to change the outcome in Iraq by putting American troops into the middle of a civil war," Hagel, a sponsor of the resolution of disapproval, said on ABC's This Week.

Republican Sen. John McCain, who co-authored the resolution backing the president, said on the program that more troops will give the Iraqis breathing room to build up their own troop strength. "I'm not saying this is going to succeed," he said. "I believe it has a good chance, but I know the consequences of failure."

Another supporter of the president's plan was less sanguine. "It's a long shot," Lugar said.

Critical Senate Resolution: Symbolic But Significant (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Not a single American soldier will do anything differently this week if the Senate approves a resolution criticizing President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq.

The nonbinding resolution would have no more force of law than the one approved Thursday commending the Miss America organization for its commitment to "the character of women in the United States."

Yet the immense symbolism of what may be the first formal rebuke of Bush's war strategy has produced the most passionate war debate on Capitol Hill since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago.

At its core is a furious argument over what the challenge really means -- not just to the president, but to the military, to the Iraqi government and to America's enemies and allies in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Several of the resolution's sponsors bill the eight-page document as little more than a polite suggestion to the country's chief executive, offering alternatives to Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops, mainly in Baghdad, to contain sectarian violence.

Other advocates, including Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill, cast it as a first step in an escalating congressional campaign to bring the war to an end.

Some of the war's most passionate opponents, complaining about the resolution's nonbinding nature, dismiss it as a meaningless exercise.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and its supporters in Congress warn of the dangerous message that approval would send to U.S. troops and to other Middle East countries.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is leading the push for an alternate resolution expressing congressional support for the mission, and Bush has said repeatedly that he will ignore any resolution challenging his plans.

The debate over the message is hardly unprecedented; Congress similarly wrestled with how to express itself when President Clinton was contemplating military involvement in the Balkans in the mid-1990s.

And when the House of Representatives ultimately passed a nonbinding resolution expressing "serious concerns and opposition" to the commitment of troops to enforce the Bosnian peace treaty, lawmakers were careful to declare their confidence that U.S. troops "will perform their responsibilities with professional excellence."

In the current debate, senators critical of the White House's Iraq policy also have assiduously insisted that they do not intend to undermine U.S. forces.

"I think it is important that we thank them for their service and that we make it very clear that this resolution does not impair their ability to move forward in their command," Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., said last week. He is a cosponsor of the resolution stating that the Senate "disagrees" with the troop increase.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., the resolution's main sponsor, has gone further, stressing that he does not intend to be "confrontational" with the White House or even to change the fundamental U.S. involvement in Iraq.

"The purpose of this resolution is not to cut our forces at the current level or to set any timetables for withdrawal," he said when he announced his resolution two weeks ago.

Last week, he added language explicitly stating that "Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

DOJ_NMG_0127090

That addition sparked opposition from such anti-war lawmakers as Sens. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., who have said Congress should not surrender its authority to limit funding as a means to force an end to the war.

Warner's amendment also did not mollify McCain and other critics of the resolution, who continue to call it an attack on the military. Senate Republican leaders are threatening to block any debate of the resolution Monday when it faces its first procedural vote in the Senate.

"This is a vote of no-confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there," McCain said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

The military audience watching the debate is hardly unified.

Iraq war veterans have come to Capitol Hill several times in recent weeks to urge opposition to the president's plans. And surveys by the Military Times newspapers, though unscientific, have suggested growing opposition to the war among active-duty personnel.

But retired Army Lt. Col. James H. Willbanks, who heads the department of military history at the Army's Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., said Congress should be careful how far it goes.

"I don't necessarily subscribe to the `stab in the back' theory," he said, referring to the contention that congressional opposition to the Vietnam war doomed the U.S. effort.

But Willbanks, a Vietnam veteran who recently completed a book on the fall of South Vietnam, noted that congressional limitations made it increasingly difficult for U.S. forces to fight in Southeast Asia. "That's the worst-case scenario," he said.

Critics of the resolution have also warned that the debate may embolden America's enemies and, as Sen. Richard G. Lugar, R-Ind., said at a recent Foreign Relations Committee hearing, "confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray."

There may be some truth to that, said Phebe Marr, a retired professor at the National Defense University and author of "The Modern History of Iraq."

"The bad guys are certainly going to be happy about this," said Marr, who was among several historians consulted by the Iraq Study Group last year.

But, she noted, the resolution also may push the Iraqi government to take more aggressive steps to reach political settlements that will diminish sectarian violence. "It is going to play both ways in Iraq," she said.

David L. Mack, deputy assistant secretary of State for Near Eastern affairs under President George H.W. Bush, said the resolution may actually help reassure some in the Middle East that the United States is remaining engaged.

"I think they will read that correctly, as they read the election, as a loss of support for Bush administration -- but not necessarily as a lack of interest in Iraq in the long term," said Mack, who heads the Washington-based Middle East Institute.

Indeed, if there is one audience that most observers agree will get an unambiguous message, it is the White House.

"A sense-of-Senate resolution that opposes the surge, no matter how delicately and respectfully worded, puts a bipartisan Senate on record that it has lost trust in presidential leadership," said Louis Fisher, a specialist on constitutional law at the Library of Congress who has written extensively about struggles between the White House and Congress over war powers.

"It's not just a vote against a surge, it's a vote against this administration," he said.

McCain: War Detractors Offer No Ideas (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain sought to weaken support for a resolution opposing President Bush's Iraq war strategy Sunday, saying proponents are intellectually dishonest.

On the eve of a possible congressional showdown on Iraq strategy, McCain contended the bipartisan proposal amounted to a demoralizing "vote of no confidence" in the U.S. military.

The measure criticizes Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops in Iraq yet offers no concrete alternatives, he said.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," said McCain, top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate from Arizona.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., called GOP efforts to block a vote on the resolution "obstructionism." Neither a Senate majority nor voters, she said, will tolerate such a delaying tactic.

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there's going to be much stronger legislation," she said.

The Senate, where Democrats hold a 51-49 working majority, has tentatively set an early test vote for Monday on the nonbinding resolution by Sen. John Warner, R-Va.

DOJ_NMG_0127091

In a bid to attract more GOP support, Warner added a provision pledging to protect money for troops in combat.

That compromise drew the ire of some Democrats who said it leaned too far in endorsing the status quo. They want to see binding legislation to cap troop levels, force a new vote to authorize the war or begin bringing troops home.

McCain is sponsoring a resolution expressing support for a troop increase and setting benchmark goals for the Iraqi government. He sought to capitalize on some of the Democratic division.

"I do believe that if you really believe that this is doomed to failure and is going to cost American lives, then you should do what's necessary to prevent it from happening rather than a vote of 'disapproval,'" McCain said.

"This is a vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there," he said, noting the proposal does not seek to cut off money for troops.

A fellow Vietnam veteran, GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, disagreed with McCain's assessment. Hagel said the resolution would make clear the Senate's belief that Bush's policy is misguided.

Hagel said the proposal also lays out alternatives such as moving troops away from the sectarian violence and closer to the Iraq border to provide "territorial integrity."

"We can't change the outcome of Iraq by putting American troops in the middle of a civil war," said Hagel, who is considering a run for the White House in 2008.

Republican leaders are working to block a vote on Warner's resolution. They insisted that at least two other GOP proposals also be considered — McCain's and one focused on maintaining money for troops in the field. Such a strategy could dilute support for Warner's measure and make it tougher for any measure to pass.

Democrats want to limit debate to just the Warner and McCain proposals.

Two Republicans who oppose Warner's proposal, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Richard Lugar of Indiana, said Sunday they were uncertain the Warner resolution would get the support of 60 senators.

"Even if there is, it's nonbinding, and has in my judgment no consequence," Lugar said.

Hagel said Warner's resolution strikes a careful balance for a majority of senators who oppose a troop buildup but differ on the appropriate response.

He called McCain's proposal meaningless because it offers benchmarks but does not spell out what the U.S. government will do if the Iraqi officials fail to meet them.

"What are the consequences? Are we then going to pull out?" Hagel asked. "Are we going to cut funding? Now, that falls more in the intellectually dishonest category."

The resolution debate comes as the White House and congressional Democrats prepared to square off over war spending.

Bush's new budget on Monday will ask for $100 billion more for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan this year — on top of $70 billion already approved by Congress for the current year. The budget will call for $145 billion in war spending for 2008.

The spending request covers Bush's new war strategy, including the increase in troops, White House budget director Rob Portman said Sunday.

"It's extremely important that we support our troops," Portman said. He described the requested money as the amount needed "to be sure our troops have the equipment they need, that they are taken care of well."

Hagel and McCain appeared on ABC's "This Week," Graham was on "Fox News Sunday," and Feinstein, Lugar and Portman spoke on "Late Edition" on CNN.

McCain Questions Honesty Of Push For Resolution (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain yesterday said his colleagues who support a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop surge in Iraq are "intellectually dishonest," an apparent bid to rally Republican opposition to the resolution, which could have its first test vote today.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," the Arizona Republican said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "In other words, this is a vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there."

Most polls show Mr. McCain in a statistical tie with former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani for the lead in the 2008 Republican presidential primary. The Democratic National Committee has issued several press releases targeting Mr. McCain for his support of a troop surge.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, was asked on "This Week" about Mr. McCain's charge of intellectual dishonesty. "I don't agree with that," he said.

Both Vietnam combat veterans, Mr. Hagel and Mr. McCain said they remain close friends despite their political differences on Iraq.

"What this resolution is about is, first, disagreeing with the president's position on increasing our military involvement in Iraq," said Mr. Hagel, who is considering his own presidential campaign. "The other thing about it is this is not a cut-and-run resolution. This is not a withdrawal resolution. This is not a resolution that talks about timelines."

The Senate is scheduled for a test vote today on the nonbinding resolution by Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, and Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. It contains a provision that pledges to protect money for combat troops.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, warned Republicans yesterday that any efforts to block a vote on the resolution would be "obstructionism."

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike there's going to be much stronger legislation," she said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said critics of the troop increase were not being honest about its significance.

"[Lieutenant General David] Petraeus' plan is not more people doing the same. And if anybody says that, they're not listening to General Petraeus," Mr. Graham told "Fox News Sunday." The surge of 21,500 troops "would double the combat capability of the American military to hold areas cleared."

Despite his vocal support for the strategy, Mr. McCain acknowledged he has doubts.

"I'm worried. I'm also worried about the [Iraqi] government's ability to really do what we want," he said.

"They've been showing a lot of weakness in the past. I'm worried that this is not enough troops. But I looked General Petraeus in the eye and I said, 'Do you have enough troops?' He said, 'If I think I need more, I'll ask for them.' And he also said if he thought the mission was going to fail, he would tell the president and us."

Sunday Shows Preview Historic Senate Debate (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Politico, February 5, 2007

The day before the Senate is set to begin its historic debate on Iraq, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., tried to rally support for President Bush's new troop surge strategy, warning that proposed resolutions of disapproval would demoralize U.S. forces. McCain, one of the leading supporters of the troop boost within an increasingly fractured GOP Senate caucus, also contended that the resolutions opposing Bush's plan lack the teeth to really change anything.

Speaking Sunday on ABC's "This Week," McCain, the top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate, said opponents should take broader action rather than simply voting to condemn Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by an additional 21,500.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," McCain said. "If you really believe that this is doomed to failure and going to cost American lives, then you should do what's necessary to prevent it from happening, rather than a vote of, quote, 'disapproval,' which is fundamentally a vote of no confidence in the troops and their mission."

The Senate, where Democrats hold a 51-49 working majority, has tentatively set an early test vote for Monday on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's strategy sponsored by Sen. John Warner, R-Va.,

McCain said Bush's plan has "a good chance of success." "I'm not guaranteeing it. But I am guaranteeing the consequences of failure," he said. If troops are withdrawn, McCain said, "You'll see a bloodletting in Baghdad that makes Srebrenica look like a Sunday school picnic . . . It'll be a chaotic situation that is in our national security interest to not see take place."

Reflecting the strain the issue is putting on the GOP, Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., usually a McCain ally on national security issues, appeared after him to make the opposite case. Hagel argued that the military "can't change the outcome of Iraq by putting American troops in the middle of a civil war," and maintained: "This is not a cut and run resolution."

Hagel called McCain's proposal to place benchmarks on the Iraqi government "disingenuous," because he feels it fails to hold Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki accountable. "If the benchmarks are not met by the Maliki government, "are we then going to bring our troops home?" Hagel asked. "Are we going to cut funding? Now, that falls more in the intellectually dishonest category."

Asked if he's going to run for president, Hagel said: "I'll make that decision as time develops. .. I'm not an anti-war candidate...To have a different position than the president's on a war doesn't qualify anyone to be an anti-war candidate."

During the segment with McCain, host George Stephanopoulos asked if an independent presidential bid would cripple Republican chances of winning the White House in 2008. "I don't know," McCain replied. "It is a fact that independent voter registration is rising all over the country, including my home state of Arizona ... I think that if we get back on our message, get back to the principles, philosophies and message of Ronald Reagan and others, I think we'll do just fine. But first, we've got to get over our state of denial."

Edwards On "Meet The Press"

On NBC's "Meet the Press," Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards tried to make the case that he can be the "straight-talk" Democrat, offering tough criticism of the war in Iraq and previewing a universal health care plan he will release Monday.

Moderator Tim Russert had Edwards as his guest for the full hour, and asked the former U.S. senator from North Carolina about remarks he made at the Center for Strategic and International Studies on Oct. 7, 2002: "My position is very clear: The time has come for decisive action to eliminate the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction ... Saddam Hussein's regime is a grave threat to America and our allies."

" 'A grave threat to America' -- do you still believe that?" Russert asked.

"No," Edwards replied.

Russert pressed: "Why were you so wrong?"

Edwards responded: "For the same reason a lot of people were wrong ... The intelligence information that we got was wrong."

Later, Russert noted that one of Edwards' competitors for the Democratic nomination, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, had opposed the Iraq war as a state senator. Russert asked: "Why shouldn't voters in Democratic primaries say, `On the big issue of the war, Obama was right, Edwards was wrong'?"

"I was wrong," Edwards conceded. "They should say that. And the question becomes, `Who's best suited to be president of the United States? Who has the depth, the maturity, the judgment to be president of the United States?' "

On his health care plan, Edwards acknowledged, "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes." He said the plan would cost between $90 billion and $120 billion a year once it's fully implemented.

Edwards' elaboration: "We take the 46 million, 47 million people who don't have health care coverage, we expand Medicaid, we provide subsidies for people who don't have coverage. We ask employers to play a bigger role, which means they either have to have coverage, or they have to buy into what we're calling health markets. We're going to create health markets all across the country, which will help, provide some of these efficiencies. One of the choices, by the way, available in these health markets is the government plan. So people who like the idea of a single-payer insurer health plan, that is actually one of the alternatives that people can choose."

Edwards got destroyed on Meet The Press by his on words and clear understanding that he doesnt fully understand the situation in Iraq. His domestic policy is borderline communism to me. I wouldnt vote him in charge of a canned food drive. Still remember that devil Chaney spanking him like a baby during the '04 debacle. Democrats better find someone electable. Hilary cant, Edwards cant, Biden cant. I like Obama and Richardson --if they were white men they would be your two options and way out ahead.

by sacksmb on 02.04.2007 at 05:42 PM

If we were going to elect "real people", we'd elect Joe Biden. He is the one who speaks off the cuff and is unabashedly found without handlers and PR flacks (probably the reason he has a reprutation for being long-winded). He is also, coincidentally, the one with the true depth of experience in foriegn policy on the Democratic side.

But, he says something about Obama, clearly meant to be complimentary, though admittedly awkwards, and gets eaten alive.

Americans want a real person, so long as they don't trip over their words. Unfortunately, real people mis-speak now and then.

by JSteele on 02.04.2007 at 05:10 PM

John Edwards is straight forward. This is what we need. No more "beat-around-the-Bush" politics! When was the last time we had a president that took responsibility for his actions? Edwards clearly defined himself and took responsibility for his vote on the war by stating it was mistake. He isn't defensive and trying to defend himself. America is tired of that kind of "bull* spin." Hopefully we will wake up and take control of OUR government by electing REAL people into office.

Lieberman Lives On Center Stage (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

When Senators go to the floor this week to debate the proposed Iraq troop surge, Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) will demonstrate once again to his Democratic colleagues that he is his own man. And while the Democratic leadership has made clear that Lieberman should be treated just as any other Caucus member, they cannot completely extinguish skepticism in their ranks about his long-term party loyalty.

Democratic Senators and aides said last week Lieberman's political posture hasn't changed much since winning re-election as an Independent Democrat. But in a narrow 51-49 seat majority, Democrats privately acknowledged they are still worried that as an Independent free from party peer pressure, Lieberman may cost them precious votes or even go so far as to join the GOP Senate minority.

"With a one-vote margin, there's no room for error," conceded one Senate Democratic aide. "But we have to take him at his word" that he is with the party.

"Of course there is some skepticism," added a senior Democratic Senate staffer. "He is the linchpin for the whole thing."

Democratic Senators and aides said that outwardly, Lieberman appears to be acting no differently in the first month of the 110th Congress than he did before he became an Independent last year after losing in the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont. Lieberman went on to win a resounding victory in the general election, but his campaign divided his allies in the Senate, many of who turned away from him to support Lamont as the Democratic nominee.

Sen. Mark Pryor (Ark.), one of the moderate Democrats who stood by Lieberman throughout his switch to run as an Independent, said Lieberman always has been a true Senate centrist — left leaning on key domestic items and conservative on national security matters. "He's always been willing to break with the party in what he thought was the right thing to do," Pryor said. "He hasn't changed."

As such, Pryor doesn't believe Senate Democrats approach Lieberman any differently these days, nor does he sense "any awkwardness" toward him from the Caucus. And, Pryor said, he doesn't believe Lieberman — even as one of the most conservative Democrats these days — would ever defect to the Republican Party.

"My sense is, looking at it, he lines up much better with the Democrats than the Republicans," Pryor said. "It's a personal decision for him to make, but I don't see any real advantage for him switching parties."

Undoubtedly, Republicans would love to have Lieberman jump ship and tip the Senate to an even 50-50 split. Such a move would give the GOP the gavel since Vice President Cheney as the President of the Senate would get the tie-breaking vote.

Meantime, the GOP leadership will gladly accept Lieberman's support on the war as they confront opposition to President Bush's proposal to increase troops in Iraq by 21,500.

No other Democrat or Independent besides Lieberman has signaled support for the Bush proposal, which will face a hefty share of criticism from the well of the Senate during this week's multi-resolution debate.

Still, Lieberman makes no apologies for his Iraq War stance, and insists that his view on the surge is "consistent with the position I've taken over the last four years. That notwithstanding, I feel so deeply that we have an enormous stake in how Iraq comes out." Lieberman said he respects the disagreements among his colleagues over the war, and with the troop increase, but believes his position is the right course for a successful outcome to the conflict.

"I wish there were a few more Democrats that agreed with me," he said.

Lieberman appears completely at ease these days as an Independent, not only on his war positions but also with his political alliances. Lieberman has even flirted with the possibility of endorsing a Republican — most notably Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) — in the 2008 presidential contest.

Even so, sources say Democratic leaders have made clear that the veteran Connecticut Senator is still one of their own, and that while he deserves no special treatment, he should win equal favor from the Caucus. Lieberman holds a powerful slot as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this Congress, a position Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) insisted he would hold as long as the Connecticut lawmaker agreed to caucus with the Democrats during the 110th Congress.

"Sen. Reid treats him like any other chairman," said a knowledgeable Democratic Senate aide.

"He's treated equally," added a Democratic Senator, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "I don't see him getting special privileges beyond what any other chairman would get."

Lieberman continues to participate in Democratic Caucus functions, and attends regular party luncheons and meetings, Democratic sources say. Lieberman said last week that he "absolutely" continues to feel comfortable with the Democrats, and doesn't believe his colleagues approach him differently these days — even though many of them campaigned against him when he decided to run as an Independent.

Lieberman said he is trying to fashion himself similarly to the independent-minded Democrats of the 1960s — progressive on domestic affairs and strong on foreign policy. "At this point, I am feeling a sense of mission ... I am fighting for that tradition — that [Sens.] Kennedy, [Hubert] Humphrey (Minn.), Scoop Jackson (Wash.) tradition."

His position on Iraq is the most notable break from the Democrats, and certainly comes as no surprise within the party ranks. Still, some Senate Democrats say the jury is out on how Lieberman will posture himself over the next two years, and they remain uncertain about where his votes will fall when leaders need his support in a narrow majority.

The Senate Democrat said that even though many of his colleagues sided with Lamont in the November election, Lieberman has been "well received" since returning to the Senate in January. And while no Member appears outwardly worried, Lieberman undoubtedly presents a challenge for the party that must capture 60 votes to avoid a filibuster on any legislation of consequence. "With a slight majority of 51, when he's off with the president on a certain issue — that's a challenge," the Senator noted.

"But that would have been a challenge whether he was a D or an I," the Senator added.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) said "functionally nothing has changed" with how Democrats treat Lieberman or in how he positions himself on the issues. "Obviously, Sen. Lieberman's opinions are his. He's an independent thinker, we know that."

Support Is Honorable Route (USAT)

By Jon Kyl

USA Today, February 5, 2007

The president's plan for success in Iraq should be given a chance. Although critics have focused almost exclusively on the reinforcement of troops — the so-called surge — the president's strategy is a comprehensive approach to the security and political problems facing Iraq.

Under this plan, the Iraqi government has committed to lead the effort to defeat the militias and any other challenges to the government's monopoly on force. The new plan also relies on political and economic measures that will help to create a more unified government capable of providing essential services to its citizens.

Opponents of the new strategy apparently do not agree that a political solution depends on peace and stability in Iraq. But, as Gen. David Petraeus made clear in his Senate testimony in January, Iraqis need to feel that the government is capable of providing for their security before they can give up their reliance on sectarian militias.

While American troops work with Iraqi units to establish security in Baghdad, and in the al-Qaeda-dominated Anbar province, the Iraqi government will be expected to act on promised reconciliation initiatives.

The new plan is not guaranteed to work. But everyone agrees Iraq cannot yet handle security by itself. If the United States withdraws, Iraqis will be slaughtered, terrorists will be emboldened throughout the region, and Iran and Syria will step into the void. These severe consequences to our national security make it clear that withdrawal is not an option.

Although many have summarily criticized the new strategy, they have contributed no viable plan of their own. No one has any illusions about the challenges we face, but we will be more likely to succeed if we are unified.

As Osama bin Laden has said, "This war is for you or for us to win. If we win, it means your defeat and disgrace forever." The Senate should also consider the message a nonbinding, no-confidence resolution would send to our enemies, our allies and our troops. Such a resolution would tell Gen. Petraeus, whom the Senate recently confirmed as U.S. commander in Iraq, that we don't support his mission.

In a TV news interview, Tyler Johnson, a 21-year-old soldier serving in Iraq, appropriately summed up the message a no-confidence resolution would send to our forces: "Those people are dying. You know what I'm saying? You may support — 'Oh, we support the troops,' but you're not supporting what they do, what they share and sweat for, what they believe (in), what we die for. It just don't make sense to me."

Iraq Vote Could Resonate In 2008 (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

When Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) saw reporters approaching him last week, he took off in a sprint, determined to say as little as possible about a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's troop-escalation plan, which is expected to come before the Senate today.

"You know where I stand," the senator, who is considered politically vulnerable back home, said repeatedly as he fled down stairways at the Capitol. "I'm still looking."

DOJ_NMG_0127096

The historic showdown to begin today represents the first bipartisan confrontation between Congress and the White House over the Iraq war since the invasion nearly four years ago. While the resolution will test the mettle of every member of the chamber, none will be challenged more than Sununu and the 19 other Senate Republicans facing reelection in 2008 -- many from states where voters are angry with Bush's war policy and want the troops to begin heading home.

Democrats won control of the Senate and House in November largely because of widespread opposition to the war, and the issue remains dangerous for the GOP heading into the 2008 campaign. Senate Republicans are torn between home-state voters eager for them to take a stand against a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 U.S. troops and has cost hundreds of billions of dollars, and Bush and other Republican leaders who warn that passage of the resolution would undermine chances of a successful conclusion to the war.

"It's inevitable that people want to ascribe political motives to this, but I just hope a majority of Oregonians understand when it comes to issues of war and peace, there's no issue of greater gravity on your heart and mind," said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who must stand for reelection next year in a swing state.

"Oregonians are patriots and want to fight the war on terror, but they don't like the way this war has mutated," added Smith, once a war supporter but now an anguished foe.

Republican senators are loath to say that political calculations could weigh on their votes, but to GOP leaders battling to prevent their members from supporting the resolution against the troop buildup, politics present an unavoidable obstacle.

"I'm sure with some of them, that's a factor," said Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.). "But this is a very, very serious matter," he pleaded. "There are some things more important than getting reelected. This is one of them."

The drama is to begin late this afternoon with a procedural vote on whether to move ahead with the debate. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) vowed Friday to try to block that, promising to rally his fractious party behind him.

The bipartisan resolution to be offered on the floor states that the Senate disagrees with the president's plan and urges Bush to consider all other options for achieving his strategic goals.

Should resolution supporters clear their first obstacle, the Senate will move to an anticipated long series of votes on amendments. The big ones to watch include a Republican call for the immediate withdrawal of all troops, intended to put Democrats on the spot, and attempts by antiwar Democrats to strike certain provisions, including one opposing the termination of funding for troops in the field.

The latter issue drew fire yesterday from John McCain (Ariz.), the top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I don't think it's appropriate to say that you disapprove of a mission and you don't want to fund it and you don't want it to go, but yet you don't take the action necessary to prevent it," McCain said on ABC's "This Week."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) warned that it would be "a terrible mistake to prevent this debate."

"If we can't get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there's going to be much stronger legislation," Feinstein said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Supporters of the resolution include most Democrats and at least seven, and possibly as many as 11, Republicans, led by Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who assembled the compromise measure under consideration. The pro-resolution Republicans include five senators who will face voters in 2008: Warner, Smith, Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Hagel, who is considering running for president, initially supported a tougher resolution condemning Bush's war policy. Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) is the one declared GOP presidential candidate supporting the Warner bill.

The big unknown is what a handful of Republican fence-sitters such as Sununu will do. The GOP undecideds include Sens. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) and Larry E. Craig (Idaho), who are also up for reelection in 2008, along with Sens. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska) and Arlen Specter (Pa.), who are not.

For many Republicans, the scrutiny will be intense. A coalition of liberal activists, labor unions and antiwar veterans aired Super Bowl advertisements yesterday targeting Coleman and Collins. Other advertisements are running in Richmond and Manchester, N.H., to pressure Warner, Sununu and Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

Coleman said he found it "offensive" to suggest that senators' reelection concerns could influence their stand. But he conceded: "Certainly senators like myself and Collins and others are in tough states. Anything we do always gets measured against that."

Indeed, Coleman is under attack, first for opposing a tougher resolution approved last month by the Foreign Relations Committee, then for supporting Warner's resolution after standing by the president for so long.

"No matter what these guys do now, they're going to have to be held to account for the choices they made not to do oversight when they said we have to back the president no matter what," said Al Franken, a liberal comedian and talk-show host mulling a race against Coleman next year. "When he had the gavel, he gave the president a free pass."

DOJ_NMG_0127097

Alexander insisted that political considerations are not his foremost concern, but he conceded that he is struggling to strike the right note. "I'm unhappy about the conduct of the war in Iraq, and I would like to express my support for the troops at the same time. I want to find an appropriate way to say that," said the first-term senator, who could draw a formidable opponent in 2008 as his state drifts increasingly Democratic.

Sununu, whose once Republican-dominated state leaned Democratic last year, has drawn four potential Democratic opponents for 2008. Collins could face one of the toughest battles two years out, given that Maine has supported Democrats in the past two presidential elections.

But even her likely opponent, Rep. Tom Allen, was reluctant to criticize her positioning on the debate. Although the six-term House Democrat said opposition to the war appears to be growing in Maine, there is no consensus among voters on a way forward. "It's such a complicated issue," Allen said. "The ideas of what to do range from cut the funding now to stay the course and give it a little more time."

Indeed, many political experts think the Iraq situation is far too fluid to anticipate how it might play in the next election. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the Senate Democrats' campaign chairman for 2006 and 2008, has warned party strategists and candidates not to expect Iraq to pack the political punch in the next cycle that it did last year.

But even the most seasoned veterans acknowledged that voters expect Congress to take a more active role in the war debate.

"There's just a general unrest in a lot of people," said Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who is expected to seek an eighth term in 2008. "We've had a lot of people over there. We've lost a lot of people from Alaska."

One of the strongest factions is a group of Republicans, including some up for reelection next year from solid red states, who have vowed to filibuster any resolution opposing Bush's troop policy. Kansas may be showing a glimmer of Democratic blue, with a Democratic governor and a newly elected House Democrat, Nancy Boyda, but Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the intelligence committee chairman at the outset of the war and for its first three years, called the various proposals "confetti resolutions" with no value.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) said he feels no political pressure, despite a looming reelection campaign that will be his first.

"Nobody likes war, but I come from a very military-oriented state," Chambliss said.

"They don't want to see us pour more people into a hopeless cause," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), another 2008 candidate, said of his home-state voters. "But they don't want us to leave if there's a realistic opportunity to be successful. I think they expect us to be smart and wise and do the right thing."

Democratic Sens. Russell Feingold (Wis.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) have announced that they will oppose the Warner resolution because they do not think it is tough enough, and they could bring a handful of Democrats with them. But those balking Democrats are expected to oppose Republican efforts to block the bill through parliamentary tactics.

Senate Democratic Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) said he was reminding his colleagues that "you're not putting a stamp of approval" on the resolution by allowing the debate to proceed. "We should all remember the engine that's pulling this train -- disapproval of the escalation. All the problems we have, have nothing to do with that issue," Durbin said.

In Democratic Race, Iraq Frames Debate (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

In speech after speech, Democratic presidential candidates agreed on the issues of the day: Global warming must be stopped, universal healthcare is imperative, the crumbling American education system must be fixed.

And on the biggest issue – Iraq – all the prospective and declared Democratic hopefuls speaking to party activists last weekend were also in basic agreement: that the US must extricate itself from the Iraq war. Where they differed was over one question: How?

As the Senate begins debate Monday on competing resolutions on Iraq, the Democrats are fresh out of their own debate on a way forward in Iraq at the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York demonstrated the challenge inherent in being the early front-runner: As she seeks to win over enough of the party faithful to win the nomination, she is also looking ahead to the general election campaign, when a position too far to the left could hurt her chances among moderates.

"There are many people who wish we could do more," Senator Clinton told the crowd, as a handful of hecklers cried out. "But let me say that if we can get a large bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said, 'No!' to President Bush and begin to reverse his policies."

Clinton also stated that she "wants to go further," arguing that the US needs to "threaten" Iraq's government with reduced funding for Iraqi troops if it does not start fulfilling its promises. And "if we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will!" she asserted.

But to many Democratic candidates, a nonbinding resolution rejecting Mr. Bush's plan to send more US troops to Iraq isn't enough, even as a starting point. Clinton and another top challenger for the nomination, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, face pressure from many of the other contenders to take a more forceful stand. Some of these other candidates have the luxury of not having to cast votes in Congress – most notably, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has carved out an Iraq position to the left of Clinton and Senator Obama.

The North Carolinian says senators should not support the bipartisan resolution rejecting Bush's surge, but rather cut off funding for the war. Mr. Edwards, who supported the war as a senator in 2002 and later repudiated his vote, is the most antiwar of the leading Democratic contenders – and commands a considerable following among Democrats affiliated with organized labor. He is also well-organized in Iowa, the first nominating state, and has the potential to stun the field next January.

"We cannot be satisfied with passing non-binding resolutions that we know this president will ignore," Edwards said. "We have the power to stop the escalation of this war."

Another candidate who still has a vote in the Senate, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, has also aligned himself with antiwar liberals by saying he will not support the nonbinding resolution. But his presidential aspirations are seen as a long shot. The question is whether his presence in the race, and ability to gain media attention for his views, will put pressure on Clinton and Obama to move leftward.

Obama took perhaps the most unusual approach in his speech to the DNC. Instead of going through the usual list of policy positions, he focused instead on the nature of public discourse – and about the need to overcome the cynicism he says has become a staple of modern politics.

"The campaigns shouldn't be about making each other look bad, they should be about figuring out how we can all do some good for this precious country of ours," Obama said. "That's our mission. And in this mission, our rivals won't be one another, and I would assert it won't even be the other party. It's going to be cynicism that we're fighting against."

Obama asserted that everyone in the race has a responsibility to put forth a plan for ending the war, but did not discuss his own proposal, released last week. Obama's legislation would begin redeployment of US forces out of Iraq by May 1, 2007, and calls for the removal of all combat brigades by March 31, 2008, a date he says is consistent with the expectation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

One candidate who did discuss his Iraq plan at length, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, first came up against the axiom, "You never get a second chance to make a first impression."

Last Wednesday, on the day he announced his presidential campaign, he faced a maelstrom of controversy over his attempt to compliment Obama. In calling him "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Biden inadvertently insulted all the black presidential candidates of the past, and spent the rest of the week apologizing.

During his cattle call appearance on Saturday, Biden began with a quip: "So, how was your week?" Then he apologized again. By then, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was ready to rip into what he called "the very deep hole" the Bush administration has dug the nation into in Iraq.

Senate Vote: Discomforting, Revealing, Not About Morale (USAT)

USA Today, February 5, 2007

John Warner first volunteered to fight for his country at age 17, when he left high school and joined the Navy during World War II. He served until 1946, and four years later, he left law school to volunteer for the Marines in the Korean War. He eventually went on to serve as President Nixon's secretary of the Navy, and after being elected a Republican senator from Virginia in 1978, he rose to chair the Senate Armed Services Committee.

That's not the profile of someone who is naive about war. But now, at age 79, Warner is a leader in the fight to have Congress pass a non-binding resolution against President Bush's troop "surge" in Iraq — an undertaking that Bush and others criticize as undermining the war effort.

The crucial part of Warner's measure says, "The Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges the president instead to consider all options and alternatives … ."

DOJ_NMG_0127099

The Senate faces hard votes on Warner's resolution and competing measures this week. Despite the courage of American troops and many Iraqis, the war has gone badly, metastasizing into something critics feared and the administration never imagined. Almost four years in, there's no end in sight, growing frustration among voters and little support for Bush's leadership.

Now the question is what to do, and on that Congress and Americans are painfully divided.

Warner's resolution is not an easy call. Critics say it sends a dispiriting message to the troops, and there's no getting around that. But the administration diminishes its case by trying to imply that its critics are unpatriotic if they don't silently follow the president's lead. No American leader should need a sermon on the value of honest argument and dissent, even in wartime. Voters elected scores of new legislators in November with the demand they speak up. Lack of support for the war is driving the resolutions, not the other way around.

Many critics on both sides of the "surge" also deride an anti-war resolution as a worthless middle position, either because it's political posturing that undercuts the commander in chief, or a pointless gesture that avoids using Congress' power to cut off funding for the war. But that, too, misses the essential point.

All or nothing is not the responsible choice. The public is no more enthusiastic about abrupt withdrawal than it is about staying the current failing course, and even critics of Bush's strategy warn that abrupt withdrawal would backfire. If a resolution can be worded to draw bipartisan support, it might point a path to unity, not underscore division.

The Warner resolution, like other drafts, offers one, essentially the plan proposed by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group: Turn over most fighting to Iraqi forces while training them; help secure Iraq's borders; focus U.S. troops on fighting al-Qaeda; and engage Iraq's neighbors in diplomacy. Critics may not like that plan, but it's every bit as valid as Bush's. In fact, something similar is likely to follow Bush's troop surge whether the increase is effective or not.

The surge is underway, and nothing Congress can do in the short run will stop it. The resolutions are more about what happens next. Whether one passes or not — even whether they're a good idea or not — matters less than what the debate over them reveals: The Iraq war, with public support gone, is in its end game. What's being debated now is how best to get out.

A Bleak Assessment On Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

There isn't much encouraging news in the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq. Ethnic and sectarian identities are hardening and violence is spiraling, as shown again in Saturday's horrific Baghdad market bombing. Iraq's new governing institutions are weak and leading politicians have a "winner-take-all attitude" that can only make matters even worse.

The intelligence agencies see "real improvements" in Iraqi security forces. But those gains are strictly relative and the report still finds those forces unlikely to be able to successfully battle Shiite militias in the next 12 to 18 months.

A good example of this problem can be found in the accounts of last week's battle between the Iraqi Army and a mysterious group of armed religious extremists outside the Shiite shrine city of Najaf. Najaf is supposed to be a showcase province for the American-trained Iraqi Army. The Pentagon chose it in December for the first symbolic handover of security responsibilities.

Barely a month later, in their first major battle, the Iraqis had to be bailed out by American air and ground forces. Hundreds of armed zealots had managed to set up a fortified encampment, complete with tunnels, trenches, blockades, 40 heavy machine guns and at least two antiaircraft weapons.

This happened just 10 miles northeast of the city at a time when hundreds of thousands of religious pilgrims and Iraq's leading Shiite clerics were headed there for annual holiday observances. A successful attack on top clerics and pilgrims in Najaf would have been disastrous.

The Iraqis' next mistake was sending only one army battalion and some police to raid this armed camp after its belated discovery. Government forces were quickly surrounded and called in American air support. Still pinned down, the Iraqis had to summon American ground support as well before they could advance on the camp.

This less-than-impressive performance by a supposedly top-of-the-line Iraqi Army division has grave implications for President Bush's new Baghdad security drive, in which an additional 17,000 or so American troops are supposed to work in tandem with a much larger Iraqi force.

Perhaps the Iraqi security forces will improve over the next 18 months. But as the intelligence estimate also makes clear, the only real hope for Iraq lies in a bold reversal of course by Iraqi politicians that puts national reconciliation ahead of sectarian advantage. Mr. Bush needs to get serious about demanding such a change, including enforceable deadlines for overdue steps like eliminating militia supporters from the police, ending vengeful anti-Baathist measures targeting the Sunni middle class, and guaranteeing the fair allocation of oil revenues.

Otherwise, Iraq seems headed over the cliff.

The Perils Of Partitioning Iraq (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

Physically dividing Iraq in an attempt to quell ethnic violence would only lead to more heartache and killing.

JUST WHEN IT SEEMS THAT Iraq's death-spiral cannot get worse comes news that it has. The civilization that grew between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers was nourished for centuries by the mingling of myriad cultures and ethnicities. Now a vile "sectarian cleansing" in Baghdad threatens that civilization — and it is proceeding faster than anyone thought possible.

More than 540,000 Iraqis have fled their homes because of sectarian fighting in the last 11 months — 80% of them in Baghdad, according to a carefully documented report from International Medical Corps, a Santa Monica-based humanitarian group that has teams in 16 of Iraq's 18 provinces. The pace of flight is accelerating: The number of people displaced jumped by 43% in November alone, the group found.

Although there have been widespread reports of an Iraqi diaspora to other Middle Eastern countries, most of the displaced are inside Iraq. They've taken refuge in segregated Sunni or Shiite neighborhoods within Baghdad or moved to provinces where people of similar ethnicities predominate. Many are living with impoverished relatives, and some face malnutrition. If the violence continues, estimates are for 1 million more such "internally displaced persons" within Baghdad alone in the next few months. That amounts to more than 20% of the population of a capital the United States vowed not only to liberate but to remake.

This disaster has prompted calls — first from hawkish humanitarians on the left, now joined by some voices on the right — for some sort of partitioning of Iraq that might quell the violence.

It is tempting to try to separate Shiite and Sunni combatants before they further shred and bleed their country, Yugoslavia style. But partition is a dangerous idea, the merits of which do not improve even as other options look worse. First and most important, the Iraqis do not want it. Second, the biggest prize in the ethnic wars — Baghdad — may be ghettoized, but it cannot be easily divided. Third, not all the violence is between Shiites and Sunnis; Shiite sects battle each other for power, and other ethnic strife may yet erupt in the north. Across Iraq, partition would force multiethnic cities and mixed families to choose sides and identities, however artificial. And the agony of Baghdad might simply be repeated in Kirkuk, Basra or Nasiriya.

Advocates of a "soft" partition seek to avoid these awful outcomes by keeping Iraq intact but encouraging Iraqis to use their new constitution (when fully implemented in 18 months' time) to allow the highly autonomous provinces to confederate as they see fit.

But the Bush administration should stick to its position and refuse to endorse any sort of plan to divide Iraq. Soft or hard, partition would inevitably be seen as another Western plot to weaken Iraq and draw a new Middle East map to U.S. specifications. It would fuel violence by seeming to ratify the end result of the sectarian killing, and do nothing to stop violence against unfortunate Iraqis caught on the wrong side of the tracks in the future.

The War: 'Ambiguous' Intel On Iran's Meddling In Iraq (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

How solid is evidence that Iran is stoking the conflict in Iraq? The White House has ratcheted up rhetorical attacks, suggesting that Iranian government elements were supplying Iraqi Shia insurgents with deadly weapons technology. But the idea that Iran plays a key role in fomenting violence inside Iraq took a knock last week with the publication, by the U.S. intelligence czar's office, of a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. The NIE, representing the consensus view of all 16 U.S. intel agencies, says that because sectarian antagonisms among Iraqis themselves are so intense and "self-sustaining," Iranian or Syrian involvement is "not likely to be a major driver of violence."

U.S. officials still maintain that Iran is helping Iraqi Shia insurgents build bombs that are particularly deadly because they can penetrate armored vehicles. But three U.S. officials familiar with unpublished intel (unnamed when discussing sensitive info) said evidence of official Tehran involvement is "ambiguous," in the words of one of the officials. For example, U.S. troops have been attacked by homemade bombs triggered by infrared sensors (like ones used on American burglar alarms). U.S. agencies know Iranian purchasers have made bulk orders for the sensors—which cost as little as $1 each—from manufacturers in the Far East. Some analysts think most of the sensors are used for innocent purposes: they note that the devices are so widely available that would-be supporters of Iraqi militants could simply buy them in an Iranian store and smuggle them to Iraq; high-level government involvement wouldn't be necessary. (Another intel challenge: it's difficult for U.S. personnel to ID Iranian operatives among Iraqi Shiites or Iranian pilgrims who visit Shia shrines in Iraq.)

Last week U.S. military officials in Baghdad were set to brief reporters about evidence American forces had assembled about Iran's interference in Iraq. But the briefing was canceled; one of the U.S. officials suggested it had been put off because intel officials couldn't agree about the info.

Zakaria: The Road To Reformation (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Al Qaeda had hoped to rally the entire Muslim world against the West, but now it is in the middle of a dirty sectarian war within Islam.

For those in the West asking when Islam will have its Reformation, I have good news and bad news. The good news is that the process appears to have begun. The bad news is it's been marked by calumny, hatred and bloody violence. In this way it mirrors the Reformation itself, which we now remember in a highly sanitized way. During that era, Christians of differing sects massacred each other as they fought to own the true interpretation of their religion. No analogy is exact, but something similar seems to be happening within Islam. Here the divide is between the Sunnis, who make up 85 percent of the Muslim world, and the Shiites, who represent most of the other 15 percent.

The dominant new reality in the Middle East today is the growing schism between these two groups. Look at the daily sectarian killings in Iraq, listen to the dark warnings of Saudi and Jordanian leaders about a "Shia crescent," watch the power struggles in Lebanon. Islam's quiet cleavage has come out into the open. At a recent demonstration in the Palestinian territories, opponents of Hamas taunted the Sunni Islamists as "Shiites" because of their links to Iranian-backed Hizbullah.

We in the United States have spent much time asking what all this means for Iraq, for U.S. troops in the midst of this free-for-all and for America more generally. But think, for a moment, about what the trend means for Al Qaeda.

Osama bin Laden and Ayman Al-Zawahiri, both Sunnis, created Al Qaeda to be a Pan-Islamic organization, uniting all Muslims as it battled the West, Israel and Western-allied regimes like Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Neither Zawahiri nor bin Laden was animated by hatred of Shiites. In its original fatwas and other statements, Al Qaeda makes no mention of them, condemning only the "Crusaders" and "Jews."

But all ideologies change as they encounter reality. When bin Laden moved to Peshawar in the 1980s to fight the Russians in Afghanistan, he allied with radical Sunnis who had a long history of oppressing Afghanistan's Shiite minority, the Hazaras. (The novel "The Kite Runner" is about a young Hazara boy.) Even then, bin Laden didn't sanction anti-Shiite violence, nor did he add anti-Shiite accusations to his messages. But after the Sunni Taliban took power, Arab fighters under his command did support his hosts' anti-Shiite pogroms.

Iraq was the real turning point. The self-appointed leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, had a poisonous attitude toward Shiites. In a letter to bin Laden, written in February 2004, he described Iraq's Shiite majority as "the insurmountable obstacle, the lurking snake, the crafty and malicious scorpion, the spying enemy ... The danger from the Shia ... is greater ... than the Americans ... I come back and again say that the only solution is for us to strike the religious, military, and other cadres among the Shia with blow after blow until they bend to the Sunnis." Zarqawi was drawing on Wahhabi Islam—and its offshoot Deobandism in South Asia—in which there is a deep and oppressive strain of anti-Shiite ideology.

Bin Laden and Zawahiri were clearly uncomfortable with this new line, and the latter reproached Zarqawi directly. Bin Laden remained largely silent on the matter, but by the end of 2004, both had decided that Al Qaeda in Iraq was too strong to rebuke. And, rousing anti-Shiite feelings seemed the only way to mobilize Iraq's Sunni minority. It also, crucially, made them see Al Qaeda as an ally. The trouble for Al Qaeda is that as a practical matter, loathing Shiites works in only a few places: principally Iraq, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and some parts of the gulf. Most of the rest of the world's 1.3 billion Muslims are turned off by attacks on their co-religionists.

So, an organization that had hoped to rally the entire Muslim world to jihad against the West has been dragged instead into a dirty internal war within Islam. Bin Laden began his struggle hoping to topple the Saudi regime. He is now aligned with the Saudi monarchy as it organizes against Shiite domination. This necessarily limits Al Qaeda's broader appeal and complicates its basic anti-Western strategy.

These emerging divisions weaken Al Qaeda, but they will help most Muslims only if this story ends as the Reformation did. What is currently a war of sects must become a war of ideas. First, Islam must make space for differing views about what makes a good Muslim. Then it will be able to take the next step and accept the diversity among religions, each true in its own way.

The United States should avoid taking sides in this sectarian struggle and aim instead to move the debate to this broader plain. We should encourage the diversity within Islam, which has the potential to divide our enemies. But more important, we should encourage the emerging debate within it. In the end it was not murder but Martin Luther that made the Reformation matter.

Who's Stoking The Fires? (USNEWS)

By Mitchell Prothero

DOJ_NMG_0127102

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

BEIRUT-The presence of balaclava-clad young men waving weapons from motorbikes is never a good sign. Even so, their arrival during a recent series of street clashes between Sunni Muslim supporters of the current Lebanese government and the Shiite followers of the Hezbollah-led opposition is particularly ominous given Lebanon's tragic history of sectarian violence and civil war.

For more than two months, Lebanon has teetered on the brink of chaos. Hezbollah and its allies have been demanding the American-backed government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora submit to the formation of a so-called national unity government-one that would tip the political balance in favor of the Shiite community. A series of escalating demonstrations finally exploded in late January into sectarian violence that left about 10 people dead and more than 200 wounded. There are concerns about further clashes next week if thousands of pro-government demonstrators turn out to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri.

This should be a parochial struggle among Lebanese in a tiny nation of 3.8 million where the mix of Sunnis, Shiites, and Christians is just diverse enough that no group can dominate. During Lebanon's 15-year civil war, which claimed some 100,000 lives and turned Beirut into a rubble-strewn battleground, the country mainly split between Christians and Muslims. Now, nearly two decades later, the conflict's defining characteristic is the rift within the Muslim community, a split that draws in on opposing sides the region's two major powers, Sunni Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran. Lebanon is a testing ground for growing Iranian influence-and for Saudi Arabia's efforts to block it.

This has led to some unusual political twists. After war unexpectedly erupted last summer between Hezbollah and Israel, the major Sunni Arab states-Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Jordan-moved quickly to condemn the provocation by Hezbollah. For the first time, these Arab states essentially took Israel's side.

Lebanon's Sunni Muslims-who include much of Beirut's economic elite-tend to look to the Saudis for patronage. And with the prime minister slot open only to a Sunni (Lebanon's Christians get the presidency and the Shiites get the parliament speaker), Hezbollah's political attack on Siniora is widely perceived as part of an Iran-backed challenge to the Sunni Islam power structure around the region.

When Hezbollah began protesting in downtown Beirut's gleaming shopping district (most of which is owned by Saudi companies), it looked to the Saudis as if Lebanon risked tipping to Iranian control-just as Iraq transformed from a Sunni power under Saddam Hussein to an Iranian-friendly Shiite one.

Political sources say that within days of Hezbollah's initial protests, Siniora was told by Saudis to hold firm and they would pay any economic bill necessary. "It began last summer during the war, when the Arab League came to Siniora's defense," says Michael Young, opinion editor of Beirut's English-language newspaper, the Daily Star. "The Saudis promised him then anything he needed. Siniora does not stand for Siniora; he's a steadfast symbol of the Sunni Arab world and its political establishment. He is always someone who has fought for an Arab consensus to every problem. So to assail him is to assail the Sunni Arab world itself."

But then came a series of street clashes between Sunnis and Shiites that seemed to take everyone by surprise, apparently including Hezbollah itself. "Look, Hezbollah is a disciplined organization, maybe the most disciplined in the Arab world," says one security official, who cannot speak for attribution on this subject. "But it's not enough to control your fighters and officials. They clearly lost control of the kids and their allies, who aren't organized like they are. This really scared everyone involved."

Even, perhaps, officials in Saudi Arabia and Iran, who may have their own interests in not having their rivalry push Lebanon over the brink. Whether or not that is the case, Saudi and Iranian officials unexpectedly opened direct talks to calm the crisis. They need to hurry to keep Lebanon from again sliding into civil war.

Armed With History (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

It was on the eve of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, in March 2003, that Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton sent a letter to President Bush. "There is no doubt that our forces will be victorious in any conflict," he wrote. "But there is great potential," he warned, "for a ragged ending to a war as we deal with the aftermath." He noted that then Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld "frequently talks about the list he keeps of things that could go wrong in an Iraq war." Added Skelton: "I have kept my own list."

He went on to outline some possibilities that would prove eerily prescient: Shiites attacking Sunnis, forcing U.S. troops to protect them. "Stabilization and reconstruction prove more difficult than expected," Skelton wrote. "This puts pressure on troop rotations, reservists, their families ... and requires a dramatic increase in end-strength."

Nearly four years later, it is just such an increase in end-strength, meaning the overall size of the military, as well as the strain of repeated rotations on the Army and Marine Corps, that Skelton will confront as the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. In that role, this Democratic moderate figures to be a major player in examining America's wars on two fronts. As President Bush presses his case for sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq and details surface about wasted reconstruction aid (including Olympic-size swimming pools ordered up by Iraqi officials), Skelton summarizes the goals for his tenure with a word that has become his mantra: "Oversight. Oversight. Oversight."

No nonsense. That mantra is both a top item on his to-do list and a reminder of a lack of congressional supervision during critical phases of the Iraq war-and of the responsibility that Americans feel Capitol Hill should take up now. In a recent survey, nearly two thirds of Americans said that Congress has not been assertive enough in challenging the Bush administration's conduct of the war. "Oversight was nil," says Skelton. To that end, he has announced plans to revive the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation, disbanded when Republicans gained House control in 1994. Skelton's committee will take up topics including military readiness. "This causes me great heartburn, this chewing away at our armed forces," Skelton tells U.S. News. "Equipment is worn to a nubbin," he adds, noting that while Congress provided the military with $17 billion last year to make up for equipment wear and tear, units in America "still don't have a lot to train on-it's left over there for succeeding brigades. And what's left over there is often worn out."

A member of the committee since 1981-and its ranking Democrat since 1998-Skelton, 75, still describes himself as a simple country lawyer. Colleagues caution, however, that the moniker belies a gentle but no-nonsense questioning style that will set the committee's tone in the months to come.

Stricken with polio as a child, Skelton was unable to serve in combat but developed a voracious appetite for history books that he shares, he says, with military leaders. "That's my hobby. Some people bowl, some ski-I read history books." For that reason, says Robert Scales, the former president of the U.S. Army War College in Carlisle, Pa., "the strongest thing you can do when you talk with Ike is to come armed with those historical connections. He understands that for the military, the battlefield is our lab, our law library, our courtroom, our stock exchange. Soldiers do war so infrequently that if you're going to gain knowledge, you've got to go to the historical lab."

Iraq Battles A Shadowy Shiite Death Cult (NSWK)

By Babak Dehghanpisheh

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Dhia Abdul Zahra claimed he was the messiah. And on the eve of the holiest day in the Shiite calendar, Ashura, when believers beat themselves bloody with chains and swords, Zahra tried to deliver salvation. Hundreds of his followers, armed with heavy weapons, clashed with Iraqi and American soldiers northeast of the holy city of Najaf on Jan. 28. The Soldiers of Heaven, as the cultists called themselves, apparently planned to storm Najaf and assassinate top Shiite clerics. They fought fiercely: an American helicopter was shot down, killing two soldiers, and Iraqi forces called for reinforcements at least twice. Iraqi police say this was no ordinary enemy. Fighters repeatedly tapped into their radio frequency and repeated an ominous message, "Imam Mahdi is coming." The return of the Mahdi—the 12th and last Shiite saint, who, believers say, vanished in the ninth century—signals the end of times.

It would be easy to write off the thirtysomething Zahra, who was killed along with more than 250 others in the battle, as an Iraqi David Koresh and his followers as misguided zealots. But the Soldiers of Heaven are only one of dozens of Shiite factions, some of whom have similar millenarian ideas, that have sprung up across southern Iraq. Dominated as it is by one sect, the south has generally been thought remote from the civil war that has engulfed Baghdad and its environs. The Iraqi Army took over security in Najaf from the Americans in late December; few if any of the 20,000 new U.S. troops heading to Iraq will be sent to the region. But as the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq released last week points out, the country is plagued by four overlapping battles—Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on Americans, sectarian killings and Shia-on-Shia violence in the south. If left unchecked, that factional fighting could grow into as great a threat to Iraq's stability as the ethnic cleansing farther north. "The collapse of authority in southern Iraq could be devastating for both the United States and for Iraq," says Vali Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival."

Under Saddam Hussein, the Shiite south was viewed as a hotbed of Iranian intrigues and deliberately neglected. Its infrastructure is noticeably worse than other parts of the country: roads are full of potholes, and open sewers are common. And, despite millions of dollars pumped into projects since 2003, most recently under the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad, the situation hasn't improved significantly. Unemployment in some areas is as high as 60 percent, and Iraq's five poorest provinces are all in the south. Many reconstruction projects have been abandoned because of corruption, kidnappings and killings.

The two biggest players in the region are Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, run by cleric Abdul Aziz al-Hakim. But in Basra alone, whose oilfields account for about 90 percent of Iraq's budgetary revenue, at least half a dozen parties are competing for power—often violently. Basra's murder rate tripled in the first half of last year. "Security is bad in the Shiite south and may be getting worse," says Juan Cole, a professor of history at the University of Michigan and an expert on Iraq's Shiites.

In this chaotic environment, talk of the dhuhoor, or appearance of the Mahdi, has been growing. "The decrease of the things people need—electricity, water, a salary, peace of mind—makes them want to find something like a miracle," says Salama Khafaji, a former member of the Iraqi Governing Council from Najaf. Sadr has astutely tapped into this longing for a better world; loyalists have hinted that he may be the Mahdi himself. Fringe groups that take the Mahdi more literally—and that rail against a Shiite leadership who are doing nothing to hasten his return—are also growing, says Khafaji. "When you have the complete collapse of society is exactly when you get these pretenders who combine social anxiety, political frustration and fear with millenarian expectations," says Nasr.

Senior clerics familiar with Zahra say the Soldiers of Heaven was an offshoot of the Sadrist movement and had few friends among the Najaf establishment. "They were against the marjaiya [senior clerics], against the government, against the Americans," says Sheik Fatih Kashif al-Ghitta, a senior cleric from Najaf. On more than one occasion, Ghitta says, Zahra's followers had fought pitched battles against the Mahdi Army. They were particularly well entrenched in Zarqa, a village about 10 miles northeast of Najaf. The group had dug six-foot-deep trenches around their property and set up defensive sand berms. Weapons were buried underground or covered with palm leaves. Iraqi troops later found sniper rifles, heavy machine guns and even antiaircraft guns around the property. But the Soldiers of Heaven is hardly the only heavily armed faction in the south: gunmen from another Sadrist offshoot, the Fadhila Party, control Basra's oilfields. Baghdad security officials worry that even more Shiite fighters will soon flood into the area to avoid the "surge" of U.S. troops in the capital.

If Zarqa is any indication, that could spell trouble. Although President George W. Bush praised Iraqi forces after the battle ("The Iraqis are beginning to show me something," he said), in fact the Iraqis were nearly overrun. At one point, Col. Ahmad Silawi, the director of Najaf intelligence, and Abdul Hussein Abtan, the deputy governor of Najaf, were pinned down. "Help us! There's heavy shooting!" Abtan cried over the radio. Silawi later told NEWSWEEK he'd recited the shahada, the traditional prayer before death. Only repeated U.S. airstrikes crushed the cultists.

Ironically, Iran—which U.S. military officials have blamed for fueling attacks against American soldiers in the south—probably has more influence in the region than the Coalition. "If, after this attack, the Americans haven't realized that they need our help to stabilize Iraq, I don't know when they're going to learn anything," says a Tehran official who has close ties to the senior Iranian leadership and asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject. If he's expecting Washington to ask for help in the south, though, he may as well wait for the Mahdi, too.

Sandra Day O'Connor On Postcourt Life (NSWK)

By Debra Rosenberg

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Walk down the hallway on the second floor of the Supreme Court, through the part of the massive marble building the public never gets to see, just past the chambers of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and you might think you've stumbled into a gallery. The walls of the long corridor are lined with artwork: there's a Georgia O'Keeffe print, a photograph of a Navajo woman (taken by Barry Goldwater) and a framed editorial cartoon of Lady Justice celebrating the first woman named to the Supreme Court. Turn the corner, and you'll find that woman, retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. "It wouldn't fit in my chambers," she says, pointing at the collection. When she left the court last January, she had to turn over her spacious digs to her replacement, Justice Samuel Alito. But a year later, nestled in a cozy corner office, O'Connor is still hard at work.

After her surprise announcement in July 2005 that she was leaving the court, O'Connor seemed likely to follow most of her former colleagues into a quiet private life. But America's first female justice is blazing a new path in retirement, too. At 76, O'Connor is still physically and mentally fit. Her current schedule—packed with appeals-court hearings, law-school lectures, speechmaking and book writing—can make her days on the court look practically languorous. And these commitments don't include her recent work with the Iraq Study Group (or her aerobics classes). She divides her time between Washington, where she maintains her chambers, and Phoenix, where she cares for her husband, John, who suffers from Alzheimer's. "She just put it in third gear and went on," says her brother, H. Alan Day.

Before she stepped down, O'Connor seemed dismissive of the life of an ex-justice. She once told her brother: "When you retire from the court, you become a nobody." Though Justice Potter Stewart, whose seat O'Connor filled, was an advocate of stepping down in your prime, O'Connor wasn't sure whether she'd one day follow his lead. "Most of them get ill and are really in bad shape, which I would've done at the end of the day myself, I suppose, except my husband was ill and I needed to take action there," she told NEWSWEEK recently in a rare interview in her chambers.

O'Connor carefully weighed when to quit the bench. In the spring of 2005, with Chief Justice William Rehnquist publicly battling thyroid cancer, the two justices discussed timing. "We talked a little bit," O'Connor recalls. "I was concerned about whether he had an intention to step down since his plans might have altered my own. It's hard for the nation to grapple with two [retirements] at once," she says. "He indicated he didn't want to step down." So she realized she had to go first.

After O'Connor left, she'd planned to spend time with her husband—but she couldn't predict the cruel trajectory of his disease. John, a lawyer, and O'Connor had long been fixtures on the Washington social circuit, known for their ballroom dancing. "Here you have this magnificent man full of Irish humor and tales and then suddenly the fog rolled in," says former Wyoming senator Alan Simpson, a family friend. In earlier stages of John's illness, O'Connor would take him to the court with her because he couldn't be left alone.

After O'Connor was freed from her daily duties at the court—it took six months before Alito took her seat—John's condition deteriorated. Last summer she reluctantly placed him in a care center near their home in Phoenix; she visits him often. "It's such a miserable disease. It's so sad. It's so hard. I did the best I could," she says. "He wants me there all the time." It's been a difficult transition, says Simpson. "It's tough to go home at night and no longer have this warm, witty guy there."

The void created by John's illness may help explain O'Connor's refusal to retire to Arizona and instead keep herself immersed in work. Now, she says, she's rethinking her earlier prediction of becoming a "nobody." "I think there is a fairly narrow margin of time in which the voice can still be heard," she says. Because O'Connor chose to retire rather than resign, she's still considered an active judge and draws a salary. So she has responsibilities as an officer of the court to fill in as a judge on appeals courts—a task that requires copious preparation. Even the most mundane duties of judgeship do not escape her: last month she spent two days swearing in public officials in Arizona. Being a judge also means O'Connor can't cash in on any of the speeches or public appearances she makes. That would change if she resigned. But then, she wouldn't have an office at the court. Maybe then she would be a nobody. "I'd be on my own," she says. "I have chosen a different route."

That route has led her to speak out on a handful of causes, like the importance of an independent judiciary and teaching civics. She's also waded into one of the nation's most difficult problems: what to do in Iraq. When James Baker first asked her to join the Iraq Study Group, O'Connor was baffled. "I wasn't sure I should do it," she recalls. "It was so out of my field of judging. I don't know anything about the military." Though the project was more grueling and time-consuming than she'd imagined, she found it fascinating.

Later, O'Connor had little patience when the media wanted to turn the commission members into celebrities. At one meeting, recalls Alan Simpson, also a study-group member, famed photographer Annie Leibovitz arrived to take a group portrait for Men's Vogue. "We all sat there, no one said anything," says Simpson. "Then she said, 'Not me. That's not what I'm here for. This is not about our pictures going out somewhere,' and the rest of us piped up to agree." (Baker and co-chair Lee Hamilton sat for the portrait.) Lately, some study-group members have expressed frustration that President George W. Bush has not embraced their recommendations, but O'Connor—still unwilling to plunge into politics—demurs. "There are probably no perfect answers," she says.

While O'Connor's been busy charting a new course, the court she left behind is changing, too. She's often said she's disappointed that her replacement was not a woman. But gender balance isn't the court's only shift. O'Connor gained a reputation as the swing vote on issues like abortion, affirmative action and school prayer—a designation she's always chafed against. Still, she acknowledges some decisions could change without her. "I'm sure there will be some sense that in some instances, had I been on the court, my vote might have differed from some of the new members," she says. "But that's all right. That's the way things go."

A year after her departure, O'Connor admits she misses the court. "Occasionally I'll see one [upcoming case] and say, 'Well, I wonder what they're going to do to my old writing in Case X'," she says. But O'Connor seems to live by the motto stitched into a needlepoint pillow on her couch: MAYBE IN ERROR BUT NEVER IN DOUBT. She says she has no regrets about leaving the bench. And she refuses to second-guess any old votes. "I don't look back and say, 'Oh, gee.' There's no use living that way. Do the best you can and look forward," she says. Even in retirement, O'Connor sees the road ahead.

Why We Can't Leave (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

Our hyperactive president's walkabouts, radio talks, interviews, conferences on energy, the economy, and obesity-and his recent State of the Union address-find him looking well and speaking well, but rather in the manner of the Wizard of Oz. When the curtain is drawn back on the big flashing pronouncements, the Wizard is revealed not as a powerful magician but someone who can't even dispossess a wicked witch of her broomstick without the help of a young girl, her little dog, a scarecrow, a toothless lion, and a tin man. (Cast those characters yourself!) The only thing that is melting before the wizard's eyes is not the wicked witch but the wizard's own support in the country, in the Congress, and within his own party.

George W. Bush bet his presidency on Iraq. And now he's betting his party's future on it. If the new troop "surge" fails, it will destroy the Republicans' reputation on national security for at least a generation.

The president said, "Nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America to succeed in the Middle East, to succeed in Iraq." He's right. Abandoning Iraq would plunge the country we went to war to save into a grim horror movie. The Iraqi government cannot stop sectarian killing when it is able to call on the world's most powerful military. Who can expect it to do so if the Americans leave? Indeed, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi professionals-physicians, academics, and the like-have divined the answer and fled to other countries.

Unbelievable horrors. Of course, most Americans believe the nightmare in Iraq simply cannot get much worse. Wrong-it most certainly could. Advocates of a "phased" withdrawal of our troops must reckon with the certainty of a serial disaster: a full-blown civil war spreading a contagion of violence across the region, with Iran virtually uncontainable. Our enemies, as the president said, would emerge with new safe havens, new recruits, and new resources. The head of the CIA, Michael Hayden, put it starkly: "An al Qaeda victory in Iraq would mean a fundamentalist state that shelters jihadists and serves as a launching pad for terrorist operations throughout the region and against our own homeland." A premature pullout would condemn Iraq and the region to unbelievable horrors. It would be a historic victory for our Islamic enemies. If America is defeated in Iraq, a victory in the broader war on terror will be impossible. And unlike what happened after Vietnam, the enemy will undoubtedly follow America home.

How the president must rue his idealized concept of the war, and his obstinacy in persisting with the "too little, too late" way it was conducted. The desire for democracy in Iraq is a noble one, but democracy is not achieved by a single election. It was exhilarating to see so many Iraqis proudly raising their inky voting fingers in the face of threats, but installing democracy is different from organizing an election. Democracy requires security. It requires civil institutions, of which Iraq had none, except for the mosque where Islamists organized to the detriment of dreams of a secular state. It requires respect for the rule of law, for which the Shiite and Sunni extremists have only contempt. It requires tolerance for minorities, but in Iraq today people are murdered daily because of their name or the street where they live. Indeed, those elections had counterintuitive consequences for they divided the country into three sectarian communities and hardened the differences among them.

U.S. Threatens Crushing Offensive To Calm Baghdad (WT)

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

From combined dispatches

BAGHDAD -- A U.S.-Iraqi offensive against militants in Baghdad will begin within days and take place on a scale never seen during four years of war, American officers said yesterday.

A military spokesman, meanwhile, acknowledged for the first time that hostile fire was probably to blame for the crashes of four helicopters in the past two weeks, and said the U.S. command has ordered changes in flight operations.

Briefing a small group of foreign reporters, three American colonels who are senior advisers to the Iraqi army and police in Baghdad said a command center overseeing the crackdown in the capital would be activated today.

"The expectation is the plan will be implemented very soon thereafter," a senior adviser to the 9th Iraqi army division said at a U.S. military base in Baghdad.

"It's going to be an operation unlike anything this city has seen," Col. Doug Heckman added. "It's a multiple-order magnitude of difference, not just a 30 percent, I mean a couple hundred percent" larger than previous offensives.

The job of stabilizing Baghdad had become increasingly urgent after a wave of violence that, an Interior Ministry official said, claimed nearly 1,000 lives in the past week alone -- about135 of them in a single truck bombing on Saturday. At least 103 persons were killed or found dead yesterday, most of them in Baghdad, police reported.

The officers said the new security operation will be headed by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, a Shi'ite in his early 60s who was named to the post under pressure from the U.S. military. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki initially had selected Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji for the job.

The plan will involve U.S. and Iraqi forces sweeping the capital's neighborhoods for militants and illegal weapons and then holding cleared areas. But some analysts fear that as in previous crackdowns, militants will simply melt away and wait out the forces or strike in areas where they are not deployed.

The four helicopters that have gone down since Jan. 20 crashed after claims by insurgents that they have received new stocks of anti-aircraft weapons -- and a recent boast by Sunni militants that "God has granted new ways" to threaten U.S. aircraft.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters that the investigations into the crashes of three Army helicopters and one private copter were incomplete, but "it does appear they were all the result of some kind of anti-Iraqi ground fire."

Despite the losses, Gen. Caldwell said it was premature to conclude that the threat to U.S. aircraft posed by Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militiamen had increased dramatically.

"There has been an ongoing effort since we've been here to target our helicopters," Gen. Caldwell said. "Based on what we have seen, we're already making adjustments in our tactics and techniques and procedures as to how we employ our helicopters."

Gen. Caldwell did not elaborate, presumably for security reasons. In the past, defensive measures have included flying lower and faster, varying routes and using zigzag patterns over dangerous areas.

Three crashed in mostly Sunni areas and the fourth was shot down during fighting with members of a Shi'ite messianic cult near Najaf. U.S. officials have accused Iran of providing sophisticated weapons to Shi'ite militants.

In December, a spokesman for the late dictator Saddam Hussein's ousted Ba'ath Party, Khudair al-Murshidi, said in Damascus, Syria, that Sunni insurgents had received shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, and "we are going to surprise them," meaning U.S. forces.

Mr. al-Murshidi did not say when or how the missiles were obtained.

Insurgents have used SA-7s, a shoulder-fired missile with an infrared homing device, against U.S. and British aircraft since 2003.

U.S. military helicopters are equipped with long-range sensors and devices to jam radar and infrared technology, but they have proven vulnerable to intense gunfire, as well as rocket-propelled grenades.

Iraq's Sunni-Shiite Anguish Grows (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

CAIRO

When National Intelligence Director John Negroponte briefed the Senate last week on Iraq, he cautioned lawmakers that the hope for stability there rests on quelling unabated sectarian violence.

That view was reflected in a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), parts of which were declassified Friday, that describes an Iraq Army and police bedeviled by the sectarian allegiances of their members. The report deemed it unlikely that these forces will move effectively against militias in the next 18 months – particularly against the Shiite groups with ties to Iraq's ruling parties.

Indeed, US military officials cautioned patience – despite the deployment of an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

"[That] will not turn the security situation overnight," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said in Baghdad. "Iraqi forces suffer deficiencies in leadership and logistics. It will take more than two months to solve these problems."

The urgent need to address the strife that flows in Baghdad's streets as well as its political corridors was painfully evident in a devastating weekend attack.

The deadliest single suicide bombing since the war began hit a crowded Shiite market on Saturday, leaving at least 135 Iraqis dead.

Overall, the assessment from the NIE, a report from the US intelligence community, was bleak, especially in its evaluation of the ability of Iraqi security forces to get its arms around the burgeoning violence.

The violence is also leading to even greater polarization of Iraqi society, both among the man on the street and the country's political leaders, the report found.

Also, it underscored what experts and US government analysts have been saying for some time – that the solution to Iraq's problems rests on the creation of a national compact that will involve compromise for the country's Shiites, Sunnis, and Kurds. It noted that the trend is in the other direction.

"Even if the violence is diminished, the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation" over the next 18 months, the term of the estimate, the report says.

Despite the report's downbeat assessment, it argues in line with the Bush administration that the situation would be worse if US troops were to withdraw now.

The report makes the argument that if the US withdrew "rapidly," Iraq's security force would be "unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution," that "massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable," and that outside countries "might" intervene directly in the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0127108

While the report finds that Iran provides support to Shiite militants, and says Syria isn't stopping the flow of foreign militants across its borders, it also argues that the solution to Iraq's problems does not lie in Damascus or Tehran.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence ... because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," notes the report.

In the same vein, the report stated that the term "civil war does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq" but that it "accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict."

As American forces start to move into Baghdad for the escalation of the US military presence there, there were also reminders of the growing sophistication of the country's insurgents.

General Caldwell, the top US military spokesman in Iraq, said Sunday that the three American helicopters that have crashed since mid-January, causing the loss of 16 US service members, were all shot down by ground fire. These three incidents constitute the most successful spate of insurgent attacks on US air power since the start of the war.

In the wake of Saturday's bombing, Shiite militia leaders blamed US efforts to curtail sectarian groups for the attack. Some said that joint US and Iraqi operations against them, which have recently netted scores militants, prevented them from securing their own neighborhoods.

There's little evidence that the militias do a better job of maintaining security than US and Iraqi forces – large-scale attacks have hit Shiite enclaves before. Such attacks have led average people to turn to the militias in frustration, and to blame the US for a security situation.

On Saturday, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most respected religious figure broke more than three months of self-imposed silence, issuing a statement urging Shiites and Sunnis to set aside their differences.

Ayatollah Sistani had been a major figure calling for moderation, particularly among his Shiite constituency, during the first two years of the war. But he has largely withdrawn from making public statements as the violence has escalated.

His new fatwa, or religious edict, said, "The Islamic nation is passing through difficult conditions and facing tremendous challenges that threaten its future. . . Everybody knows the necessity for us to stand together and reject the sectarian tension to avoid stirring sectarian differences."

Iraqis Fault Delayed U.S. Plan In Attack (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 4 — A growing number of Iraqis blamed the United States on Sunday for creating conditions that led to the worst single suicide bombing in the war, which devastated a Shiite market in Baghdad the day before. They argued that the Americans had been slow in completing the vaunted new American security plan, making Shiite neighborhoods much more vulnerable to such horrific attacks.

The critics said the new plan, which the Americans have started to execute, had emasculated the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that is considered responsible for many attacks on Sunnis, but that many Shiites say had been the only effective deterrent against sectarian reprisal attacks in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhoods. Even some Iraqi supporters of the plan, like Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister who is a Kurd, said delays in carrying it out had caused great disappointment.

In advance of the plan, which would flood Baghdad with thousands of new American and Iraqi troops, many Mahdi Army checkpoints were dismantled and its leaders were either in hiding or under arrest, which was one of the plan's intended goals to reduce sectarian fighting. But with no immediate influx of new security forces to fill the void, Shiites say, Sunni militants and other anti-Shiite forces have been emboldened to plot the type of attack that obliterated the bustling Sadriya market on Saturday, killing at least 135 people and wounding more than 300 from a suicide driver's truck bomb.

"A long time has passed since the plan was announced," Basim Shareef, a Shiite member of Parliament, said Sunday. "But so far security has only deteriorated."

American officials have said the new plan will take time, but new concerns emerged Sunday about the readiness of Iraqi military units that are supposed to work with the roughly 17,000 additional American soldiers who will be stationed in Baghdad under the plan, which President Bush announced last month.

Iraqi and American military officials said the command structure of the Iraqi side had still not been resolved, although the plan is supposed to move forward this coming week.

Naeem al-Kabbi, the deputy mayor of Baghdad and a senior official loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the powerful cleric who heads the Mahdi Army, said he believed the plan had been delayed "because the Iraqi Army is not ready."

American military officials have not laid out a precise timeline for the security plan, and would not say if undermanned Iraqi units had delayed its start. But American officials have said Iraqi units arriving in Baghdad to fulfill their part of the new plan are only at 55 to 60 percent of their full strength.

DOJ_NMG_0127109

With much of Baghdad devolving further into chaos, many Iraqis have begun to question whether the security plan has ambled along too slowly, setting up a situation in which American and Iraqi troops will be greeted with hostility rather than welcomed as protectors.

Concerns about the unintended consequences of the American security plan rippled through many levels of the Iraqi government.

"People's expectations went up," Mr. Zebari said. "They were hopeful, optimistic that this new surge, this new plan would provide a better life for them. And this daily killing — this bomb — they lose hope. Still the troops haven't arrived."

An American military official, responding to accusations that American efforts opened Shiite areas to attacks, said American checkpoints around eastern and central Baghdad last October seemed to reduce the number of car bombs until the checkpoints were removed because of objections from Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and Shiite officials loyal to Mr. Sadr. The official was not authorized to comment about the subject and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American military spokesman in Iraq, called for patience as the new security plan rolls out. "Give the government and coalition forces a chance to fully implement it," he said in remarks carried by several news agencies.

His comments, however, came as more than a dozen mortar shells crashed on Adhamiya, a Sunni area of eastern Baghdad, in what appeared to be an act of retaliation by Shiites. At least 15 people were killed and more than 56 wounded, an Interior Ministry official said.

Clashes in western Baghdad between Sunni and Shiite militias left 7 dead and 11 wounded, and the authorities found 35 bodies throughout the city, many showing signs of torture.

Meanwhile in the streets of Sadriya, the poor, mostly Shiite area of central Baghdad where the bomb exploded on Saturday, merchants and residents struggled to contain their anger.

"I saw with my own eyes young children flying from the windows of the apartments on top of the shops when the explosion arrived," said Haydar Abdul Jabbar, 28, a car mechanic who was standing near a barber shop when the bomb exploded. "One woman threw herself out of the window when the fire came close to her."

Mr. Abdul Jabbar said he rushed to collapsed buildings trying to help the wounded, but found mainly hands, skulls and other body parts.

"The government is supposed to protect us, but they are not doing their job," he said. "I watch the TV and see the announcements on the imminent implementation of the security plan. Where is it, for God's sake?"

"I wish they would attack us with a nuclear bomb and kill us all," he added, "so we will rest and anybody who wants the oil — which is the core of the problem — can come and get it. We can not live this way anymore. We are dying slowly every day."

The truck exploded around dusk on Saturday at a market flush with crowded food stands. The crater from the blast was large enough to hold a sedan; the blast threw the truck's gnarled engine block more than 100 yards away.

As the sun rose on Sunday, the rescue effort continued with workers and relatives tugging at concrete pieces in a mad search for victims amid the piles of debris where apartments and offices once stood. Processions heavy with death moved through the area. Men lashed simple wood coffins to the top of minibuses for the long journey to cemeteries, while families in the backs of trucks wailed after collecting the bodies of relatives.

While the American military put out a statement saying that the Iraqi Army assisted at the scene, the area closest to the crater was controlled by the Mahdi Army. Between 8 and 15 men dressed in black and carrying AK-47s, waved reporters away on Sunday morning.

The scene was thick with anger directed at the Iraqi government and American military for letting the people down and allowing such a devastating attack. When asked about the "tragedy" of the blast, one Mahdi guard responded, "The only tragedy was when we voted for weak officials."

He then pointed toward the bombed-out buildings and added, "This is the result."

Later, when two American Humvees and an Iraqi patrol passed just after 1 p.m., one of the men in black called the soldiers "apes and cowards."

"They're the ones who brought us the catastrophe," one of them said. "If they were not here such a thing wouldn't happen to us."

Mr. Abdul Jabbar, the car mechanic, was one of many Iraqis who said that the American military would have been better off leaving the Mahdi Army in charge of Shiite neighborhoods.

Uday Ahmed, 31, a Sunni whose three restaurants at the market were obliterated by the blast, killing 20 of his workers, said that until a few weeks ago, Mahdi militiamen were more visible on the streets, checking vehicles, watching and offering to arbitrate disputes. After American and Iraqi officials arrested several top Mahdi commanders last month, he said, many of the Mahdi militants drifted into the shadows or fled.

DOJ_NMG_0127110

He said their departure contributed to the recent spasm of violence in Shiite neighborhoods.

Some Shiites in the area said that the truck could have been stopped at a checkpoint, decreasing damage from its payload. Hussein Ali, 57, said Shiite militiamen might have recognized that the driver was not from the neighborhood.

"They don't have any system or apparatus to check the cars," he said. "But they know from looking at the faces who is supposed to come to Sadriya to bring vegetables or fruits. They have a relationship with the merchants."

Iraqi officials, after meeting with American military commanders, are expected to announce as early as Monday that they have agreed on some of the details of the command structure for the new security plan.

American military officials say that the Iraqi officer who will lead his forces participating in the new Baghdad security effort, Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar, will take command on Monday and that the Baghdad plan will be carried out soon.

McCain Criticizes War Resolution

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — On the eve of a Senate showdown over a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's war strategy in Iraq, Senator John McCain of Arizona, a leading Republican critic of the measure, accused its sponsors Sunday of intellectual dishonesty. He described the nonbinding resolution as a "vote of no confidence in both the mission and the troops who are going over there."

He said on the ABC News program "This Week" that if the sponsors wanted to block Mr. Bush's plans to expand the American troop presence in Iraq, they should be brave enough to vote to cut off financing.

A principal Republican backer of the resolution, Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, said on the same program that it was important for the Senate to make a clear stand against the troop building, which he said would produce only more turmoil.

Senator Dianne Feinstein of California, a Democratic supporter of the resolution, said she was frustrated that Republican leaders would try to filibuster to block a vote. "Look, debate is going on in every schoolyard, in every state, in every city of this nation," she said on CNN's "Late Edition," describing the proposed filibuster as "obstructionism."

U.S. Copters Were Shot Down (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 4 -- Four American helicopters that crashed in Iraq in the past two weeks were shot down, a U.S. military spokesman said Sunday, prompting officials to reevaluate how troops move around in an increasingly hostile war zone.

"There has been an ongoing effort to target our helicopters," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad, according to news services. "We have had four helicopters shot down. . . . It appears they were all the result of some kind of ground fire."

In the most recent crash, an Apache helicopter was downed Friday morning near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad, killing two crew members. An Iraqi police official said it was struck by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile.

A Sunni insurgent group backed by al-Qaeda, the Islamic State of Iraq, posted photographs and a video on its Web site Sunday that it said showed the downing of the helicopter. The group asserted responsibility for the attack and warned that Iraqi airspace will be inhospitable for U.S. forces.

In the video, a man is heard chanting "Allahu akbar" -- God is great -- as a helicopter is struck by what appears to be a missile. The aircraft catches fire and spirals down in a trail of smoke. The authenticity of the video could not be verified.

The deadliest helicopter crash this year occurred Jan. 20, when a Black Hawk was shot down northeast of Baghdad, killing 12 soldiers on board. On Jan. 28, two soldiers were killed when armed men shot down a helicopter en route to a farm area near Najaf to support Iraqi and U.S. troops in a clash with insurgents.

Five American private security contractors aboard two helicopters were killed Jan. 23 while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack in central Baghdad. One of the helicopters was shot down, killing four contractors on board, and a fifth contractor was shot aboard another helicopter that did not crash.

"Based on what we've seen, we are already adjusting our tactics and procedures in how we deploy our helicopters," Caldwell said during the session with Iraqi reporters in the fortified Green Zone.

Military helicopters in Iraq generally travel in pairs and fly at low altitude. Gunners at both sides of the craft scan the landscape for threats. Caldwell did not say which tactics would change.

Helicopters are widely used to shuttle soldiers and civilians around Iraq, where roadside bombings and attacks on convoys have made ground travel dangerous.

In other developments, deadly explosions and attacks were reported in Baghdad and elsewhere Sunday, a day after a massive bomb in a central Baghdad market killed more than 130 people.

DOJ_NMG_0127111

Improvised explosive devices killed at least 11 people in Baghdad, according to Col. Sami Hassan, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. At least nine people were killed in shootings and mortar attacks, he said. News services reported scores of other deaths in Baghdad or elsewhere.

'Speed Bumps' Deadly On Iraqi Roads (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A type of homemade bomb that can include parts commonly found in Iraqi kitchens and that is easy to hide on desert roads has proliferated in Anbar province and spread to other parts of the country.

Troops in armored vehicles are endangered by the bomb, which U.S. military officials call a "speed bump." The weapon is formed by sandwiching plastic explosives between metal plates, such as baking trays, a Pentagon intelligence document shows. A detonator switch triggers the bomb when a vehicle rolls over it, ripping into the often-unarmored underside.

Homemade bombs, referred to by the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, cause 70% of U.S. deaths and wounds in Iraq, Defense Secretary Robert Gates has said. Explosive devices had killed 1,337 U.S. troops and wounded 11,871 in Iraq through Jan. 27, the Pentagon said.

The speed bump first appeared in Anbar province, Pentagon records show. Anbar is a hotbed of the Sunni insurgency and is the scene of some of the heaviest fighting.

The first devices were built with baking trays; now they're fashioned from various types of metal.

"The enemy's IED arsenal evolves as we succeed in defeating his methods of attack," said Brig. Gen. Dan Allyn of the Pentagon's anti-IED office.

Part of the speed bump's effectiveness springs from its ease of disguise. It's tough to detect on desert roads where it can be covered with dirt, according to the Pentagon document.

The military spent $3.5 billion last year to defeat IEDs. Some of that money was spent on armored vehicles with V-shaped hulls. Those hulls can deflect the force of a blast from a speed bump or other IED outward, sparing the troops inside the vehicle the worst of the impact.

The Marine Corps, which provides most of the U.S. troops in Anbar, does not release details on causes of servicemembers' deaths. Recent Marine contracts, however, indicate that the service is reacting to the scope of the speed bump IED problem:

·In January, the Marines placed an urgent, $9.4 million order to buy vehicles with V-shaped hulls for anti-IED work, according to Force Protection Inc. The South Carolina company produced Buffalo and Cougar combat vehicles with V-shaped hulls.

·In October, the Marines ordered $14 million worth of mine rollers — wheeled devices that travel in front of vehicles to detonate pressure-triggered IEDs.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the Pentagon had been slow to recognize the value of V-shaped-hull vehicles but is now buying them as quickly as they can be made.

"They've literally saved hundreds of lives," said Graham, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Hindered By Delays And Corruption, The Iraqi Air Force Is Flying Again, But Barely (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

TAJI MILITARY BASE, Iraq — The five droopy blades of a new Russian-made helicopter painted with the Iraqi flag began spinning and the aircraft hovered off the ground, purring like an oversize Cadillac.

“Sir, you have the controls,” an American in the co-pilot’s seat said late last month.

“I have the controls,” replied the Iraqi pilot.

The helicopter lifted, banked hard to the right over a junkyard, a palm grove and a series of warehouses, then soared toward the greenish waters of the Tigris River at the perimeter of this base.

It would be an unremarkable sequence in almost any country, but here it is significant: it means that the Iraqi Air Force is flying again.

Like everything involving the rebuilding of Iraq’s security forces, the return of the air force is fraught with ambiguity. In fact, there may be no better illustration of what is right, wrong and intensely frustrating about the Iraqi armed forces than the four new Russian helicopters, called MI-17s, that for the moment are restricted to flying over the Taji Military Base on training missions.

The Iraqi government originally ordered a fleet of Russian helicopters from a Polish contractor as part of $400 million in arms deals in 2004 and 2005 that turned out to be corrupt. Lt. Gen. Nasier Abadi, the deputy commander of the Iraqi Joint

Forces, said in an interview that many of the helicopters in that deal were more than a quarter-century old and could never have been flown.

"It's the worst deal," General Abadi said. "They were beyond their lifetimes."

That deal, a serious embarrassment for both the United States and Iraq, has received wide publicity. But in an undisclosed development, General Abadi said, Iraq has renegotiated an arrangement that will now bring 28 new MI-17s to the air force. The four new helicopters at Taji, about 15 miles north of Baghdad, are part of that arrangement, he said.

The reason their use has been restricted is that the Iraqi military has so far been unable to purchase certain crucial onboard systems that the helicopters need to fly combat missions.

The Iraqi government's failure to fully outfit the helicopters is a source of huge frustration to the American officers who are working with the Iraqis. "It's painful," said Col. Dan Groeschen of the United States Air Force, the deputy commander of the Coalition Air Force Transition Team. "Iraqis are itching to get going, to fly on a mission."

The Iraqi Air Force once boasted more than 500 combat aircraft. Now it has around 20 helicopters and planes and has barely figured in discussions on rebuilding the Iraqi security forces.

There are no fighter planes in the current fleet and none are expected in the next few years at least, indicating that the United States will be responsible for air defenses here for some time to come.

"In that part of the world, what you call a territory without a couple hundred fighter planes is a protectorate," said John Pike, the director of GlobalSecurity.org, a defense information organization in Alexandria, Va., which has studied the history of the Iraqi Air Force.

As with so much else in Iraq, the United States underestimated the difficulty of rebuilding the country's air force, predicting that Iraqi helicopters would be flying by the summer of 2004.

No such thing happened, and Colonel Groeschen said the early effort was further slowed by a training crash in which four Americans and an Iraqi were killed. But the enterprise gradually made progress, and now 915 Iraqi Air Force personnel are tending, repairing and flying aircraft at American-run bases in Baghdad, Taji, Kirkuk and Basra.

Most of the aircraft are small reconnaissance planes and training helicopters with varying degrees of usefulness, although a set of multipurpose Huey helicopters is expected to arrive soon, after having been refurbished in the United States. For now, the pride of the fleet is a trio of 40-year-old C-130 cargo planes donated by the United States and flying out of the Baghdad airport.

Helping push the Iraqi effort along, Colonel Groeschen said, are 125 United States Air Force personnel on his transition team, a number that is expected to increase. Originally, most of the team lived and worked with the Iraqis as part of an ambitious countrywide program to embed American military personnel with Iraqis 24 hours a day as advisers and trainers.

But Colonel Groeschen said he was forced to put most of his team back in American quarters because the Iraqis refused to guard their camps carefully at night, failed to provide enough fuel for electrical generators and did not seem to be bothered by highly unsanitary conditions.

"I have a responsibility to take care of these guys, too," Colonel Groeschen said of his transition team. If the Iraqi side of the effort falls short, though, it will not be for lack of confidence on the part of its pilots. General S., a 52-year-old combat veteran who flew the MI-17 around Taji, and who asked that his name not be used for security reasons, said Iraqi pilots "are ready for any mission" and were already prepared to go beyond the training flights.

General S. compared himself to a fish that cannot live without water. "I cannot live without flying," he said.

A tour of the air base and compounds at Taji shows some of the progress that the program has made as well as the deep challenges it faces.

Near a hangar in one part of the base, a group of American and Iraqi mechanics clustered around a small American-made helicopter, a Jet Ranger with a damaged rear rotor. The American officers there said the Iraqi mechanics, like the pilots, had good technical skills but suffered from an inability to make decisions on their own, a legacy of the centralized, command-and-control style of the old Iraqi military.

That is why when it comes to the pilots, Colonel Groeschen said, the mission is not teaching them how to fly but "teaching them how to think." The United States plans to start a pilot school in the fall to end its reliance on officers who are products of the old military tradition, he said.

With so much history to overcome and so much uncertainty about the future, a simple flight on the MI-17, even just a training run, palpably eases the tension all around. After all, said Major Paul, an American who asked that only his first name be used, they are all pilots.

"The only thing that we look at and they look at is the ability to fly," Major Paul said. "There is that mutual respect, and it's independent of age or background or anything like that."

DOJ_NMG_0127113

He stood back and let General S., wearing a green flight suit and a black aviator's scarf, do his preflight inspection of the big helicopter, checking for cracks in the rotor blades, damage to the fuel tanks, problems with the tires. And then they took off, passing the controls back and forth as they practiced landings and takeoffs.

"Very nice," Major Paul said after General S. set the helicopter down squarely in the center of a landing strip. "We'll see if I can do that."

Oversight Panel Ready To Dig Into U.S. Waste, Fraud (AJC)

By Julia Malone

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 5, 2007

Washington — After years of stockpiling findings and allegations, Rep. Henry Waxman will unleash four days of hearings this week aimed at exposing an array of "waste, fraud and abuse" in government.

The new Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform — who already has a reputation as the most feared congressional inquisitor — is set to begin Tuesday by digging into the Bush administration's program to rebuild war-torn Iraq.

Scheduled first is former Ambassador L. Paul Bremer, who oversaw the early reconstruction effort.

Waxman's outline for the hearing says Bremer will be asked about allegations that the reconstruction agency he ran "filled positions with unqualified staff who were politically connected."

The oversight panel also is set to focus on private contractors hired to provide supplies for the U.S. military effort in Iraq, especially subcontractors working for Halliburton, the corporate giant once led by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Another target later in the week is the Department of Homeland Security and its multibillion-dollar contracts to modernize the aging Coast Guard fleet and to install a Secure Border Initiative network, or SBInet, to protect the nation's borders with a system of technology, cameras and sensors.

By Friday, the last of the opening barrage of Waxman hearings is scheduled to examine whether the pharmaceutical industry is bilking federal health programs by overcharging for prescription drugs.

Among those set to testify Friday is Patrick O'Connell, the Texas assistant attorney general who mobilized a team of lawyers to sue drug manufacturers for overcharging the Medicaid program.

The packed week of hearings is the product of the California congressman's pent-up desire to perform oversight, which had been restrained by a dozen years of Republican control of the House.

Now, with a staff that doubled from 40 to 80 positions, Waxman controls the agenda, not to mention the potential power of the subpoena.

A senior Bush administration official appeared to welcome the scrutiny.

"There cannot be enough accountability in the federal government," Clay Johnson, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, told The Associated Press last week.

He added that there is "very little real accountability" in federal operations.

Many government auditors regularly churn out critical reports on federal programs and contractors.

But those reports have little effect "unless the Congress takes them on and does something with it," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a private watchdog group.

She said that, for the most part, Congress has been ignoring government auditors, including inspectors general and the Defense Department's own contract agency.

She said she was hopeful that the new House would be stronger in oversight — largely because of the doggedness of Waxman.

"I don't see this as partisan," she said. "I do see this as Henry Waxman's strength."

Bremer Eager To Defend Record Overseeing Iraq (POL)

By Mike Allen

Pol – Bremer, Iraq legacy, February 3, 2007

L. Paul Bremer III, former administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, plans to point to unexpectedly chaotic conditions in post-Saddam Baghdad as he defends his record at a hearing on Iraq spending before House Democrats on Tuesday, according to sources familiar with his testimony.

This is the first aggressive exploration of the administration's Iraq contracts since Democrats took control of Congress last month. Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has billed it as a "hearing on waste, fraud and abuse," one some administration officials have been dreading.

Bremer, the civilian in charge of all of Iraq from May 2003 to June 2004, told Politico he looks forward to committee members' questions, but also plans to give them a 5,000- to 6,000-word treatise in addition to his five-minute opening statement.

"I welcome the opportunity to go up and talk about it," he said in a telephone interview. "In the letter of invitation, the committee spoke about their interest in lessons learned. Given the difficulty that we've encountered in reconstruction in Iraq, I think it's helpful to look at lessons learned. That's a good approach to have. I look it as a constructive opportunity for me to do that."

Bremer calls his longer, written statement "a more extensive explanation of the circumstances we faced on the ground and how we tried to deal with those circumstances - how they complicated everything we did."

The questioning from Waxman's committee is likely to get rough, but Bremer seemed unfazed. "If they can come up with some ways to provide some lessons learned from the experiences we had in Iraq, or how we approach this kind of a problem in the future," he said, "that would be a very helpful contribution to American government."

The former ambassador to the Netherlands declined to preview the substance of his testimony, saying he wants to save it for the committee. But one of Bremer's former colleagues, who has been helping him prepare, suggested he will use the forum to correct misperceptions.

"Some of the decisions made during his time there have been the subject of major debate and often rather shallow debate," said the former colleague, speaking anonymously because Bremer has not yet appeared before Congress. "So, in some respects, hopefully this can be a forum for longer discussion."

Waxman will follow up Bremer's testimony with a session Wednesday on the administration's "reliance on private military contractors" for Iraq reconstruction. Bremer "has been requested to testify regarding reconstruction activities during his tenure at the CPA, as well as an audit report from January 2005 that concluded that more than $8.8 billion in cash under the CPA's control was disbursed without adequate financial controls or accountability," a committee statement said.

Bremer, who was awarded a Presidential Medal of Freedom for his work in Iraq, served on the personal staffs of six secretaries of state. He later was managing director of Kissinger Associates and chairman of the National Commission on Terrorism.

In preparing for his Capitol Hill appearance, Bremer said he has talked to lawmakers in both parties. He said they told him of "understandable frustration which has shown in all of the opinion polls about the overall situation in Iraq, and that does color any political considerations at this point."

"That didn't surprise me, but it was certainly there," he added.

Bremer said he has also reviewed CPA orders and other documents "to refresh my memory so that I can be responsive."

Asked if he believed committee members would be genuinely inquisitive, Bremer said: "Generally, congressmen try to do their job seriously, and I hope that will be what happens."

Another witness will be Stuart Bowen, the special inspector for Iraq reconstruction. In a letter appended to a report released by Bowen's office in 2005, Bremer offered a blistering response to Bowen's draft conclusions about the oversight of CPA funds, saying his report "does not meet the standards Americans have come to expect of the inspector general."

Bremer criticized "the authors' failure to understand and acknowledge the context in which the CPA was operating and their failure to recognize the major steps the CPA took to address the admitted weaknesses of the Iraqi budgeting system."

A third witness will be Timothy Carney, coordinator for Iraqi transitional assistance, a retired ambassador filling a new State Department position created as part of the president's "new way forward" in Iraq.

In his memoir, "My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope," Bremer writes that he believed even before he went to Iraq that the United States needed more troops there. But recalling conversations the president had with his military commanders, Bremer said: "There were times when he was very direct and said, 'If you need more troops, I'll send them to you.' I remember many times when they simply said, 'We have enough troops to accomplish our mission.' "

KBR Faces Hearings On War Contracts (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Executives from government contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan, including KBR and Compass of the UK, face a rocky ride in Washington this week as Henry Waxman, the congressman, begins hearings on allegations of “waste, fraud and abuse”.

The hearings, which begin on Tuesday, are expected to mark the beginning of a new phase in which contracting practices are subject to tougher oversight.

Mr Waxman chairs the chief investigative committee in the House of Representatives. He has been a dogged critic of the Bush administration’s handling of billions of dollars of US taxpayers’ money in Iraq re-construction contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0127115

The committee has called on the chief executives of Blackwater, a security contractor, KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton, and Compass, food services group, among others, to answer questions.

The hearing will feature testimony of family members of four Blackwater employees who were killed in Falluja in 2004, and whose bodies were burned and dragged through the streets. The families are suing Blackwater for wrongful death.

Mr Waxman is likely to focus his line of inquiry on allegations that Halliburton wrongly entered into a subcontracting arrangement with ESS, a division of Compass that ran a dining facility in Iraq, which in turn used Blackwater to provide it with security services.

Halliburton controls a $16bn contract in Iraq, known as Logcap, which provides logistical support to US troops.

Under provisions of the contract, Halliburton can only rely on US military – not private security companies such as Blackwater – to provide armed protection.

In response to questions from Congress, the Department of Defense in July said that KBR had "no knowledge" of Blackwater having been hired by any of its -subcontractors.

But in a memo Mr Waxman subsequently received from Compass, the company admitted that ESS had used Blackwater and that the US security group had been deployed by other subcontractors.

Mr Waxman said in a letter to Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, in December that the security subcontract raised "serious questions" about the oversight exercised by Halliburton and the Pentagon regarding the tiering of subcontractors, and whether it was "proper" for Halliburton to bill the government for the services.

Compass said Steve Murray, the director of contracting at ESS, would testify at the hearing, scheduled for Wednesday, in spite of the fact that the committee had invited Compass chief executive Richard Cousins. Blackwater and KBR declined to answer questions about whether the chief executives of the groups would appear.

Iraq Accuses Syria Of Helping Rebels (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government on Sunday accused Syria of harboring insurgents fomenting violence here after a massive suicide bombing the previous day killed at least 130 people in a Shiite neighborhood of the capital.

The allegation strained relations with Iraq's neighbor just weeks after the two resumed diplomatic ties, and it led to squabbling among Iraqi politicians during a parliamentary session.

"I confirm that 50% of murders and bombings are by Arab extremists coming from Syria," government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said at a joint news conference with the top U.S. military spokesman inside Baghdad's heavily protected Green Zone. "They come from Syria, and we have evidence to prove it."

No such evidence was presented during the session with reporters.

Meanwhile, a Shiite Muslim lawmaker clashed with the Sunni Arab speaker of parliament, Mahmoud Mashadani, when he called for expelling Syrians and closing Iraq's entire border. "Be careful about what you say," Mashadani said, "because we have half a million Iraqis there."

After more heated arguments between Mashadani and Shiite lawmakers, the speaker abruptly ended the parliamentary session.

Syria is predominantly Sunni and since 2003 has been home to many Sunnis who have fled Iraq, including members of the Sunni-dominated regime of Saddam Hussein.

Iraq's current government, elected in the wake of the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Hussein, is largely Shiite.

The accusations drew angry responses from Syrian officials, who called them unsubstantiated.

"If they had just one piece of evidence, they would have presented it a long time ago," Mahdi Dakhlallah, Syria's former information minister, told Al Arabiya television.

Mohammed Habash, a Syrian lawmaker, said on the same program that the United States had put "40 million weapons" into the wrong hands by disbanding Iraq's army after it invaded.

"These weapons are now available on the black market in Iraq, sold by people with no conscience," he said.

"I would like to ask, is it believable that a tanker loaded with a … ton of explosives landed at Baghdad airport from Damascus?" Habash said. "Do you think [they] would need to import weapons from another place?"

American soldiers on Saturday discovered more than 1,100 mortar rounds buried in a stash just south of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Sunday. Army Maj. Mark Aitken described it as a "supermarket-type cache," drawn upon by insurgents for multiple attacks.

The explosives, which could be made into roadside bombs, were detonated in a blast heard more than 20 miles away.

DOJ_NMG_0127116

In the immediate aftermath of the March 2003 invasion, American troops left many Iraqi arms depots unguarded, and large quantities of weapons and munitions were stolen by looters.

Recently, U.S. officials have accused predominantly Shiite Iran of provoking instability in Iraq, but they have not produced evidence linking Tehran to attacks on American troops in Iraq.

There is "a gap between what we know and what we're willing to discuss," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a U.S. military spokesman, said at the news conference with Dabbagh.

The statements by Iraqi and American officials blaming Iraq's neighbors left many ordinary Iraqis unimpressed.

Ahmed Biden observed the death and destruction in the Sadriya neighborhood, where a truck filled with a ton of explosives detonated Saturday, leveling dozens of houses and shops.

"After what I saw, I swore that I would destroy the government," Biden said. "All they do is denounce and accuse countries like Syria and Iran for standing behind the violence. How long are we going to go on like this? We are fed up with denouncements."

A mother wept over her two dead sons. A cart held the severed limbs of victims. Tired men and women searched through the rubble, helped by Shiite militiamen affiliated with anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Biden watched, his eyes filling with tears, as residents pulled bodies from the heap of concrete and metal that was once a flourishing market.

At least 10 more bodies were found Sunday, three of them children, authorities said. That suggested an even higher death toll than 130, although officials said they could not confirm that.

Some residents became angry at a photographer, threatening to break his camera. Others defended him, saying he should take pictures "so that the world would see what had happened," Biden said.

Even as families buried their dead and overtaxed physicians labored throughout the day at Baghdad's main hospitals to treat the hundreds of wounded, new attacks Sunday brought more death to the capital and elsewhere in Iraq.

American officials at a base near Baghdad's airport said a new security plan for the capital would be implemented starting this week. An additional 21,500 U.S. troops are to be sent to Iraq under President Bush's plan. Most will deploy to Baghdad, where they will be based alongside Iraqi police and soldiers in small units in a number of yet-to-be-identified neighborhoods. An additional 8,000 to 10,000 Iraqi troops will also be brought to Baghdad from the south and north, authorities say.

Some troops have already arrived. Others are due in coming weeks, said Caldwell, who urged patience.

"It is important to acknowledge that it will not turn the security situation overnight," said the general, who also confirmed for the first time that all four American helicopters that have crashed in Iraq since Jan. 20 were brought down by "ground fire." He did not elaborate.

Twenty-one U.S. troops and private security contractors were killed in the crashes.

At least 3,098 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since March 2003, according to icasualties.org, which tracks military deaths.

By comparison, at least 1,000 Iraqis were killed in the last week alone, an Interior Ministry official told the Associated Press. In an average week, about 840 Iraqis are killed, according to the United Nations.

On Sunday, officials said bombings, assassinations and mortar rounds had killed at least 73 people.

Authorities recovered at least 33 bodies in various parts of Baghdad. In addition, a barrage of mortar shells fired at a Sunni neighborhood killed 15 people and injured 56.

In the capital's south, seven people died in a clash between Sunnis and Shiites before U.S. soldiers arrived.

A roadside bomb aimed at a police patrol killed four officers and injured two in central Baghdad. A similar bomb meant for police killed a civilian and injured three people.

A car bomb exploded at a minibus terminal in downtown Baghdad, killing four and injuring seven, all of them passengers inside a bus.

A car bomb went off near a cooking gas stall, killing two people. A bomb exploded near a bakery in south Baghdad, injuring five. Elsewhere, drive-by gunmen killed two people and wounded three.

South of the capital in Haswa, a bomb injured three women, and in Hillah, an Iraqi army colonel was found slain. In Wasit province, the body of an Iraqi soldier who had been beheaded and whose right hand was severed was fished out of the Tigris River.

Two other bodies were found floating in that part of the river, both men shot in the head and chest. Gunmen in Basra assassinated a prominent local Shiite leader affiliated with cleric Sadr.

Officers With PhDs Advising War Effort (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, is assembling a small band of warrior-intellectuals -- including a quirky Australian anthropologist, a Princeton economist who is the son of a former U.S. attorney general and a military expert on the Vietnam War sharply critical of its top commanders -- in an eleventh-hour effort to reverse the downward trend in the Iraq war.

Army officers tend to refer to the group as "Petraeus guys." They are smart colonels who have been noticed by Petraeus, and who make up one of the most selective clubs in the world: military officers with doctorates from top-flight universities and combat experience in Iraq.

Essentially, the Army is turning the war over to its dissidents, who have criticized the way the service has operated there the past three years, and is letting them try to wage the war their way.

"Their role is crucial if we are to reverse the effects of four years of conventional mind-set fighting an unconventional war," said a Special Forces colonel who knows some of the officers.

But there is widespread skepticism that even this unusual group, with its specialized knowledge of counterinsurgency methods, will be able to win the battle of Baghdad.

"Petraeus's 'brain trust' is an impressive bunch, but I think it's too late to salvage success in Iraq," said a professor at a military war college, who said he thinks that the general will still not have sufficient troops to implement a genuine counterinsurgency strategy and that the United States really has no solution for the sectarian violence tearing apart Iraq.

"It's too late to make a difference in Iraq," agreed Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University expert on terrorism who has advised the U.S. government on the war effort.Expanded Role for Academics

Having academic specialists advise top commanders is not new. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., Petraeus's predecessor, established a small panel of counterinsurgency experts, but it was limited to an advisory role. Also, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, created a "Red Team" to examine his operations from the enemy's perspective and to report directly to him.

Still, the team being assembled by Petraeus promises to be both larger and more influential than anything seen in the U.S. war effort so far, both making plans and helping to implement them. The group's members are very much in the high-energy mold of Petraeus, whose 2003-04 tour commanding the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, the biggest city in northern Iraq, gave the U.S. military one of its few notable success stories of the war. He also holds a PhD in international affairs from Princeton University.

"I cannot think of another case of so many highly educated officers advising a general," said Carter Malkasian, who has advised Marine Corps commanders in Iraq on counterinsurgency and himself holds an Oxford doctorate in the history of war.

As the U.S.-designed campaign to bring security to Baghdad unfolds, Petraeus's chief economic adviser, Col. Michael J. Meese, will coordinate security and reconstruction efforts, trying to ensure that "build" follows the "clear" and "hold" phases of action. Meese also holds a PhD from Princeton, where he studied how the Army historically handled budget cuts. He is the son of former attorney general Edwin Meese III, who was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose December critique helped push the Bush administration to shift its approach in Baghdad.

Petraeus, who along with the group's members declined to be interviewed for this article, has chosen as his chief adviser on counterinsurgency operations an outspoken officer in the Australian Army. Lt. Col. David Kilcullen holds a PhD in anthropology, for which he studied Islamic extremism in Indonesia.

Kilcullen has served in Cyprus, Papua New Guinea and East Timor and most recently was chief strategist for the State Department's counterterrorism office, lent by the Australian government. His 2006 essay "Twenty-Eight Articles: Fundamentals of Company-Level Counterinsurgency" was read by Petraeus, who sent it rocketing around the Army via e-mail. Among Kilcullen's dictums: "Rank is nothing: talent is everything" -- a subversive thought in an organization as hierarchical as the U.S. military.Veteran Strategists

The two most influential members of the brain trust are likely to be Col. Peter R. Mansoor and Col. H.R. McMaster, whose influence already outstrips their rank. Both men served on a secret panel convened last fall by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to review Iraq strategy. The panel's core conclusion, never released to the public but briefed to President Bush on Dec. 13, according to an officer on the Joint Staff, was that the U.S. government should "go long" in Iraq by shifting from a combat stance to a long-term training-and-advisory effort.

But to make that shift, the review also concluded, the U.S. military might first have to "spike" its presence by about 20,000 to 30,000 troops to curb sectarian violence and improve security in Baghdad. That is almost exactly what the U.S. government hopes to do over the next eight months.

Mansoor, who commanded a brigade of the 1st Armored Division in Baghdad in 2003-04, received a PhD at Ohio State for a dissertation on how U.S. Army infantry divisions were developed during World War II. He will be Petraeus's executive officer in Baghdad, a key figure in implementing the general's decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0127118

McMaster's command of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in northwestern Iraq in 2005-06 provided one of the few bright spots for the U.S. military in Iraq over that year. In a patiently executed campaign, he took back the city of Tall Afar from a terrorist group, and he was so successful that Bush dedicated much of a speech to the operation. McMaster, author of the well-received book "Dereliction of Duty," about the failures of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the Vietnam War, is expected to operate for Petraeus as a long-distance adviser on strategy. He is based this year at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London think tank, but is likely to visit Iraq every month or two, according to a top U.S. military officer.

Beyond those senior officers is a larger ring of advisers whose views already are shaping planning for the coming operation in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Douglas A. Ollivant caught Petraeus's eye last year by winning first prize in an Army "counterinsurgency writing" competition, sponsored by the general, with an essay that scorned the U.S. military's reliance in Iraq on big "forward operating bases." "Having a fortress mentality simply isolates the counterinsurgent from the fight," he wrote.

Ollivant, a veteran of battles in Najaf and Fallujah who earned a political science PhD studying Thomas Jefferson, argued that U.S. forces should instead operate from patrol bases shared with Iraqi military and police units. That is exactly what Petraeus plans to do in the coming months in Baghdad, setting up about three dozen such outposts across the city -- which isn't surprising, considering Ollivant has become a top planner for the U.S. military in Baghdad.

Another adviser will be Ahmed S. Hashim, a professor of strategy at the Naval War College who served as a military intelligence officer in Iraq and then wrote a book sharply critical of how the U.S. military has operated there. Hashim, who holds a PhD from MIT, concluded his critique by arguing that the best course would be to partition the country along ethnic and sectarian lines.A Different Arena

Many military insiders are skeptical that the extra brainpower ultimately will make much difference, or that lessons learned by McMaster in Tall Afar or Petraeus in Mosul will be easily applied in the far larger arena of Baghdad.

The joke among some staff officers was that Petraeus operated in such a freewheeling manner in Iraq's north that he had his own foreign policy with Syria and Turkey. In Baghdad, by contrast, he will have to operate constantly with Iraqi officials, with the U.S. government bureaucracy, and in the global media spotlight. Also, experts agree that the basic problem in Iraq is political, not military, and that although a military campaign can create a breathing space for politicians, it cannot by itself reverse the dynamic driving Iraqis to fight a civil war.

"It wouldn't surprise me if Congress pulled the rug out or the Iraqis blocked major revisions in strategy," said Erin M. Simpson, a Harvard University counterinsurgency expert. "I think they're going to be a very frustrated group."

Kilcullen, the counterinsurgency adviser, wrote recently on the Web site Small Wars Journal, "All that the new strategy can do is give us a fighting chance of success, and it certainly does give us that."

Covert British Unit A 'Secret Weapon' In Iraq (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Deep inside the heart of the Green Zone, the heavily fortified administrative compound in Baghdad, lies one of the most carefully guarded secrets of the war in Iraq.

It is a cell from a small and anonymous British army unit that goes by the innocuous name of the Joint Support Group (JSG), and it has proved to be one of the coalition's most effective and deadly weapons in the fight against terror.

Its members -- servicemen and women of all ranks recruited from all three of the British armed forces -- are trained to turn hardened terrorists into coalition spies using methods developed on the streets of Northern Ireland, where the British Army managed to infiltrate the Irish Republican Army (IRA) at almost every level.

Since war broke out in Iraq in 2003, the cell has been responsible for running dozens of Iraqi double agents.

Working alongside the Special Air Service (SAS) and the American Delta Force as part of the Baghdad-based counterterrorist unit known as Task Force Black, the cell members have supplied intelligence that has saved hundreds of lives and resulted in some of the most notable successes against the myriad terror groups fighting in Iraq.

Last week, sources said, intelligence from the JSG led to a series of successful operations against Sunni militia groups in southern Baghdad.

Information obtained by the cell also is understood to have inspired one of the most successful operations carried out by Task Force Black, in November 2005, when SAS snipers fatally shot three would-be suicide bombers.

The killing of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaeda in Iraq until his death in June, came after intelligence obtained by the JSG, as did the rescue of kidnapped British peace campaigner, Norman Kember.

DOJ_NMG_0127119

"The JSG is the coalition's secret weapon," said one defense source. "Their job is to recruit and run covert human intelligence sources or agents -- we never use the term informer. The Americans are in awe of the unit because they have nothing like them within their military."

During the long-running unrest in Northern Ireland, the JSG operated under the cover name of the Force Research Unit (FRU), which from the early 1980s to the late 1990s managed to penetrate the very heart of the IRA.

By targeting and then "turning" members of the paramilitary organization with a variety of "inducements," ranging from blackmail to bribes, the FRU operators developed agents at virtually every command level within the IRA.

The JSG recruits personnel up to age 42. Candidates who get through a rigorous pre-selection process spend four months in Britain being taught driving and close-quarter battle skills.

Most important, volunteers must be able to befriend people they actually may despise, win their trust and persuade them to become agents, which in some cases means getting them to inform on friends and relatives. Those who pass the course can expect to be posted to Iraq and Afghanistan.

JSG operators deal with dozens of Iraqis every week who are prepared, for a variety of reasons, to become informers.

"Some Iraqis come to us because they are simply fed up with the violence," one source said. "They may have had members of their families murdered, tortured or kidnapped.

"Unlike much of the middle class, which has already fled the country, they may be too poor to leave and so they come to us to see if they can make a difference."

To senior U.S. officers in Baghdad, the JSG is playing a vital role in the most important theater of the war on terror.

"In many respects, Afghanistan is a side issue, and that is something the Americans understand better than British politicians," a source said. "Ask any senior officer in Baghdad, given a choice, which war would they be prepared to lose and they will say the war in Afghanistan.

"In many respects, the war in Iraq has redefined insurgent warfare. Think of the very worst of Northern Ireland combined with the very worst of the Balkans and you are coming close to life on a daily basis in Baghdad."

Officer Fights A Battle All His Own (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

Olympia, Wash. — The soldier stands in his living room eyeing all the cool soldier stuff he never got to use in a real fight. Like the helmet with not a single ding and the sleek body armor with not a scuff. The gear piles high on the carpet.

First Lt. Ehren Watada is giving it all back and, out of courtesy, packing it up. The Army had treated him with utmost respect until the moment it decided to court-martial him. It was nothing personal. The Army does what it has to do.

Just like Watada himself did what he felt he had to do seven months ago when he became the first — and only — commissioned officer in the United States to publicly refuse deployment to Iraq.

His conscience, he said, had overtaken him. He told the world what he had privately told his superiors months earlier: that he believed the war was illegal and immoral, and he would play no role in it.

Watada tried to resign; the Army respectfully denied him. He said he was willing to fight in Afghanistan; the Army refused him again: A soldier can't pick and choose where he fights. As his unit shipped off to Iraq, Watada stayed to face the consequences.

Thousands of GIs have gone AWOL or voiced opposition to the Iraq war, but when an officer says he won't go, the whole military machine must take note. It means dissent has crept up the chain of command, potentially undermining the war effort.

The Army felt compelled to respond forcefully, charging Watada, 28, with one count of failure to deploy and four (later reduced to two) counts of "conduct unbecoming" for making public statements against the war and against the Bush administration. His court-martial begins today at Ft. Lewis, 15 miles north of here.

Watada ponders the prospect of spending four years in military prison, and he muses on his spiral from exemplary military man to reviled antiwar poster boy.

"Life has been ... " He laughs nervously and shakes his head, searching for words. "A little abnormal."

His living room, like the rest of the apartment complex, feels boxy and new and unmistakably inexpensive — made for function rather than form. A balcony looks out at a parking lot crowded with pickups and SUVs.

In the middle of the room he stands in stocking feet, wearing baggy fatigues like pajamas, hands on hips. He's deciding where to begin the packing. When all the world seemed chaotic, it made sense to organize. Should he start with his barely mussed chemical suit or his spotless all-weather traction-control camouflage boots?

DOJ_NMG_0127120

His smooth brown face is boyish and devoted, like a child inspecting his most precious toys. He's not a small man, but not big either. Certainly not as big as the Rushmore-sized symbol he's become to the antiwar movement, which hails him as nothing less than an American hero.

But he also bears no sign of the sniveling qualities ascribed him by pro-war groups that have branded him a coward. One syndicated columnist posted Watada's Army photo on her website with the caption: "The face of a deserter."

With everyone judging him, he wants to make one thing clear. "I'm not afraid to fight," he says. "I'm not a pacifist. If our country needed defending, I'd be the first one to pick up a rifle. But I won't be part of a war that I believe is criminal."

Watada calls himself "an ordinary American" and a patriot who unwittingly found himself in a moral dilemma he could never have imagined when he first put on a uniform 18 years ago. That's when the story begins, according to his mother, Carolyn Ho, a high school counselor in Honolulu.

It all started because she thought Cub Scout uniforms were cute.

The uniforms also represented wholesome activity. Ho and her then-husband, Bob Watada, wanted to keep their two young sons out of the malls and out of trouble. Ehren was the thoughtful one; his older brother, Lorin, the rambunctious one.

Ehren thrived on the order and discipline, and the little rewards that marked one's ascension up the scouting ranks. "He was the sort who studied for every merit badge possible," Ho says.

Thus Watada's kinship with the uniformed life was born. He went from Cub to Boy to Eagle Scout, and he had an inkling as early as 15 that he would end up in the armed forces. As an Eagle Scout, he got the idea of carving out a hiking trail on a hillside abutting a neighborhood park in Honolulu.

Neighbors privately snickered. Sure, kid. Go ahead. Good luck.

Ho says she still beams whenever she drives past the park today and she spots the trail zigzagging up the hill. That's my son's work, she thinks. It took many months. She'd never doubt his resolve again.

Ho tells one other story. At Kalani High School, where Watada was a four-sport athlete, he reported a fellow football player who had been stealing money from the cafeteria coffer. "He risked ostracism [as a snitch] in a very small, tight-knit community," Ho says. "But he's like that, very principled."

Ho is calling from a hotel in Indiana. Her ex-husband Bob is in a hotel in Washington, D.C. Both parents have spent the last six months speaking at schools and churches across the nation, telling their son's story and lobbying the government to acquit him.

The parents shudder at the thought of their son behind bars. Invariably, both Ho and Bob Watada entertain fleeting misgivings: Maybe joining Cub Scouts was a mistake. Maybe, Bob Watada says, he should have tried harder to persuade his son to simply go to Iraq and "lie low."

Lying low is better than prison.

But there's a counterpart to their parental protectiveness.

Rebecca Davis, head of a Maine-based group called Military Families Voice of Victory, prays every day for her son, Stuart, who is serving in Iraq. Davis has publicly called Watada a traitor. "What he's done," she says," is embolden an enemy who is aiming for my son's head."

Watada, kneeling on the carpet with an arm buried deep in an olive-green duffel, explains his epiphany about the war in Iraq. It was the slo-mo kind, not the brilliant flash of lightning in the night.

The way he tells it, the arc of his realization somewhat followed that of many Americans. That is, he believed at the beginning but grew disillusioned as the justifications for the war proved false and the strategy, flawed.

In 2003, after graduating near the top of his class at Hawaii Pacific University, he walked into a recruiting station in Honolulu and hopscotched from Officer Candidate School to his first tour of duty in Korea, where his superiors rated him exemplary.

His battalion commander, whom Watada won't name so as not to drag him into his predicament, spoke long and often of the paramount importance of preparation.

"He told us, 'If you don't know all there is to know about your mission, you're failing yourself and you're failing your soldiers,' " Watada says, still kneeling. He folds his hands in front of him now and looks vaguely like someone pleading or about to propose. "I took the lesson to heart."

So when he was reassigned to Ft. Lewis in early 2005 in anticipation of deploying to Iraq, he did his job: He got to know everything there was to know about Iraq. He spent nights online, read books, talked to combat veterans, devoured media reports.

At the end of 2005, he was convinced the Bush administration had purposefully manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion and the congressional approval of the war therefore was based on lies.

DOJ_NMG_0127121

He said he was so anguished by his conclusion and the knowledge that he would soon be "participating in the madness" that he grew deeply depressed. In December 2005, he sought guidance from a chaplain and a mental-health counselor. Neither helped. He considered filing for conscientious objector status but couldn't in good conscience, he says, because he does not oppose bearing arms.

"I was in this situation where I knew something was wrong," he says, still on his knees, "but I was being forced to do it anyway. It felt like I was in an invisible prison of my own making. It's a terrible place to be."

Then it occurred to him: He'd rather risk the other kind of prison. It would be difficult but ultimately easier to live with. In January 2006, he submitted a letter of resignation, was refused, and the process rolled inexorably to where it is today.

The Army could have chosen to accept Watada's resignation. Court-martialing him, however, sends a clear message to other officers thinking about defying orders to deploy. During a preliminary hearing in August, Army prosecutor Capt. Dan Kuecker called Watada's actions "dishonorable" and "disgraceful."

For his part, Watada doesn't blame the Army as much as he blames the administration. The Army does what it must to function. Military culture has always presumed that individuals lose certain kinds of freedom when joining the armed forces.

"The idea is when you put on a uniform, you put your personal opinions to the side," says Kathleen Duignan, executive director of the National Institute of Military Justice in Washington, D.C. A military could not be effective if soldiers had the option to choose which wars to fight and which to forego.

Duignan says the best known case that parallels Watada's occurred in 1965 during the Vietnam War, when 2nd Lt. Henry Howe was caught participating in an antiwar demonstration. The Army court-martialed Howe and sentenced him to two years of hard labor.

Watada's unit deployed to Iraq last summer. He has been doing administrative work ever since, barred from traveling farther than 250 miles from Ft. Lewis. His life settled into a workaday routine — going to work, coming home to his little apartment and wondering what the future holds.

Standing up, crossing his arms as if in defiance, he says he believes history will absolve him no matter what happens in court this week.

At the base, there have been no blatant acts of hostility. "But, yes," Watada says, "you can feel the seething just underneath."

During what was supposed to be a casual football scrimmage among officers late last year, two majors "accidentally" broke Watada's nose. One major shoved, the other smacked. Watada for weeks walked around with two black eyes, a crooked beak and a sneaking hunch it was no accident.

But what encourages him is how much quiet support he receives from individual soldiers. The support, he says, isn't showy. "Nobody wants any part of me officially," he says, laughing that nervous laugh again. There are the approving nods, the knowing glances, the subtle remarks about hanging in there and keeping the chin up.

"It happens almost every day," Watada says. And it makes him think that maybe, just maybe, a whole lot of other uniformed souls feel the same way he does and just haven't figured out a way to say so.

American Takes Over Command Of NATO Force In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 4 — A senior American officer, Gen. Dan K. McNeill, took over command of the 35,000-member NATO force in Afghanistan from the departing British commander on Sunday, ahead of an expected spring offensive by a resurgent Taliban.

General McNeill inherits a force that has expanded its mission to cover all of Afghanistan and is still struggling to contain the Taliban. Although the group was largely defeated in 2002, it mounted a strong comeback last year, leading to the bloodiest fighting in the country since the beginning of the war in 2001.

The new commander will have some advantages his predecessor did not. He has been promised several thousand extra troops in the south, where much of the violence has been centered, although he will continue to have to work with some NATO countries that are restricting where their troops can be used.

The transfer of command came on a day when NATO forces sent a tough message to the Taliban, using an airstrike to kill a commander whose forces overran a town in southern Afghanistan last week.

General McNeill served as commander of United States-led coalition forces in Afghanistan from 2002 to 2003, long before NATO began to take over operations. He is returning for a one-year tour as commander of the United Nations-mandated International Security Assistance Force, drawn from 37 contributing nations.

DOJ_NMG_0127122

His primary mission will be to facilitate the reconstruction of Afghanistan, so that the "Afghan people might enjoy self-determination, education, health, and the peaceful realization of their hopes and dreams," he told a gathering at the change-of-command ceremony at NATO headquarters in Kabul on Sunday.

"We will quit neither post nor mission until the job is done or we are properly relieved," he said. "We will not leave a fallen comrade."

NATO troops expanded their mission to cover all of Afghanistan in 2006, taking over military operations in the south and absorbing mainly American forces in the east.

The departing NATO commander, Gen. David Richards, said in an interview before the ceremony that he expected a surge of violence as the Taliban prepared to carry out a spring offensive. But he said the NATO force, now reinforced by the extra troops that he repeatedly requested, was well-placed to defeat the Taliban militarily.

But in his speech before several hundred soldiers, diplomats and politicians, including the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, the general warned that full victory in Afghanistan would take more than military success. What was needed beyond that, he said, was more reconstruction and development, a good system of government and improved relations with Pakistan, which Afghanistan has accused of continuing to support the Taliban.

The Taliban warned Sunday that 2007 would be the bloodiest year for foreign troops in Afghanistan, in comments to [a news agency] that were apparently timed to the change of command. And in what may be the opening salvo of a new campaign of violence, gunmen suspected of being Taliban fighters killed two senior Muslim clerics in the southern city of Kandahar: the deputy head of the religious council, Maulavi Sayed Amam Mutawal, and the caretaker of Afghanistan's holiest shrine, Shafi Akhund Zada, Agence France-Presse reported.

General Richards's parting shot was an airstrike on Sunday morning, which occurred just 90 minutes before the change of command. The strike killed a Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, who seized control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand Province on Thursday night and detained local leaders and members of the police.

The precision-guided airstrike killed the commander and 10 of his guards as he was driving in an open area called Ghundai, outside the town, according to residents. There were no other casualties, they said. A NATO spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, confirmed that the strike killed a "key Taliban leader," but he did not provide a name.

In October, the governor of Helmand negotiated a controversial agreement under which British troops within NATO and Taliban forces withdrew from the town, leaving a council of tribal elders in charge.

The agreement, which brought a temporary peace to the town but left the Taliban at large, signaled NATO's search for more conciliatory ways of dealing with the insurgency. The accord was criticized by American officials and members of the Afghan government for giving in to the Taliban, but General Richards and diplomats from other NATO countries defended it as an important step in driving a wedge between the local population and the Taliban and encouraging Afghans to resolve their own security issues.

On Sunday, he praised the courage of the tribal elders for standing up to the Taliban and promised NATO's support.

Despite the Americans' criticism of the agreement, General McNeill said he did not intend to change that strategy and would not risk shedding the blood of British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers in the area if the elders could resolve the issue of the town's control.

General McNeill's appointment, and his previous tour conducting combat operations in Afghanistan, has raised concerns among some NATO countries that he will conduct a more aggressive operation. President Karzai welcomed him as a friend who was "with the Afghan people from the beginning of the war on terror." Yet he is also remembered as the general in charge when two Afghan detainees died from beatings in American custody at Bagram Air Base in December 2002.

General Richards indicated that he doubted that his successor would significantly change the way NATO forces operated. He said that General McNeill would inherit a NATO plan and operation that the 37 contributing nations had signed up for, and that he would be under their orders. "Even if he was inclined to make radical changes, he can't do it easily," he said. "How he implements them on the ground is up to him."

General McNeill is the highest-ranking American to serve in Afghanistan; his previous post was commanding general of the United States Army Forces Command. His appointment is accompanied by a significant increase in troops and resources for Afghanistan.

The Bush administration is asking Congress for $10.6 billion to train and equip the Afghan Army and the police force and for reconstruction. The general will also have under his command the 3,200 American troops whose tour of duty was extended last month and an additional 800 British and 1,000 Polish soldiers, providing him with a vital reserve force for the south and southeastern regions where the insurgency is strongest.

DOJ_NMG_0127123

Some 14,000 American soldiers will be under his command within the NATO force in Afghanistan. An additional 11,000 American service members, who are training the Afghan Army and the police and conducting counterterrorism operations, will remain in Afghanistan under American two-star generals.

Under Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the departing commander of American coalition forces, the 14,000 American soldiers have focused on training and working as partners with Afghan forces. They also have taken on operations that are focused as much on reconstruction as on combat.

General Richards said American forces were uniquely capable of combining military and development operations. “They’ll have a road coming into a valley the day after they have cleared it out of Taliban,” he said.

Other NATO forces have to catch up on combining reconstruction and military operations so that one flows directly from the other and does not allow a vacuum for the Taliban to exploit, General Eikenberry said in a recent interview.

“You can launch your military operation and then look over your shoulder and find that there are going to be extraordinary delays in delivering the nonmilitary means — and you could actually make things worse,” he said.

“It’s not about thinking how we are going to fight into the area — that can be the relatively easy part of it,” he said. The real challenge is to make Afghans feel they are connected to their government, he added.

NATO needs to combine more forces with Afghan forces in strategic places and urgently move forward with reconstruction and nonmilitary assistance if it is to counter the expected Taliban spring offensive, he said.

Musharraf's Stale Promises (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

In the months after Sept. 11, 2001, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf was a new and shaky U.S. ally. He decided to side with the Bush administration against al-Qaeda, but there were persistent reports that elements of his army still supported the Afghan Taliban. He was an autocratic ruler who had seized power in a military coup against a democratic government, but in a televised speech to his nation in January 2002, he promised to turn Pakistan into a tolerant, "moderate Muslim" society. Largely because it had little choice, the Bush administration decided to give him the benefit of the doubt.

Five years later, little in Pakistan has changed. Musharraf is still promising a moderate and tolerant regime -- but there are still reports that his army is quietly helping the Taliban. He's also still promising democracy -- but just as in 2002, he's preparing to rig Pakistan's upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections to ensure that his term is extended and his power unchallenged.

What has changed is the response of the Bush administration. Five years ago it portrayed itself as giving Musharraf a chance to perform. Now it defends and apologizes for the general, despite his chronic failure to deliver.

The most recent example of this came 10 days ago, during a visit to the country by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright. Islamabad was in an uproar over the news that Musharraf intends to seek a new five-year term next fall in a way that most of the country's civilian politicians consider undemocratic and unconstitutional. The other subject of conversation was legislation passed by the Democratic-controlled U.S. House during its "100 hours" blitz. It would condition future aid to the Pakistani military on Bush's certification that Pakistan "is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control."

The House measure, backed by the new Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, California's Tom Lantos, was a logical response to recent reports by U.S. commanders that the Taliban leadership is based in Pakistan and that cross-border movements of insurgents are increasing. But Gastright rushed to assure Musharraf's government that the administration opposed it. "The president can certify that," Gastright said of the Taliban metric without explaining the basis for his confidence. "The issue is, he shouldn't have to."

Gastright went on to endorse what he said were steps by Musharraf to promote press and political freedom ahead of the elections: "That's an impressive track record," the Associated Press quoted him as saying. Then he said the administration was pleased with Musharraf's handling of the greatest criminal proliferator of nuclear weapons in history, A.Q. Khan, who was quickly pardoned in 2004 and then shielded from U.S. or U.N. interrogation. Musharraf had "a superb record addressing the legacy of the A.Q. Khan network," Gastright said.

It's at this point in a column like this that administration officials pop up to point out that the relationship with Musharraf is "complicated," that he has the right intentions and that he needs to be supported as well as urged to do more. Whatever his performance or lack of it, the argument goes, Musharraf is better than the alternatives in Pakistan, which include Islamic extremists and anti-Western generals. It's the same argument that's used to defend continued U.S. pandering to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

In Musharraf's case it's particularly perverse. That's because the second most popular leader in Pakistan behind Musharraf, according to polling by the International Republican Institute, is not an Islamist but former prime minister Benazir Bhutto, the leader of the moderate and pro-Western Pakistan People's Party. Bhutto and her party have made it clear that they would be willing to accept Musharraf in exchange for fair parliamentary elections and an end to criminal charges that keep Bhutto in exile. The PPP and the Muslim League party of former prime minister Nawaz Sharif have formed the Alliance for Restoration of Democracy; they are the obvious partners for a government that genuinely aims to modernize the country and marginalize Islamic extremism.

Only Musharraf refuses to deal with them. His supporters say he intends to extend his mandate by staging a presidential vote by the existing parliament and provincial assemblies -- which make up Pakistan's equivalent of the electoral college -- though they were elected in the rigged balloting of 2002 and their terms expire on the same day as the president's. For that maneuver he won't need Bhutto or Sharif or their parties -- and so he won't have to meet their demands for fair parliamentary elections.

In private, the Bush administration has been urging Musharraf for some time to come to terms with Pakistan's moderate democrats. And they've been asking him for years to stop allowing sanctuary for the Taliban. He's not responding. So what's wrong with congressional conditions? They might just produce what's been missing from Musharraf the past five years: results.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Justice Department Balks At Privacy Provision In Telephone Rules Under Review (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON – Federal regulators working on rules to secure the calling records and other private information of telephone customers are running into resistance from phone companies and law enforcement agencies.

The rules, an effort by the Federal Communications Commission to combat "pretexting," are circulating among the commissioners for comment and may be voted on this month.

Pretexting is the practice of impersonating a phone customer to gain access to his phone records. President Bush signed a law last month criminalizing the practice and imposing penalties including up to 10 years in prison.

The issue gained prominence last year when executives of the Hewlett-Packard Co. were charged with hiring private detectives who used the technique to investigate board members.

The new law gives police a weapon to punish perpetrators. But it leaves out any requirements for how phone companies should protect their customers' private data. Cell phone bills, for example, can reveal who a person has called and, in some cases, even the caller's location.

The FCC chairman, Kevin Martin, told reporters recently that the new rules will require that customers use a password to access their account information.

While that might protect calling data, telephone companies are wary. They fear a password requirement might upset customers.

AT&T Inc. spokesman Michael Balmoris said the company has to be careful to balance security against customers' wishes for easy access to their information.

The rules also are expected to require that phone companies get a customer's permission before they can release information that may be used for telemarketing.

Phone companies contend this requirement would violate their First Amendment right to communicate with customers – a position that was backed by a federal court in 1999.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, called that court decision "probably one of the oddest First Amendment cases in many, many years." Since that case, he said courts have been more inclined to support privacy rules.

Phone companies say there is no evidence that information shared with business partners falls into the wrong hands, making the proposed requirement unnecessary.

The departments of Justice and Homeland Security have taken issue with two other possible provisions in the emerging rules, both of which have privacy advocates concerned.

The first would tell phone companies to destroy customer records as soon as the records no longer are needed for legitimate business purposes. The government wants the records preserved for possible use in criminal investigations.

Secondly, the two departments want phone companies to notify law enforcement officials first, before customers, when customers' private billing information has been disclosed improperly.

In written comments to the FCC, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said immediately alerting customers in such cases may tip off investigative targets and lead them to destroy evidence, change their behavior or slip away.

He proposed that companies not tell customers for at least seven business days after notifying the FBI or the Secret Service.

For companies, this would mean they would have to determine, without the benefit of input from their own customers, whether an unauthorized breach had occurred. Companies also have raised questions about how such a notification system would work.

Consumer advocates are concerned a delay may result in more harm than good.

Jeannine Kenney, senior policy analyst with Consumers Union, said customers should learn immediately when someone is delving into their personal information.

"In fact, failing to notify a customer of a breach could impede prevention of actual harm or the commission of another crime," she said.

US Courts To Decide On 'scheme Liability' (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York And Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

US courts are considering on Monday whether to bless a new legal theory thought up by plaintiffs' lawyers that could put banks, lawyers and business partners on the hook for billions of dollars when a public company goes bust because of fraud.

The fifth circuit federal appeals court in New Orleans will take up the issue of "scheme liability" when it hears arguments on whether Enron's shareholders can pursue a class action against Credit Suisse, Merrill Lynch and lawyer Vinson & Elkins.

Banks and lawyers have traditionally been protected by a 1994 Supreme Court decision that says shareholders cannot recover money from firms and people who simply "aided or abetted" securities fraud. But the recent corporate scandals prompted plaintiffs' attorneys and angry investors to look for a way around that rule. They argue that the banks and lawyers participated in a "scheme" to hide Enron's losses from investors and should be held "primarily responsible" for the company's collapse.

Scheme liability "is almost indispensable. There would have been no way to hold the big banks responsible in Enron without scheme liability," said Bill Lerach, the plaintiff's attorney who represents Enron shareholders.

But Greg Markel, a lawyer for banks, warned that the theory "creates uncertainty for financial institutions and that uncertainty increases the costs of doing business."

The trial judge in the Enron case initially agreed with investors, but other US courts have divided in cases involving fraud at Dynegy, Parmalat and HealthSouth. The Securities and Exchange Commission favours a limited form of scheme liability that could increase the number of companies targeted by such lawsuits.

"The scope of scheme liability is the single most important issue being litigated in securities class actions today," says Bob Giuffra, an attorney with Sullivan & Cromwell, which defends companies against securities lawsuits.

The US Supreme Court is also considering whether to hear two scheme liability cases. One includes companies allegedly involved in sham transactions conducted by Homestore, the online estate agents site. The influential ninth circuit federal appeals court found that business partners can be held liable if their transactions with a company had "the principal purpose and effect of creating a false appearance of fact in the fur-ther-ance of a scheme to defraud" even if they did not directly mislead investors.

If that ruling stands, "lawyers will begin naming as defendants all manner of companies [particularly those with 'deep pockets'], merely because they engaged in significant transactions with issuers who allegedly accounted for the transactions fraudulently," claim papers filed by Cendant and Time Warner, targets in the Homestore case.

Hyundai Chairman Is Found Guilty (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- A court here found Hyundai Motor Co. Chairman Chung Mong Koo guilty of embezzlement and fraud, and sentenced him to three years in prison, breaking a pattern of leniency for high-profile executives convicted of white-collar crime.

The decision poses a major leadership problem for Hyundai, the world's No. 6 auto maker by volume, as it faces slower growth and mounting challenges including new competitors from China.

DOJ_NMG_0127126

Prosecutors alleged that Mr. Chung took about $100 million from Hyundai and affiliated companies for political payoffs and personal use. They sought a six-year prison sentence. Mr. Chung, who told the court at one point during his trial, "I am guilty to a certain extent," had asked for leniency.

At a hearing where the verdict and sentencing were announced, Seoul Central Court Judge Kim Dong Oh said Mr. Chung engaged in "behavior that goes against market practices." The judge, one of three who listened to the trial and handed down the ruling, said, "It shows there's something wrong in the corporate culture of Korea."

The sentence presents Hyundai with a major quandary: Should it replace Mr. Chung, who is the son of Hyundai's founder and has been depicted for years both inside and outside the company as a near-omnipotent leader? A Hyundai spokesman said the company was "disappointed" and that Mr. Chung will appeal the decision. It said he remains in control of the company.

Mr. Chung is 68 years old, but he has no clear successor. He became chief executive in 1999 and chairman a year later. Mr. Chung's son runs the company's Kia affiliate.

Following his arrest last April and subsequent two-month jail stay, Hyundai canceled plant openings and delayed strategic decisions to show it was less able to function without Mr. Chung.

Hyundai said nothing publicly about preparations it was making in case Mr. Chung received a prison sentence. Company executives last week were privately saying they expected him to receive a financial penalty but no prison time.

Hyundai shares fell about 3% today immediately after the sentence was announced.

Hyundai is grappling with slowing growth in South Korea and the U.S., its two biggest markets. The rising value of the Korean won has eroded the price competitiveness of Hyundai and Kia vehicles overseas.

Bribery scandals have in the past engulfed many Korean executives. The problem is rooted in the country's fast growth in the 1960s and 1970s when Korean businesses were largely controlled by the government and the right political connection would bring capital and market protection.

President's Speech Shows CEO Pay Has Hit The Big Time (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Excessive executive compensation, an issue shareholder activists and labor unions have ridden for years, has suddenly become a hot topic in Washington, D.C.

Lawmakers in both houses of Congress plan to make laws affecting executive pay packages, and a new rule from the Securities and Exchange Commission is forcing companies to provide a simplified summary of top executives' compensation in their public filings. Even President Bush weighed in on the subject last week in New York, exhorting corporate boards to tie CEOs' salaries and bonuses to their success in improving companies and bringing value to shareholders.

"When President Bush talks about CEO pay, you know that it's moving to the top of the national agenda," says Robert Reich, professor of public policy at the University of California at Berkeley and former secretary of labor under President Clinton.

Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, a senior associate dean at the Yale School of Management and a prominent expert on corporate leadership, says the Bush speech represents a tipping point in the debate over executive pay.

"By the time Johnny Carson started to joke about Watergate, Nixon had lost his credibility in all quarters," says Sonnenfeld, author of Firing Back, a book about how CEOs deal with career reversals. "This is no longer seen as an edgy, controversial topic."

Several recent events have helped push CEO pay into the public spotlight:

·Bob Nardelli's $210 million exit package at Home Depot. Nardelli was considered a superstar CEO when Home Depot hired him six years ago, but the stock languished and Home Depot lost market share to Lowe's during his tenure.

"There are certain instances where pay is so excessive and the breach of trust that the board has with shareholders is so terribly broken, it's an outrage," says Rich Ferlauto of the government labor union AFSCME. "Nardelli was the catalyst."

·Virginia Sen. Jim Webb's response to Bush's State of the Union address last month. Webb, a Democrat, said robust corporate earnings disguised that the middle class was falling further behind. Webb noted that the average CEO makes more than 400 times what the average worker makes, and promised congressional action on the topic.

"Somebody in the White House noticed that he upstaged the president," says Damon Silvers of the AFL-CIO.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., the new chair of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a bill this spring that would require companies to allow shareholders to vote on CEO pay packages in proxy votes, a system in place in the U.K.

"You can count on that bill coming to the floor of the House and passing," he says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Set To Begin A Vast Expansion Of DNA Sampling (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

The Justice Department is completing rules to allow the collection of DNA from most people arrested or detained by federal authorities, a vast expansion of DNA gathering that will include hundreds of thousands of illegal immigrants, by far the largest group affected.

The new forensic DNA sampling was authorized by Congress in a little-noticed amendment to a January 2006 renewal of the Violence Against Women Act, which provides protections and assistance for victims of sexual crimes. The amendment permits DNA collecting from anyone under criminal arrest by federal authorities, and also from illegal immigrants detained by federal agents.

Over the last year, the Justice Department has been conducting an internal review and consulting with other agencies to prepare regulations to carry out the law.

The goal, justice officials said, is to make the practice of DNA sampling as routine as fingerprinting for anyone detained by federal agents, including illegal immigrants. Until now, federal authorities have taken DNA samples only from convicted felons.

The law has strong support from crime victims' organizations and some women's groups, who say it will help law enforcement identify sexual predators and also detect dangerous criminals among illegal immigrants.

"Obviously, the bigger the DNA database, the better," said Lynn Parrish, the spokeswoman for the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network, based in Washington. "If this had been implemented years ago, it could have prevented many crimes. Rapists are generalists. They don't just rape, they also murder."

Peter Neufeld, a lawyer who is a co-director of the Innocence Project, which has exonerated dozens of prison inmates using DNA evidence, said the government was overreaching by seeking to apply DNA sampling as universally as fingerprinting.

"Whereas fingerprints merely identify the person who left them," Mr. Neufeld said, "DNA profiles have the potential to reveal our physical diseases and mental disorders. It becomes intrusive when the government begins to mine our most intimate matters."

Immigration lawyers said they did not learn of the measure when it passed last year and were dismayed by its sweeping scope.

"This has taken us by storm," said Deborah Notkin, a lawyer who was president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association last year. "It's so broad, it's scary. It is a terrible thing to do because people are sometimes detained erroneously in the immigration system."

Immigration lawyers noted that most immigration violations, including those committed when people enter the country illegally, are civil, not criminal, offenses. They warned that the new law would make it difficult for immigrants to remove their DNA profiles from the federal database, even if they were never found to have committed any serious violation or crime.

Under the new law, DNA samples would be taken from any illegal immigrants who are detained and would normally be fingerprinted, justice officials said. Last year federal customs, Border Patrol and immigration agents detained more than 1.2 million immigrants, the majority of them at the border with Mexico. About 238,000 of those immigrants were detained in immigration enforcement investigations. A great majority of all immigration detainees were fingerprinted, immigration officials said. About 102,000 people were arrested on federal charges not related to immigration in 2005.

While the proposed rules have not been finished, justice officials said they were certain to bring a huge new workload for the F.B.I. laboratory that logs, analyzes and stores federal DNA samples. Federal Bureau of Investigation officials said they anticipated an increase ranging from 250,000 to as many as 1 million samples a year.

The laboratory currently receives about 96,000 samples a year, said Robert Fram, chief of the agency's Scientific Analysis Section.

DNA would not be taken from legal immigrants who are stopped briefly by the authorities, justice officials said, or from legal residents who are detained on noncriminal immigration violations.

"What this does is move the DNA collection to the arrest stage," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman. "The general approach," he said, "is to bring the collection of DNA samples into alignment with current federal fingerprint collection practices." He said the department was "moving forward aggressively" to issue proposed regulations.

The 2006 amendment was sponsored by two border state Republicans, Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona and Senator John Cornyn of Texas. In an interview, Mr. Kyl said the measure was broadly drawn to encompass illegal immigrants as well as Americans arrested for federal crimes. He said that 13 percent of illegal immigrants detained in Arizona last year had criminal records.

"Some of these are very bad people," Mr. Kyl said. "The number of sexual assaults committed by illegal immigrants is astonishing. Right now there is a fingerprint system in use, but it is not as thorough as it could be."

Ms. Parrish, of the rape victims' organization, pointed to the case of Angel Resendiz, a Mexican immigrant who was known as the Railroad Killer. Starting in 1997, Mr. Resendiz committed at least 15 murders and numerous rapes in the United States. Over the years of his rampage, Mr. Resendiz was deported 17 times. He was executed in Texas in June.

"That was 17 missed opportunities to collect his DNA," Ms. Parrish said. "If he had been identified as the perpetrator of the first rapes, it would have prevented later ones."

Immigration lawyers said the DNA sampling could tar illegal immigrants with a criminal stigma, even though most of them have never committed any criminal offense.

"To equate somebody with a possible immigration violation in the same category as a suspected sex offender is an outrage," said David Leopold, an immigration lawyer who practices in Cleveland.

Forensic DNA is culled either from a tiny blood sample taken from a fingertip (the F.B.I.'s preferred method) or from a swab of the inside of the mouth. Federal samples are logged into the F.B.I.'s laboratory, analyzed and transformed into profiles that can be read by computer. The profiles are loaded into a database called the National DNA Index System.

The F.B.I. also loads DNA profiles from local and state police into the federal database and runs searches. Only seven states now collect DNA from suspects when they are arrested; of those, only two states are authorized by their laws to send those samples to the federal database.

Mr. Neufeld, of the Innocence Project, said his group supported broad DNA collection from convicted criminals. But, he said, "There is no demonstrable nexus between being detained for an immigration matter and the likelihood you are going to commit some serious violent crime."

The DNA amendment has divided women's groups that are usually unified supporters of the Violence Against Women Act, which was adopted in 1994.

"We were stunned by the extraordinary, broad sweep of this amendment," said Lisalyn Jacobs, vice president for government relations at Legal Momentum, a law group founded by the National Organization for Women. Ms. Jacobs recalled that the amendment had been adopted by a voice vote with little debate. She said many lawmakers eager to renew the act, which enjoys solid bipartisan support, appeared unaware of the scope of the DNA amendment.

"The pervasive problems of profiling in the United States will only be exacerbated by such a system," Ms. Jacobs said, because Latino and other immigrants will be greatly over-represented in the database. She noted that the law required a court order to remove a profile from the system.

Many groups warned that the measure would compound already severe backlogs in the F.B.I.'s DNA processing. Mr. Fram of the F.B.I. said there had been an enormous increase in the samples coming to the databank since it started to operate in 1998, but no new resources for the bureau's laboratory. Currently about 150,000 DNA samples from convicted criminals are waiting to be processed and loaded into the national database, Mr. Fram said.

He said the laboratory had added robot technology to speed the processing. But in the "worst case scenario," where the laboratory receives one million new samples a year, Mr. Fram said, "there is going to be a bottleneck."

Leak Case Hangs On Credibility (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's defense in his perjury trial rests largely on the claim that he was too busy with pressing affairs of state to recall minor events such as conversations with reporters about an obscure CIA employee.

But after nine government witnesses testified in federal court here over the last two weeks, a question is starting to emerge: Given all the time and attention the White House devoted in 2003 to CIA operative Valerie Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, how credible is Libby's apparent forgetfulness?

Libby, 56, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, is charged with obstructing a federal investigation into how the identity of Plame became public in the summer of 2003.

Wilson's public criticism of the justifications for the Iraq war spawned what the trial has shown to be a concerted effort by Cheney's office to discredit him. Prosecutors allege that as the administration pushed back, Plame became caught in the crossfire and was exposed.

DOJ_NMG_0127129

Libby's lead lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., has painted a defense in broad strokes, portraying Libby as a senior official immersed in life-and-death national security issues who may have been the scapegoat in a White House cover-up.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, by contrast, has been methodically building a narrowly focused case that in large part is being made through the testimony of past and present Bush administration insiders.

That has resulted in a rare inside glimpse into how the White House mobilizes against critics, including an account of how, contrary to claims it made at the time, Cheney's public-relations machinery was operating full-throttle to rebut the questions Wilson was raising about Iraq's supposed nuclear weapons capabilities.

Experts said the fact that Cheney's office was attaching such importance to the issue suggests it was the sort of thing that would not be easily forgotten.

The government case "turns on showing that the need to link Wilson to the CIA was a high priority for Libby and the kind of thing that he would not forget about and that he would not want to be candid to investigators about," said Daniel Richman, a former federal prosecutor and a professor at Fordham law school. "The government has been making a strong case for that."

Legal experts cautioned against reading too much into what the jury might be thinking at this stage of the trial because Libby's lawyers have yet to present their case. And for the prosecution, proving that a senior government official intentionally lied is no easy matter.

Also, some of the government's witnesses have demonstrated memory problems of their own, potentially bolstering Libby's faulty memory defense.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged under cross-examination last week that when she first appeared before the grand jury she did not remember the first time Libby gave her information about Plame. She said her memory was refreshed after she found a notebook in her office.

The closest thing to a smoking gun in the case so far are handwritten notes taken by Libby during a phone conversation with Cheney on June 12, 2003. Cheney told Libby, according to the notes, that Wilson's wife was a counter-proliferation specialist at the CIA.

Libby has acknowledged taking the notes, but has said he had forgotten that Cheney had passed him the tip by the time he started talking with reporters about Wilson a few weeks later. He has told investigators that he believed he first learned about Plame from the reporters; prosecutors say Libby lied out of concern that he could be charged with leaking classified information.

Trial testimony has indicated that other officials also discussed Plame's secret resume with Libby around the time he was speaking with Cheney. They include a high-ranking State Department official, a top spymaster from the CIA and Libby's morning intelligence briefer.

With those witnesses having no apparent motive to lie, legal experts say, their testimony threatens to undercut Libby's memory defense as his lawyers prepare to put on their case starting Wednesday. They say the cumulative effect of witnesses saying they were engaged with Libby on the subject earlier than when he has said he first learned about Plame could be a challenge the defense.

"Either these witnesses are wrong in their recollections or Libby will need to convince [the jury] that he simply forgot these multiple conversations," said Daniel French, a former federal prosecutor who represents a potential witness in the trial. "I think that could be problematic" for Libby.

Jeffrey Frederick, a Charlottesville, Va., jury consultant, said: "What the government had to do was show that this was not a one conversation gig. I think they are doing a very good job of nailing that down."

Testimony in the case has showed that Cheney was dictating talking points to rebut Wilson, while his public-relations handlers weighed strategic leaks to friendly reporters, among other moves.

Libby was the apparent lieutenant in the counter-offensive, and he seemed to get his marching orders in the June 12 phone conversation with Cheney that included the reference to Plame.

According to the notes from that conversation, Wilson was saying that Cheney's office had expressed strong interest in the notion that Iraq had sought weapons-grade uranium in Africa. Libby jotted down in the margin the orders he received from Cheney to "get agency to answer that."

Libby subsequently made a number of inquiries to senior State Department and CIA officials about Wilson and an agency-sponsored fact-finding trip he'd made to Africa in 2002.

The top CIA expert on Iraq, Robert Grenier, testified that Libby had him pulled out of a meeting with then-director George J. Tenet to discuss the issue in a phone call.

Former State Department undersecretary Marc Grossman said he also felt a sense of urgency when Libby called him, after which he promptly commissioned an internal intelligence analysis.

Both Grenier and Grossman testified that they promptly reported back to Libby with information about Wilson and the trip — and the fact that his wife was a CIA employee.

After Wilson went public with his criticism in a July 6 op-ed in the New York Times, saying he'd found no evidence of Iraq seeking nuclear material in Niger, Libby promptly passed on information about Wilson's wife, prosecutors allege.

Former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer testified that, on the following day, Libby offered the information to him on "the QT" over lunch at the White House mess. Miller testified that Libby told him about Wilson's wife the next day, a Tuesday.

Libby told the grand jury that he did not learn Plame's identity until the following Thursday, July 10, in a conversation with journalist Tim Russert, the moderator of the NBC's "Meet the Press." Libby has said he was surprised to hear the information from the newsman.

Russert, who is scheduled to testify for the government today or Tuesday, has denied that he gave Plame's identity to Libby.

Fitzgerald, in his opening statement to the jury last month, commented on the apparent contradiction. "You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you are giving out on Monday and Tuesday," he said.

The Big Uneasy (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Like an awkward cocktail party where the guests know each other too well and don't always get along, the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has brought the capital's government celebs and media players back together in the close quarters of one Washington courthouse.

Maybe too close.

It's a sometimes genial and sometimes strained reunion -- with hearty backslapping as well as forced smiles and uncomfortable silences, but without the canapes and cocktails to lighten the mood. Against the grim backdrop of whether Vice President Cheney's right-hand man had lied about blowing a CIA officer's cover, witnesses called to the stand, their prominent attorneys and reporters covering the criminal case all try to exchange pleasantries in courthouse hallways while they tend to their intersecting duties.

Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, during a break in his testimony for the prosecution, makes small talk about his kids with reporters who once tried to pin him down on assertions the administration used faulty intelligence to justify a war.

During a recess, defense attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. beams as he introduces Libby to Mike Espy, a Clinton administration agriculture secretary he helped out of a different jam.

In this slice of Washington, courtroom spectators, witnesses, lawyers -- even the judge -- have been the subjects, sources or authors of interconnected news stories.

Max Frankel, former executive editor of the New York Times and supervisor of reporter Judith Miller, a prosecution witness, is writing about the case, as are two former colleagues at the paper that ultimately questioned some of her reporting on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. John Dickerson, a former Time magazine reporter, is writing about the testimony of his former colleague, Matthew Cooper.

Finally, a Newsweek reporter is old chums with one of the jurors. "I obviously did a double take when I saw him on the jury," said Newsweek's Michael Isikoff, who is also the co-author of a book about the administration's claims for justifying war with Iraq, the backdrop for the Libby case. "This whole thing reminds me of high school."

Like high school, some people just don't want to be here.

The best illustration may be Cooper, who grabbed a quick lunch last week in the courthouse cafeteria before returning to the witness chair to be questioned about his confidential phone conversation with Libby. The normally chatty scribe and amateur comedian wore a pasted-on smile and moved past the grill and salad bar as if picking his way through a minefield. He silently nodded at his buddies in the Washington press corps, then sidestepped them without chitchat.

His most forthcoming remark? "Oh. Hi."

An intensely private and surprisingly tall David Addington, the legal mastermind behind President Bush's expansive executive powers, slunk through the hall with head down to avoid human interaction. Nearly every reporter in the building would have loved to interview him; alas, he was questioned on the stand about subpoenas he received as Cheney's counsel -- and often mumbled.

In some cases, the participants' past dealings with one another have left a sour taste.

CIA former associate deputy director Robert Grenier averted his glance from the defense table where Libby sat as he joined the ranks of witnesses helping the prosecution paint Libby as a liar who tried to conceal his bosses' efforts to silence a war critic. Grenier's agency had repeatedly taken a beating from Cheney and Libby in the run-up to the Iraq war, with Cheney deriding the spooks as incompetent in finding evidence that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

With such odd intersections, the trial sometimes provides "Alice in Wonderland" moments. Dickerson, who is covering the trial for Slate, an online magazine, was in court scribbling notes last week when his picture was flashed on a courtroom screen. It was a glamour shot from his book jacket. Defense attorney William Jeffress Jr. implied that Dickerson -- not Libby -- told other reporters about the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Dickerson was also in court when he heard Fleischer allege that he shared that information with Dickerson, though Dickerson remembers the conversation differently. Dickerson wrote a story that day about their conflicting accounts.

"It was all very surreal," he said.

The CIA Leak: Boring In On The Veep (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

The Scooter Libby trial has put a new focus on Vice President Dick Cheney's own role in the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson's identity. When the CIA on July 11, 2003, sent over a draft statement taking responsibility for President George W. Bush's inaccurate assertion that Iraq had sought uranium from Africa, Cheney wrote on the cover sheet "Unsatisfactory" and underlined the word, according to a trial document. The veep thought the agency wasn't going far enough in distancing Cheney's office from the trip by Joseph Wilson (in which the ex-ambassador claimed he'd debunked the uranium shopping reports). "The vice president was frustrated and upset," Libby told the FBI, according to Deborah Bond, an FBI agent who later questioned Libby on the leak.

The next day, aboard Air Force Two, Libby and Cheney talked media strategy, Bond said. "There was some discussion ... about whether they should report to the press that Ambassador Wilson's wife worked at the CIA," Bond testified that Libby told her. Bond added that Libby said "they may have talked about it." This is the first suggestion that Cheney himself talked about disclosing Wilson's wife's identity to the press as a way of undercutting Wilson's credibility.

After the talk on the plane, Libby at Cheney's direction began making phone calls to reporters. One of them, Matt Cooper, testified that Libby confirmed to him (he'd heard it from Karl Rove) that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Former New York Times reporter Judy Miller testified that Libby mentioned Wilson's wife to her that day (as in two previous talks). The new testimony could make things more awkward for Cheney, due to be called as a defense witness soon. Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to wrap up his case with Tim Russert (likely to deny Libby's grand-jury testimony that Russert told him about Plame's CIA job). The defense may call reporters—including columnist Robert Novak—to say Libby never told them about Plame.

Pulling The Curtain (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

The perjury trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former right-hand man won't go down in history as the turning point in the collapse of the Bush administration's once powerful control over its Iraq message. That milestone has long since passed.

But testimony by an all-star parade of witnesses in Lewis "Scooter" Libby's federal trial will make a fascinating footnote-with details about the usually secret and occasionally inept workings of a wartime White House and the reporters who cover it.

Libby is on trial in Washington for allegedly lying to a grand jury and FBI agents investigating whether administration officials illegally leaked to the media the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame in an effort to undermine the credibility of her husband, war critic Joseph Wilson. No one has been indicted for revealing her name, but Libby was charged with obstructing justice and perjury for discrepancies between his account and that of other witnesses about how he learned of the now former CIA operative and when he took that information to reporters.

The trial, which continues this week, has laid bare some of the capital's most peculiar tribal rituals. The jury has seen Libby's handwritten notes on the administration's plan to discredit Wilson, who, after a CIA-sponsored trip to Africa, wrote a New York Times piece disputing one of President Bush's arguments for going to war-that Iraq was attempting to buy uranium ore from Niger. Jurors heard former New York Times reporter Judith Miller's pricelessly convoluted, but largely accurate, explanation of how many journalists and their sources negotiate information-from "on the record" and "background" to "deep background" and beyond. And those jurors learned how far administration apparatchiks will go to protect themselves.

Libby, Cheney's powerful former chief of staff, walked a tortured path to Judge Reggie Walton's chambers in U.S. District Court. It all started in summer 2003, when the White House was in high dudgeon over Wilson's assertions. Libby's meeting notes say that staffers were agitated that the former ambassador's claims were topping news reports and undermining the president's "trustworthiness." Top Bush aide Karl Rove, Libby wrote, bemoaned that Wilson had been accepted as "a credible expert."

Coddling. A pushback was hatched, and on a list of national journalists to be coddled, according to testimony by Cheney's communications director, was Miller, a controversial veteran Times reporter who had written extensively about weapons of mass destruction in the run-up to the war. Miller has since become a lightning rod; much of her prewar reporting has been discredited, and she has been criticized for being too cozy with the administration, including Libby, and thus helping it make the case for war.

Though Miller, who has since resigned from the Times, never wrote about Plame, she became a cause célèbre in 2005 when she spent 85 days in jail for refusing to reveal to the grand jury that Libby gave her information about Wilson's wife. Miller was released, and agreed to testify, after Libby sent a note permitting her to disclose his identity. Her incarceration raised profound questions about the sanctity of reporter-source interactions and reinvigorated the ongoing debate about whether, in the public interest, such relationships deserve protection.

Miller was among a half-dozen witnesses last week-including former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer-who contradicted Libby's claim that he learned about Plame from NBC's Tim Russert during a July 10, 2003, conversation. Miller testified that Libby mentioned Plame to her in two meetings and a phone call that predated July 10.

Before the prosecution rests this week, it will question Russert, who has denied Libby's claim they spoke about Plame. Libby's lawyers will press their case that the administration made their client a Plamegate scapegoat to protect the powerful Rove. But this case isn't about scapegoating or leaks. It's about whether Libby told the truth under oath. After last week, that may be a difficult sell.

Johnson Backs Away From Official (WP)

By Cheryl W. Thompson And Martin Weil

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson distanced himself yesterday from Keith A. Washington, the county homeland security official and police officer who shot two men during an altercation at his Accokeek home. One of the two men has died, and the matter is under investigation.

Johnson said the relationship between him and Washington -- who had backed Johnson for office and once served as his driver -- is not one of personal friendship. He also said he did not believe Washington, a police corporal, should resume his homeland security post -- a job to which Johnson had appointed him.

"I don't think he should come back to Homeland Security, no matter what happens," Johnson told a reporter yesterday.

Johnson did not give reasons but said he believed Washington should return to the police department, which pays his salary.

It was not clear yesterday whether Washington could remain in the security post without the support of Johnson, who appointed him. Washington did not return calls last night.

Yesterday's telephone interview with a reporter was the most detailed account Johnson has provided of his position on the Jan. 24 shooting incident and his association with Washington.

Washington was appointed a deputy director of homeland security by Johnson in 2004. He is a longtime Johnson supporter who worked at one time as his driver.

He was one of few county police officers to support Johnson, who as state's attorney had focused on combating abuses by police.

Johnson and Washington belong to the same collegiate fraternity, and Washington has indicated that the two were close. Johnson said yesterday that the men's relationship has been misconstrued and would not affect the probe of the incident.

"Even if we were friends," Johnson said, "I wouldn't interfere" in the investigation of the shooting.

Washington, a 16-year police officer, has been on paid administrative leave since the night he shot unarmed deliverymen Brandon D. Clark, 22, and Robert White, 36.

The two were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were wounded during an altercation. Clark, who lived in Oxon Hill, died Friday at Prince George's Hospital Center. White, a District resident, has been in critical condition there.

Critics have described Washington as prone to losing his temper. Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have said little while the investigation has proceeded but have previously said he apparently acted in self-defense.

In the interview yesterday, Johnson depicted what he said was his relationship with Washington.

"I don't call him. He doesn't call me. My relationship with him is a professional one." Johnson, who is in his second term as county executive, said he has found that people often mischaracterize their relationships with him.

Johnson said that he and Washington are friendly when they see each other and that on the campaign trail they might have stopped to share a bite. But he said, "we are not friends."

The two do not socialize, and "I have never had dinner, lunch or anything else with him," Johnson said.

Washington was not his confidant, Johnson added.

DOJ_NMG_0127133

"I am the county executive," Johnson said. "I am not going to be talking about business with my driver. We talk about sports."

Johnson said he has not contacted the families of those involved in the shooting.

"I'm just going to wait," he said.

But, he said, "my heart goes out to everybody."

Little information has been released about the circumstances of the shooting.

"I don't know what went on in that house," Johnson said yesterday. "Whatever went on, it's a huge tragedy. I'm devastated."

When he named Washington to the homeland security job, Johnson said the Army veteran would ensure that the office "provides the protection and required services that the county needs."

Johnson did not elaborate yesterday on why he believed that Washington should not continue in the post, which Johnson said involved serving as a liaison with the police.

But he said Washington should return to the police department. "That's where he should go back to."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Civil Rights-era Killers Escape Justice (USAT)

By Jerry Mitchell The (jackson, Miss.) Clarion-ledger

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Despite high-profile arrests, death is claiming potential witnesses — and many crimes were never probed

JACKSON, Miss. — Despite high-profile convictions in the past two decades, most killers from the civil rights era will go unpunished.

Many of the murder cases from 1954 to 1968, the years that bracket the height of the civil rights movement, were not investigated or were given only cursory attention, leaving authorities little to work with today. Now the window of time is closing. Death is claiming potential defendants and witnesses.

"In nearly all these cases, there was no investigation at the time, and without an investigation, I don't think you have any ability to prosecute these crimes," said Don Cochran, professor at Cumberland School of Law in Birmingham, Ala., who, in 2002, helped successfully prosecute Bobby Cherry, then 71, for the 1963 Birmingham church bombing that killed four girls.

James Seale's arrest Jan. 24 on kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction and killings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore — two of the 40 names listed on the National Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, Ala. — is certain to be one of the last because suspects are dying, former U.S. Attorney Doug Jones of Birmingham said. Seale, 71, suffers from cancer.

Jones led the prosecution that convicted Thomas Blanton, then 62, in 2001 in the Birmingham church bombing case and that won Cherry's conviction.

Since 1989, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era and made 28 arrests that led to 22 convictions. The latest was the 2005 conviction of Edgar Ray Killen, then 80, for orchestrating the 1964 slayings of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney.

Just how many people died during that period is uncertain. Next to the National Civil Rights Memorial is the Civil Rights Memorial Center, where 86 additional names appear on a wall dedicated to the "forgotten others."

Johnnie Mae Chappell, a mother of 10, is one of those honored on the wall. She was killed March 23, 1964. She had bought ice cream earlier for her children and was looking for her missing billfold along a road in Jacksonville when she was shot from a car with four white men. Her admitted killer went to prison for three years; charges were dropped against three other suspects.

The plaque on the wall also says: "The names of all those who lost their lives to racial violence during the civil rights movement will never be known. The media often paid little attention to the death of black people. Many murders were never fully investigated."

Retired FBI agent Jim Ingram said he and other agents investigating racial violence in Mississippi in the 1960s often ran into hostile neighbors, frightened witnesses, reluctant prosecutors and all-white juries, many of whom refused to convict in these crimes.

Working for the New Orleans Times-Picayune, veteran reporter Bill Minor was one of the journalists in Mississippi willing to shed light on these crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0127134

"The bias permeated the entire journalistic apparatus back then," he said. "It was not only unpopular, it was unsafe to pursue civil rights stories."

Minor said he traveled to Poplarville, Miss., in 1959 to investigate the lynching of Mack Charles Parker, who was dragged from his jail cell and killed by a white mob.

In town, Minor spotted friends he knew. "They wouldn't come across the street for fear of being seen with me," he said.

The FBI investigated the killing, determined who the mob members were and turned the case over to state authorities, who refused to prosecute.

Minor eventually learned the names of those supposedly involved. The last of those suspects died a few years ago, he said.

Little is known about most of the "forgotten others" listed on the wall of the Civil Rights Memorial Center, said Penny Weaver of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which built the center.

Ellie Dahmer said these forgotten killings still should be investigated and prosecuted, if possible. "If they can find out who did it, I don't care how old they are, I think they should go to prison," she said. "Just think about the poor people that didn't get a chance to get old."

Dahmer watched her husband, Vernon, die in a hospital in 1966 after defending his family from an attack by Klansmen. It wasn't until 1998 that Sam Bowers went to prison for ordering the killing. On Nov. 5, 2006, Bowers died behind bars at 82.

U.S. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., believes there is bipartisan support in Congress for the Unsolved Civil Rights Crimes Act that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down evidence in the unpunished killings.

By creating such a unit to punish these pre-1970 crimes, he said, "we are saying that historical context is no excuse for brutality in America, and we are reclaiming our integrity as a nation by doing what we can to right these wrongs today."

The 2005 investigation of the 1967 slaying of Wharlest Jackson shows how hard success is becoming. After Jackson was promoted into a "whites-only" job in Natchez, Miss., a bomb with a timer placed underneath his truck exploded, killing him. Last year, FBI agents concluded all of those involved in the bombing are dead.

After nearly three decades of waiting, Myrlie Evers-Williams, the widow of NAACP leader Medgar Evers, saw her late husband's killer convicted in 1994 and sentenced to life in prison. Byron De La Beckwith died in 2001 at 80.

"The issue goes beyond the murderers being brought to justice," she said. "These 'forgotten others' should never be forgotten. They and so many like them were the unsung heroes of the movement. Without them, there would have been no movement."

Gary Tyler's Lost Decades (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Destrehan, La.

The term "time warp" could have been coined for this rural town of 11,000 residents that sits beside, and just a little below, the Mississippi River. A remnant of the sugar-plantation era, the region's racially troubled past is always here, seldom spoken about but inescapable, like the murk in the air of a perpetually stalled weather front.

The Harry Hurst Middle School is on the site of the old Destrehan High School, which was the scene of violent protests during the integration period of the 1970s. Local residents have tried to blot out the murder case that made Destrehan High notorious three decades ago, but there's a big problem with that collective effort to forget. The black teenager who was railroaded into prison (and almost into the electric chair) for the murder of a white student in 1974 is still in prison all these many years later. He's middle-aged now, still suffering through a life sentence without any chance for parole in the notorious state penitentiary at Angola.

There is no longer any doubt that the case against the teenager, Gary Tyler, was a travesty. A federal appeals court ruled unequivocally that he did not receive a fair trial. The Louisiana Board of Pardons issued rulings on three occasions that would have allowed Mr. Tyler to be freed.

But this is the South and Mr. Tyler was a black person convicted of killing a white. It didn't matter that the case was built on bogus evidence and coerced witnesses, or that the trial was, in the words of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, "fundamentally unfair." Mr. Tyler was never given a new trial and the pardon board recommendations were rejected by two governors.

(Lurking in the background as the case unfolded was David Duke, a former grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan who was very active politically in Louisiana and always ready to inject his poison into the public issues of the day. If you drive around Destrehan and nearby communities today you will still see some of the old blue-and-white campaign signs for Duke.)

Mr. Tyler, a sophomore at Destrehan High, was on a bus filled with black students that was attacked on Oct. 7, 1974, by a white mob enraged over school integration. A shot was fired and a 13-year-old white boy standing outside the bus collapsed, mortally wounded. Mr. Tyler was arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace after he talked back to a sheriff's deputy.

Although the bus and its passengers were searched and no weapon was found, Mr. Tyler was taken into custody, savagely beaten and accused of committing the murder. A gun was "found" during a subsequent search of the bus and witnesses were rounded up to testify against Mr. Tyler. It turned out that the gun (which has since disappeared) had been stolen from a firing range used by officers of the sheriff's department. All of the witnesses who fingered Mr. Tyler would eventually recant, saying they had been terrorized into testifying falsely by the authorities.

Mr. Tyler was represented at trial by a white sole practitioner who had never handled a murder case, much less a death penalty case. He kept his meetings with his client to a minimum and would later complain about the money he was paid.

The outcome was predictable. Mr. Tyler was convicted and sentenced to die in the electric chair by an all-white jury. At 17, he was the youngest prisoner on death row in the country. He almost certainly would have been executed if the U.S. Supreme Court had not ruled the Louisiana death penalty unconstitutional.

The Fifth Circuit ruling in 1981 said that an improper charge to the jury had denied Mr. Tyler the presumption of innocence at his trial. "It is folly," the court said, "to argue that the erroneous charge did not affect the central determination of guilt or innocence."

What was folly was any expectation that Mr. Tyler would be treated fairly at any point. Despite the appeals court ruling, he was denied a new trial on a technicality.

Now consider this, because it will tell you all you need to know about racial justice in the South. A 19-year-old black man named Richard Dunn was shotgunned to death as he was heading home from a benefit dance in support of Mr. Tyler at Southern University in New Orleans in 1976. A white man, Anthony Mart, was arrested and convicted of shooting Mr. Dunn from a passing car.

Gary Tyler's current attorney, Mary Howell, ruefully explained what happened to Mr. Mart for the cold-blooded killing of a black stranger: He was sent to prison for life but was pardoned and freed after serving about 10 years.

Bush's Double Standard On Race In Schools (CSM)

By Alec Ian Gershberg And Darrick Hamilton

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

The Supreme Court is considering two school desegregation cases that will probably result in limits on the use of race as a criterion for admission to public elementary and high schools.

Not surprisingly, the Bush administration is supporting the plaintiffs' arguments that the use of such racial criteria is unconstitutional. It was no doubt delighted to hear Justice Anthony Kennedy say during oral arguments that "characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort."

But Bush officials are being inconsistent. They don't apply that standard to their own public education policies. It's time they embraced the premise of their own student testing rules – race matters – and support efforts to promote access and diversity in schools.

The No Child Left Behind (NCLB) law, is remarkable because it deals with racial issues in a manner at odds with nearly every other policy advocated by the Bush administration – including its current argument to the Supreme Court that school desegregation plans must be "race neutral." NCLB requires that schools show adequate progress in each of 10 "subgroups" of students. These subgroups include nonracial categories such as disabled, poor, and limited English proficient students, as well as racial and ethnic categories such as blacks, Hispanics, Asians, native Americans, and whites.

We applaud the intent behind such policies to support students who, as a group, tend to have subpar academic performance. But the policy rests on flawed assumptions about the use of such tests to determine which students are being taught well. It also creates perverse incentives potentially harmful to the groups the policy intends to help and raises thorny philosophical issues about race.

Given the diversity of the way schools are organized, current research casts strong doubts on the ability of such tests to consistently evaluate a school's progress. Worse, testing tools get less reliable when disaggregated by the subgroups of concern in NCLB. In particular, small schools and schools with relatively small groups of different kinds of students pose nearly intractable statistical problems.

For instance, Midwood High School in Brooklyn, N.Y., got flagged because the scores of 33 disabled students (out of more than 3,700 total) did not improve. But statistically it is almost impossible to determine that the school is not teaching these students well. Another flaw in NCLB, pointed out by President Bush's brother, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is that it does not track individual students over time. The difference in how schools are evaluated, using exactly the same tests, can be quite dramatic. For example, R.J. Longstreet Elementary School in Daytona Beach, Fla., failed under NCLB for four years, but got A's for five years in a row in Jeb Bush's program, which does track individual students over time. So to a school that George W. Bush gives an "F," Jeb Bush gives an "A"!

While we support policies aimed at addressing educational inequities, we are concerned by the perverse incentives that stem from NCLB's racialization of academic standards. At best, school staff must now view all their students through an explicitly racial lens. At worst, shrewd principals, understanding that their organizations' survival is so dependent on the average test scores of certain students, have an incentive to exclude these underperforming subgroups. Moreover, a Supreme Court decision to end the use of race in admissions can aid in this exclusion. Bush administration officials assert that NCLB does not allow schools to "hide behind averages," meaning that overall school improvement cannot come at the expense of smaller subgroups of concern.

But how does that stance jibe with the other prominent policies the Bush administration has pursued regarding race? In 2003, the administration sided with the plaintiffs against the University of Michigan in the Supreme Court precisely because their admissions system paid particular attention to race. And the administration recently used an obscure statement on energy policy to make clear that race should not be a factor in government programs.

Yet NCLB is a tacit admission that race matters. How can the Bush administration force primary and secondary schools to pay specific attention to test scores of students of particular racial groups while arguing that similar racial attention should be illegal for admission to the same public schools being tested? Even conservative opponents of affirmative action have called this approach "schizophrenic" and unprincipled.

To make it principled, the administration must reconsider its positions on affirmative action and school integration. And it must stop urging the Supreme Court to ban a tool some local school districts deem effective and desirable for providing access and expanding student diversity.

Through NCLB, the Bush administration has promoted "characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin" for the purposes of assessing school performance. This is an admission that race matters in the public school arena. We agree. And race matters not only when it's convenient for political aims.

Good Election News From Florida (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Florida, famous for doing so much wrong in its elections, is poised to take two very important right steps. First, Gov. Charlie Crist says he plans to end the use of touch-screen voting machines that do not produce a paper record. Florida's move may finally sound the death knell for these unreliable, inherently antidemocratic voting machines.

After the 2000 election, there was a rush to eliminate the punch-card machines that produced the infamous hanging chads. But many states replaced them with paperless touch-screen machines that require voters to accept on faith that the reported vote totals accurately reflect the votes cast.

It has been hard to have faith. There have been widespread reports of "vote flipping," in which machines record votes cast for one candidate as votes for the opponent. The Florida courts are still trying to resolve a challenge to a Congressional race last fall in which as many as 18,000 votes may have disappeared. The race was extremely close, and the possibly missing votes were in the losing candidate's strongest county.

Governor Crist is asking the Legislature to finance the purchase of new optical-scan machines, and it is expected to agree. Choosing optical scans is Governor Crist's second good move. In optical-scan voting, voters mark a paper ballot that is then read by a computer. Polling place lines are shorter, because many voters can fill out ballots at the same time. These paper ballots are the official ballots, and can be recounted by hand to resolve a dispute.

More than half the states — including large ones like California, New York, Illinois and Ohio — require computerized voting machines to produce a paper record. The addition of Florida would be a major defeat for election officials and voting-machine companies that have stubbornly opposed paper-trail requirements.

Governor Crist's move should provide further momentum for a bill that Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, plans to introduce in Congress today that would require voting machines nationwide to produce voter-verified paper records.

With the Democrats in control of Congress, the bill has a good chance of passing. But it is gratifying that Florida's shift is led by a Republican governor, and expected to pass a Republican-controlled Legislature. This has for too long been considered a Democratic issue. It shouldn't be. It is, as Governor Crist said, "common sense."

ANTITRUST:

Mill Developments Rest With Antitrust Decision (STEUBHS)

By Paul Giannamore, Business editor

Steubenville (OH) Herald-Star, February 5, 2007

STEUBENVILLE — Many developments for the local steel mills hinge upon the decision of the U.S. Department of Justice in an antitrust claim against Mittal Steel.

While the date has passed for expiration of a memorandum of understanding between Esmark and Mittal for the purchase of Mittal's Weirton mill, negotiations between the two firms are continuing.

Esmark spokesman Bill Keegan said Friday that Esmark and Mittal "continue to negotiate in earnest" on the potential purchase agreement and discussions are continuing.

Esmark, Mittal and Weirton's Independent Steelworkers Union officials all said they were not sure how Justice would make its decision known. A Justice spokeswoman said Friday the decision was "still pending" and a statement could be expected at some point.

The Department of Justice and Mittal entered into an antitrust consent decree in August when Mittal and Arcelor merged. The concern was over Mittal's control over tin-producing assets in the eastern United States. Through the merger, Mittal came into possession of the Canadian Dofasco mill in Hamilton, Ontario, which produces tin. It already owned the Weirton mill and the Sparrows Point, Md., plant, both of which produce tin.

Because of the placement of Dofasco into a Dutch trust by Arcelor when it had been fighting Mittal's offers earlier in 2006, Mittal faced difficulty in selling Dofasco. The company had been ordered to use its best efforts to sell Dofasco and, absent a sale, Justice would choose between Weirton and Sparrows Point to be sold to ease the antitrust concerns.

A November deadline on the decision was extended to Jan. 28, which passed without word from the Justice Department.

Mittal wanted to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp, which sued and lost in a court in the Netherlands trying to force Mittal into the sale. The Dutch trustees voted against dissolving the trust that owns Dofasco.

Esmark, which controls Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and has won a board election for the steelmaker's holding company, has said it would make an offer for Weirton as soon as it is cleared for sale.

The ISU hasn't come out in favor of the Esmark proposal because it doesn't include the re-firing of the mill's hot end, shuttered by Mittal in 2005. Esmark's plan calls for Weirton's finishing capacity to augment its plans for Wheeling-Pitt. Other offers exist, according to the ISU, including one from steel investor Mitch Hecht, who would restart the hot end of the plant and return hundreds of ISU members to work. Esmark says its plans for Weirton would include about 100 more jobs in the finishing end of the plant.

One other item hanging in the balance on the Justice decision is the fate of the General Office and grounds at the south end of Three Springs Drive in Weirton.

The ISU said Friday the final move of Mittal management offices from the general offices has been completed. The offices are now headquartered at the Main Administration Building, at the corner of Main Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, across the street from the steel mill.

The MAB had been the headquarters of the mill until the General Offices were opened in the late 1950s or early 1960s. The General Offices were the headquarters for Weirton Steel as a division of National Steel Corp. and for the independent Weirton after it was sold by National to the mill's employees in 1984. The now-abandoned office building, once home to several hundred workers, has been slowly phased out in recent years, and Mittal management said shortly after taking over the Weirton mill in 2005 that it intended to move its management downtown, to be closer to the plant.

Mittal spokesman Dave Allen said Friday the move is a reflection that the mill no longer needs to house management for an entire steel company but functions as a single plant of a larger steelmaker. The ISU said the MAB offices include payroll, seniority and benefits, making it more convenient for employees.

"Anyone dropping off SUB pay forms or signing a bid sheet can stop at the MAB during normal workday hours, Monday through Friday, through the Pennsylvania Avenue parking lot doors," said Mark Glyptis, ISU president.

Allen said Mittal could not comment on the future of the General Office because of the pending Justice decision that could result in the sale of the building as part of the sale of the Weirton mill.

The independent Weirton Steel had sold outparcels of the property which are used by two firms as part of an industrial park. A sign in front of the General Office grounds, which also house a memorial to Weirton Steel's war veterans, says property is available for lease.

DOJ_NMG_0127138

Back at Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark's offer to finalize its purchase of the steelmaker has been given to an independent review committee for the board of directors. The committee will make a recommendation to the full Wheeling-Pitt board, which then, if it favors the proposal, could put it before the shareholders for a proxy vote. James and Craig Bouchard, the brothers who founded Esmark and were behind the drive for their steel service center firm to acquire Wheeling-Pitt, will recuse themselves from the board's handling of the offer. Both are top executives with Wheeling-Pitt under the new board of directors.

Esmark's offer, Keegan said, remains at the $20 per share that was first offered in July as part of its takeover battle for Wheeling-Pitt. The price was a premium above the $17.86 sale price that Wheeling-Pitt was trading in mid-July.

W-P's shares in recent days have risen to trade steadily above $25 a share and closed at $26.23 a share Friday.

Keegan further said Esmark could not comment on issues regarding the company's views of Wheeling-Pitt's joint ventures, including Wheeling-Nisshin in Follansbee and Ohio Coatings in Yorkville, until after it issues its fourth quarter and whole-year 2006 earnings reports, expected Feb. 28. Also, the amount of payouts to former Wheeling-Pitt executives who have been sacked by Esmark is anticipated to be revealed in the report.

BAR/BRI Monolopy Class Action Settled For $49M (NLJ)

By Amanda Bronstad, Staff reporter

National Law Journal, February 5, 2007

LOS ANGELES — The publishers of the BAR/BRI law review course have agreed to pay $49 million to settle a case brought by a class of nearly 300,000 law students alleging they each were overcharged by about $1,000.

West Publishing Corp., the owner of the BAR/BRI, and Kaplan Inc., which makes the preparatory coursework for the Law School Admission Test, agreed to settle claims that they conspired to monopolize the law exam market. Ryan Rodriguez v. West Publishing Corp., No. 05cv3222 (C.D. Calif.).

The antitrust case had sought triple the $300 million in damages and applied to all students who took the BAR/BRI course from 1997 to 2006.

The parent company of West Publishing, The Thomson Corp., has agreed to pay $36 million as part of the proposed settlement, according to John Shaughnessy, senior director of corporate communications at the legal and regulatory market group of The Thomson Corp.

"We are pleased to bring a close to his matter as the alleged actions that formed the basis of the suit occurred years prior to Thomson acquiring the business," he said in an e-mailed statement.

Kaplan agreed to pay nearly $13 million as part of the proposed settlement.

Eliot Disner, a partner in the Los Angeles office of McGuireWoods who brought the year-old case, said the proposed settlement, minus attorney fees, comes to $37 million for class members. He estimated that, with 290,000 anticipated class members, each would receive about $125, although that amount could be higher if some members don't claim their share.

"This gives a measure of relief to the injured class," Disner said, nothing that both companies also agreed to end certain co-marketing agreements that came into question in the case.

The proposed settlement has yet to be preliminarily approved by a judge.

Disner said he anticipated such approval by early March, with a final settlement to be approved sometime this summer. Class members could potentially receive their settlement checks by September or October, he said.

Simon Sets Rival Offer For Mills (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

Simon Property Group Inc. and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management yesterday lobbed in a roughly $1.56 billion offer for Mills Corp., a move designed to derail a $1.35 billion agreement with Brookfield Asset Management.

Investors had for weeks been expecting a higher offer for Mills, a real-estate investment trust with dozens of shopping malls around the country. As Mills's largest shareholder, Farallon has aggressively pushed for a higher offer for the Chevy Chase, Md.-based company.

· The Play: Simon Property and hedge fund Farallon made a $1.56 billion offer for mall owner Mills, a move designed to derail a $1.35 billion pact with Canada's Brookfield.

· Takeover Trends: Hedge funds are increasingly comfortable assuming controlling ownership stakes, and the bid is another example of suitors showing little fear about busting up an agreed-upon deal.

· Hot Neighborhood: Commercial real estate remains a big lure for investors, even as residential property values continue to suffer.

DOJ_NMG_0127139

The emergence of Simon, the country's largest REIT by market value, gives Farallon's efforts some important momentum. The two are expected to put up equal amounts of equity to help fund their bid, creating a per-share price of $24, greater than the $21-per-share deal struck by Brookfield, based in Canada, last month. Mills also has an additional $6 billion-plus in debt and preferred stock that the two partners would assume.

The offer puts into relief two of the emerging deal-making themes of 2007: Hedge funds are getting increasingly comfortable assuming controlling ownership stakes and are finding willing allies among corporate stalwarts such as Simon. The new year has also brought a spate of "jumped" transactions, in which bidders have shown little fear about busting up an agreed-upon deal. Robust financing markets have made such maneuvers possible, and bankers on Wall Street expect still more unsolicited activity in the months ahead.

Simon's move also highlights the seemingly relentless rise of commercial real-estate, even while residential property values continue to suffer. Simon already is the country's largest mall developer, with interests in 285 properties throughout the U.S. The Indianapolis-based firm had developed five properties with Mills during the 1990s, and is in a "better position to enhance its assets" than other owners, a person close to Simon said yesterday.

To help push its efforts, Simon and Farallon are structuring their proposal as a cash tender offer, which would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash within a matter of weeks, this person said. That could be as much as six months earlier than Brookfield's plan. The team has also lined up support of another large shareholder, Stark Master Fund Ltd., which has given the duo an option to acquire its 2.8 million Mills shares.

To succeed, Farallon and Simon must first win support of Mills's board, which needs to find their proposal a "superior competing transaction" to begin negotiations. That would, in essence, kick off a new auction for Mills just weeks after a months-long auction appeared to conclude.

Brookfield, which owns a controlling stake in office-building owner Brookfield Properties Corp., focuses on long-term, income-producing investments such as hydropower, timber and commercial real estate, and has more than $50 billion in assets under management. But most of its commercial-real-estate holdings are in office buildings, not retail. That raised questions among some analysts.

The earlier Brookfield agreement appeared to end a 15-month drama for Mills, which ran into ill-fated developments and accounting woes that may have been a result of misconduct, according to the company. On Friday, Mills shares closed up 17 cents to $22.15 each, a price that is still 44% below the company's value of a year ago, and 8% lower than its market capitalization of 1997.

Triad Nears Private-Equity Pact (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

CCMP, Goldman to Lead $4.4 Billion Hospital Deal; Blackstone May Be Spoiler

Triad Hospitals Inc. was expected last night to announce a deal as early as this morning to sell the company to private-equity buyers for about $4.4 billion.

The likely buyers of the Plano, Texas, hospital chain were CCMP Capital Advisors LLC and the private-investment arm of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., people familiar with the matter said.

Rival Blackstone Group also was in the hunt and might still snatch Triad at the last moment, these people added.

The deal may presage more buyouts or acquisitions in the sector: Hospitals have been fertile territory for buyout shops lately, most notably in last year's record-setting purchase of hospital giant HCA Inc.

The deal would value the company at $50.25 a share, a 16% premium over Friday's close of $43.27 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Triad, spun off by HCA in May 1999, had 51 general acute-care hospitals and 10 ambulatory-surgery centers in early 2006, primarily in small southern U.S. cities.

Triad has been considered a likely buyout target by many analysts after an October conference call in which executives said they had held talks with "various groups" that would continue, though they said nothing was then imminent.

At about the same time, Community Health Systems Inc. of Brentwood, Tenn., said it was considering going private, among a variety of strategies. In addition, Health Management Associates Inc. of Naples, Fla., borrowed to pay shareholders a dividend valued at half its share price, which analysts described as the equivalent of a public buyout.

Generally, hospital stocks "are trading as if something is going to happen," Cowen & Co. health-care analyst Kemp Dolliver said last week. Mr. Dolliver didn't directly address the Triad deal.

Private-equity firms see opportunity in the hospital sector in part because of the extensive cash flow many companies have devoted to expansion and capital expense. By reducing capital expense, the buyers may free up enough cash to pay down leverage necessary to consummate the deals.

HCA's buyers have said their goal is long-term, to improve the quality and efficiency of the chain's hospitals in anticipation of a sector comeback.

Still, private-equity firms face tough challenges. Hospital companies are struggling with, among other problems, stagnant admission in recent quarters and rising bad debt stemming from the expanding ranks of uninsured patients.

Analysts have noted that between a third and half of hospital-company revenue comes from the government, chiefly Medicare, the federal program for the elderly and disabled, and Medicaid, the joint state-federal health-care program for the poor. Both government and private insurers have been stingy with price increases, and even crack turnaround management won't have much pricing power, analysts say.

However, buyouts could give hospitals breathing room to make necessary changes while waiting for market conditions to improve. "It's almost analogous to Chapter 11—give them the protection to restructure," Paul Mango, a hospital consultant in Pittsburgh at McKinsey & Co., said last week, speaking generally.

Triad's board includes Gale Sayers, a former running back for the Chicago Bears and 1965 rookie of the year, who now runs The Sayers 40 Inc., a technology consulting firm founded by Mr. Sayers and his wife, Ardythe in 1982.

The likely buyers in the Triad deal were advised by J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Goldman Sachs and Citigroup Inc. and attorneys at O'Melveny & Myers. Triad was advised by Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc. and law firm Baker Botts.

The company ran a limited auction, and the board's special committee pressed for a number of protections to seek a higher offer. Those include a small break-up fee and a 40-day so-called "go shop" period in which the company can find a higher price.

A Climate-change Cost Analysis (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, February 5, 2007

The human and economic cost of global warming will move to center stage when the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change releases the second and third installments of its report this spring, experts say.

"Now, stronger results are being expressed with higher confidence in terms of impacts that will be triggered by temperature increases," says economist Gary Yohe of Wesleyan University in Middletown, Conn. Yohe is an author of the climate change panel's report due in April called "Impacts, Adaptation and Vulnerability."

The panel's report is the creation of three separate "working groups," which each prepare a separate report. The first, which was released Friday and involved the efforts of thousands of scientists and government reviewers, concludes with 90% certainty that humanity is triggering global warming by burning fossil fuels, cutting down forests and other activities.

The April report will pick up the ball from there to answer the "So what?" question, Yohe says. The document will assess the effect of warming on socioeconomic and natural systems and show that the effects on people "are distributed across the globe and in every major sector of human activity," he says.

Like other climate panel reports, the impacts assessment will review and combine studies conducted since 2001. Ocean acidification that is killing corals and sea life, disappearing species, the failure of crops and water supplies and other calamities have been detailed in journals in recent years, notes climate scientist Patrick Gonzalez of the Nature Conservancy.

The third report, to be released in May, focuses on "mitigation" measures, such as taxing carbon dioxide production.

"Mitigation has become an issue of more broadly appreciated importance," says economist Jae Edmonds of the Pacific Northwest National Laboratory in College Park, Md., pointing to a flurry of legislative activity on Capitol Hill aimed at limiting carbon dioxide emissions. "If carbon change really is serious, probably it's about time to think seriously about it."

But the third report, which also examines technology options, from biofuels to windmills to "sequestration" of industrial greenhouse gases in underground rock layers, won't be a cookbook of fixes for global warming, Edmonds says. "People will find we face a complex problem — not an insoluble one, but it will take real efforts."

Landing just as congressional and state leaders have taken up climate change legislation, the three reports come at a pivotal moment, Gonzalez says. "All three reports are important; the progress of science is narrowing down answers."

The Nature Conservancy already uses published studies to target climate efforts worldwide, including:

·Sierra Nevada Mountains. With the Agriculture Department's Forest Service, conserving mountain valleys, meadows and wetlands vegetation as warming moves up mountain slopes over about 700,000 acres.

·Florida Keys. Monitoring coral reef bleaching and planning to farm heat-resistant corals.

·Yunnan, China. Mapping ecology of mountain areas already affected by warming.

How Do We Stop The Warming? (LAT)

By Alan Zarembo

Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

Everybody in the United States could switch from cars to bicycles.

The Chinese could close all their factories.

Europe could give up electricity and return to the age of the lantern.

But all those steps together would not come close to stopping global warming.

A landmark report from the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, released Friday, warns that there is so much carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases in the atmosphere that even if concentrations held at current levels, the effects of global warming would continue for centuries.

There is still hope. The report notes that a concerted world effort could stave off the direst consequences of global warming, such as widespread flooding, drought and extreme weather.

Ultimately eliminating the global warming threat, however, would require radical action.

To stabilize atmospheric levels of carbon dioxide — the primary contributor to global warming — CO2 emissions would have to drop 70% to 80%, said Richard Somerville, a theoretical meteorologist at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

Such a reduction would bring emissions into equilibrium with the planet's ability to absorb carbon dioxide. The last time the planet was in balance was more than 150 years ago, before the widespread use of coal and steam engines.

What would it take to bring that kind of reduction?

"All truck, all trains, all airplanes, cars, motorcycles and boats in the United States — that's 7.3% of global emissions," said Gregg Marland, a fossil fuel pollution expert at Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tennessee.

Closing all fossil-fuel-powered electricity plants worldwide and replacing them with windmills, solar panels and nuclear power plants would make a serious dent — a 39% reduction globally, Marland said.

His calculation doesn't include all the fossil fuels that would have to be burned to build the greener facilities, though.

Trees could be planted to absorb more carbon dioxide. But even if every available space in the United States were turned into woodland, Marland said, it would not come close to offsetting U.S. emissions.

"There is not enough land area," he said.

The United States accounts for nearly a quarter of the carbon dioxide released each year, according to government statistics. China, in second at about 15%, is gaining fast.

If the rest of the world returned to the Stone Age, carbon concentrations would still rise.

Carbon does not dissipate rapidly. Some is eventually absorbed by oceans and plants, but about half stays in the atmosphere. And there is no easy way to get it out.

Maintaining current levels would require reducing worldwide carbon dioxide emissions by more than 20 billion tons a year, federal statistics suggest.

For some perspective on that number, consider an icon of the green movement: a 2007 Toyota Prius. Driving it 12,000 miles releases 4,200 pounds of carbon dioxide.

If hybrid cars replaced all 245 million cars in the United States — more than a third of the cars in the world — the carbon savings would be less than 3% of the needed reduction.

Rapid industrial development in some of the most populous nations has compounded the problem. Their burgeoning emissions could swamp environmental gains in other countries.

In India, carbon dioxide emissions increased 39% between 1993 and 2004 — nearly double the global rate. The figure was 36% in Indonesia. China, which saw a 45% rise, now opens a coal-fired power plant every week to 10 days.

Given the scale of the problem, experts see no realistic way to lower the concentration of atmospheric carbon.

In fact, Robert Socolow, a carbon mitigation expert at Princeton University, said that even if the entire world stopped burning fossil fuels, carbon wouldn't approach pre-Industrial Revolution levels for several hundred years.

The only possibility now is to slow the buildup of carbon. If emissions can be reduced enough, the gradual process of warming can be stretched into centuries.

From this perspective, there is some hope. Though the savings from any one measure may look small, in combination, they could add up to something significant, experts said.

There is no shortage of ideas.

The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, said high-efficiency appliances and other products in the Energy Star program last year eliminated greenhouse gas emissions equal to the pollution from 23 million cars.

DOJ_NMG_0127142

"As a citizen, each of us has an opportunity to make a difference," he said Friday after the release of the U.N. report.

He urged people to use compact fluorescent light bulbs, which provide the same light as a standard bulb on two-thirds of the energy. Replacing one standard light bulb in every U.S. home would prevent greenhouse gases equivalent to the emissions of nearly 800,000 cars.

Tips from TerraPass Inc. of Menlo Park, Calif., include going back to clotheslines. The company, which promotes alternative energy, says eliminating a family's dryer could save electricity equivalent to 1,016 pounds of carbon dioxide a year.

Socolow said the ultimate solution might rely on technology.

He said his research suggested that by improving energy efficiency now and phasing out fossil fuels over the next 100 years, carbon concentrations could remain within safe levels.

The biggest polluter, he said, should lead the way: "The U.S. is going to have to decarbonize."

AEI Critiques Of Warming Questioned (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, February 5, 2007

A Washington-based think tank has been soliciting critiques of the just-released international assessment of the evidence on climate change, a move that prompted some academics and environmentalists to accuse the group of seeking to distort the latest evidence for global warming.

Advocacy groups such as Greenpeace and the Public Interest Research Group questioned why the American Enterprise Institute (AEI) has offered $10,000 to academics willing to contribute to a book on climate- change policy, an overture that was first reported Friday in London's Guardian newspaper.

Greenpeace spokeswoman Jane Kochersperger, who noted that AEI has received funding from Exxon Mobil in recent years, said yesterday that the think tank "has clearly hit a new low . . . when it's throwing out cash awards under the rubric of 'reason' to create confusion on the status of climate science. Americans are still suffering the impacts of Hurricane Katrina, and it's clearly time for policymakers on both sides of the aisle to take substantive action on global warming and ignore Exxon Mobil's disinformation campaign via climate skeptics."

AEI visiting scholar Kenneth Green -- one of two researchers who has sought to commission the critiques -- said in an interview that his group is examining the policy debate on global warming, not the science.

"It's completely policy-oriented," said Green, adding that a third of the academics AEI solicited for the project are interested in participating. "Somebody wants to distort this."

In July 2006, Green and AEI resident scholar Steven F. Hayward -- both of whom have questioned the need for caps on emissions of carbon dioxide and other gasses linked to global warming -- started soliciting essays from academics on the then-upcoming report on global warming by the U.N.-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). The survey's authors, who hail from more than 100 countries, said in their report Friday that they are at least 90 percent certain that human activity accounted for climate change over the past 50 years.

"The purpose of the project is to highlight the strengths and weaknesses of the IPCC process, especially as it bears on policy responses to climate change," the two men wrote. "As with any large-scale 'consensus' process, the IPCC is susceptible to self-selection bias in its personnel, resistant to reasonable criticism and dissent, and prone to summary conclusions that are poorly supported by the analytical work of the complete Working Group reports."

At least two academics -- Texas A&M University atmospheric sciences professor Gerald North and Texas A&M climate researcher Steven Schroeder -- turned down AEI's offer because they feared their work would be politicized.

Schroeder, who has worked with Green in the past and has questioned some aspects of traditional climate modeling, said in an interview that he did not think AEI would have skewed his results. But he added that he worried his contribution might have been published alongside "off-the-wall ideas" questioning the existence of global warming.

"We worried our work could be misused even if we produced a reasonable report," Schroeder said. "While any human endeavor can be criticized, the IPCC system greatly exceeds the cooperation, openness and scientific rigorousness of the process applied to any other problem area that has significant effects on society."

Faced with such resistance, AEI modified its proposal last month and sent out a new round of offers, asking academics to contribute to a book examining the broad policy options for dealing with global warming.

Hayward and Green wrote that "climate change has tended to be caught in a straightjacket between so-called 'skeptics' and so-called 'alarmists' with seemingly little room left in the middle for people who may have reasonable doubts or heterodox views about the range of policy descriptions that should be considered for climate change of uncertain dimensions."

Several environmental activists and climate scientists questioned why AEI would offer a $10,000 honorarium to scientists to critique the IPCC survey. Andrew Dessler, another Texas A&M atmospheric science professor, who has worked with both

Schroeder and North, said the move represents an effort by climate skeptics to create "reasonable doubt" in the minds of policymakers who are debating whether to limit greenhouse gases.

AEI President Christopher DeMuth issued a letter Friday saying his group will continue to challenge orthodox thinking on climate change: "The effort to anathematize opposing views is the standard recourse of the ideologue; one of AEI's highest purposes, here as in many other contentious areas, is to ensure that such efforts to do not succeed."

Climate Of Opinion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

Last week's headlines about the United Nation's latest report on global warming were typically breathless, predicting doom and human damnation like the most fervent religious evangelical. Yet the real news in the fourth assessment from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) may be how far it is backpedaling on some key issues. Beware claims that the science of global warming is settled.

The document that caused such a stir was only a short policy report, a summary of the full scientific report due in May. Written mainly by policymakers (not scientists) who have a stake in the issue, the summary was long on dire predictions. The press reported the bullet points, noting that this latest summary pronounced with more than "90% confidence" that humans have been the main drivers of warming since the 1950s, and that higher temperatures and rising sea levels would result.

More pertinent is the underlying scientific report. And according to people who have seen that draft, it contains startling revisions of previous U.N. predictions. For example, the Center for Science and Public Policy has just released an illuminating analysis written by Lord Christopher Monckton, a one-time adviser to Margaret Thatcher who has become a voice of sanity on global warming.

Take rising sea levels. In its 2001 report, the U.N.'s best high-end estimate of the rise in sea levels by 2100 was three feet. Lord Monckton notes that the upcoming report's high-end best estimate is 17 inches, or half the previous prediction. Similarly, the new report shows that the 2001 assessment had overestimated the human influence on climate change since the Industrial Revolution by at least one-third.

Such reversals (and there are more) are remarkable, given that the IPCC's previous reports, in 1990, 1995 and 2001, have been steadily more urgent in their scientific claims and political tone. It's worth noting that many of the policymakers who tinker with the IPCC reports work for governments that have promoted climate fears as a way of justifying carbon-restriction policies. More skeptical scientists are routinely vetoed from contributing to the panel's work. The Pasteur Institute's Paul Reiter, a malaria expert who thinks global warming would have little impact on the spread of that disease, is one example.

U.N. scientists have relied heavily on computer models to predict future climate change, and these crystal balls are notoriously inaccurate. According to the models, for instance, global temperatures were supposed to have risen in recent years. Yet according to the U.S. National Climate Data Center, the world in 2006 was only 0.03 degrees Celsius warmer than it was in 2001 -- in the range of measurement error and thus not statistically significant.

The models also predicted that sea levels would rise much faster than they actually have. The models didn't predict the significant cooling the oceans have undergone since 2003 -- which is the opposite of what you'd expect with global warming. Cooler oceans have also put a damper on claims that global warming is the cause of more frequent or intense hurricanes. The models also failed to predict falling concentrations of methane in the atmosphere, another surprise.

Meanwhile, new scientific evidence keeps challenging previous assumptions. The latest report, for instance, takes greater note of the role of pollutant particles, which are thought to reflect sunlight back to space, supplying a cooling effect. More scientists are also studying the effect of solar activity on climate, and some believe it alone is responsible for recent warming.

All this appears to be resulting in a more cautious scientific approach, which is largely good news. We're told that the upcoming report is also missing any reference to the infamous "hockey stick," a study by Michael Mann that purported to show 900 years of minor fluctuations in temperature, followed by a dramatic spike over the past century. The IPCC featured the graph in 2001, but it has since been widely rebutted.

While everyone concedes that the Earth is about a degree Celsius warmer than it was a century ago, the debate continues over the cause and consequences. We don't deny that carbon emissions may play a role, but we don't believe that the case is sufficiently proven to justify a revolution in global energy use. The economic dislocations of such an abrupt policy change could be far more severe than warming itself, especially if it reduces the growth and innovation that would help the world cope with, say, rising sea levels. There are also other problems -- AIDS, malaria and clean drinking water, for example -- whose claims on scarce resources are at least as urgent as climate change.

The IPCC report should be understood as one more contribution to the warming debate, not some definitive last word that justifies radical policy change. It can be hard to keep one's head when everyone else is predicting the Apocalypse, but that's all the more reason to keep cool and focus on the actual science.

Global Warning (WP)

Washington Post, February 5, 2007

IT'S NOT quite the hurricane-force blow to skeptics of global warming that many climatologists would have preferred, but for a document drafted by hundreds of scientists representing 113 governments, the latest report from the United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, released Friday, is nevertheless full of frightening evidence and, we hope, policy-inducing conclusions.

Here are some of the more notable conclusions: There is no doubt that the planet is warming, according to all sorts of measures, from rising air and ocean temperatures to widespread melting of snow and ice. Increases in global temperature are "very likely" the result of higher concentrations of greenhouse gases, which are far higher now than they have been over the past 650,000 years. Policymakers should expect global temperatures to continue to rise, even if greenhouse gas concentrations stay at the levels of the year 2000. Continuing to release greenhouse gases at current rates would warm the Earth even more and would be "very likely" to yield much more severe consequences during this century than those we saw in the previous one. Sea levels will rise, heat waves and droughts will strike longer and more often, hurricanes will become more intense, and it will rain more in high latitudes.

Many climate scientists say the report doesn't go far enough. Michael Mann, a leading climatologist at Pennsylvania State University, welcomes the assessment, but he says that it probably underestimates how high oceans could rise over the next century or so, especially if the ice covering Greenland melts faster than expected. He may be right: Recent research on melting ice caps suggests that cracks in the ice will speed up the melting process.

The assessment's value does not lie in its innovative approach to describing global climate change. On the contrary, because so many individuals and organizations signed on, the report's strong language is virtually unassailable. Even the Bush administration hailed it, which makes the president's continued neglect of the issue particularly troubling. Now that leaders in the United States and abroad have agreed on the basics of the problem and the seriousness of the consequences, sound policy -- the likes of which President Bush continues to oppose -- should follow.

Yellowstone Proposal Sets Greater Snowmobile Access (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, Wyo. — The latest installment in the long-running debate over the use of snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park is a proposal to allow as many as 720 to enter each day, nearly three times as many as permitted in the last several years.

The plan, which could be adopted by the end of the year, has drawn fire from environmentalists and praise from snowmobile advocates and some businesses in the communities around the park.

The plan is described in a preliminary draft environmental impact statement that was released to agencies and governments near the park for comment in December. The Park Service could change the plan before releasing a final version to the public next month for comment, but so far it is favoring greatly expanded winter use. About 250 snowmobiles a day use the park now. The historical average in the 1990s was 795 a day, before access was banned by the Clinton administration.

Critics say that snowmobiles will be detrimental to the park's pristine air, wildlife and quiet. Michael Finley, who was superintendent of Yellowstone for more than six years, and who oversaw the plan that banned snowmobiles, said the Park Service was skirting its responsibilities under the new plan.

"The facts and science gave them a direction to take, then they softened, twisted and contorted the science," Mr. Finley said. "The plan deserves to be challenged. It deserves burial in deep snow."

In late 2006, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne reaffirmed the parks' commitment to policies emphasizing the conservation of natural and cultural resources over recreation.

But Tim Stevens, Yellowstone program director for the National Parks and Conservation Association, said the proposed standards were misguided.

"Instead of meeting the bars they set for themselves, they lowered the bars," Mr. Stevens said.

John Sacklin, a management assistant at Yellowstone who has worked on the issue since the 1990s, said that the park had not abdicated its responsibilities and that the new plan still protected the park's natural assets.

"We can achieve those goals," Mr. Sacklin said, "with a managed program that allows limited snowmobile and snow-coach use."

Mr. Sacklin said snowmobile technology had gotten much cleaner and quieter. And all snowmobiles must travel with a guide, who enforces strict rules. The new plan also requires noise reduction technology on snow-coaches.

DOJ_NMG_0127145

As far as increasing the limit from current use, he said, “It’s hard to know what the real demand or desire might be.”

“We were comfortable with a middle ground of 720,” he added.

Before 2000, snowmobile use was unregulated. Hundreds of vehicles with roaring two-stroke motors entered the park daily, and noise, pollution, harassment of wildlife and moving violations became serious problems. A lawsuit by a wildlife group, the Fund for Animals, forced the park to take a hard look at the issue.

The first study, in the late 1990s, found that banning snowmobiles and allowing only snow-coaches — buses or vans on large skis or treads — would protect the park the best. In 2000, near the end of the Clinton administration, the Park Service adopted that recommendation.

That decision was reversed after the Bush administration took over. Two subsequent studies, in 2002 and 2003, found that snowmobiles were compatible with park values. A lawsuit has followed each study and forced another.

Critics say the latest preliminary draft is faulty in three major areas, including its effects on air quality and on wildlife. Perhaps the most evident is the noise levels it would allow.

In the winter of 2003-4, a study by the Park Service looked at whether snowmobiles were audible more than 50 percent of the time at Old Faithful. Even the new, quieter snowmobiles, numbering about 250 a day, exceeded that threshold, creating “major adverse effects.”

The last two environmental studies raised the threshold. Major adverse effects were considered to exist if visitors to Old Faithful heard snowmobiles more than 75 percent of the time. This relaxed standard was still exceeded with 250 snowmobiles a day entering the park.

“People go to Yellowstone one time in their lives with a few hours at Old Faithful,” said Jon Catton, an independent environmentalist who has worked on the issue for eight years. “You can hear the hiss and splash of Old Faithful, the howl of a wolf, or the persistent buzz, whine and roar of snowmobiles.”

The Ethanol Mirage: What Is GM Talking About? (USNEWS)

By Marianne Lavelle And Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, February 4, 2007

More from Money & Business

More from this issue Is Ethanol the Answer? Politically it's a winner. But experts aren't sure ethanol can deliver on its promise

Posted Sunday, February 4, 2007

Galva, Iowa-This farming town of fewer than 400 people might be most memorable for what it doesn't have: a Wal-Mart, a high school, even a stoplight. But humble Galva and its environs have two things in abundance: corn and, by extension, hope.

"We feel we're on the cusp here as far as things happening," says Rita Frahm, an 18-year resident and president of the county's economic development corporation. That's because Galva is the lucky home of an ethanol plant.

Since opening in 2002, the plant has produced ever increasing dividends, to date putting more than $13 million into the hands of the 420 local farmers and investors who own it. That cash is slowly but markedly changing Galva's landscape. For the first time in 30 years, the town witnessed construction of three new homes at once, and a whole new street, Sixth Street, on which to place the houses. Those dwellings are now occupied by families "who saw an opportunity to stay rather than the community dying," Frahm says.

Heartwarming stories like Galva's-in a state that hosts the first presidential contest-help explain why Washington is so fired up over ethanol. In 2006, production skyrocketed, and Washington is poised to push it still higher. What's not to like? Every gallon theoretically means more money for the iconic American farmer and less cash lining the pockets of foreign sheiks. "There's almost a sense," says Iowa State University political scientist Steffen Schmidt, "that ethanol is morally better than oil."

Washington loves a "win-win," but there are plenty of doubts as to whether the love affair with ethanol qualifies. Even though the ethanol industry profited handsomely last year, it continued to benefit from billions of dollars in taxpayer subsidies. And as ethanol becomes a larger part of the energy mix, it is not clear that Washington is prepared for the fallout. Ethanol already consumes so much corn that signs of strain on the food supply and prices are rippling across the marketplace. Environmental impacts will multiply as more land and water are devoted to the prized yellow grain. And, even if these problems were overcome, ethanol's potential growth could be stunted by an energy system currently tailored to gasoline. Ethanol undoubtedly plays a role in the quest for energy independence and the desire to curb global warming. But some observers worry that ethanol development may take the place of more effective initiatives: forcing automakers to increase gas mileage, for instance, or mandating cuts in carbon dioxide emissions. "Some members of Congress are looking for quick fixes," says one economist who has studied the issue. "It's an easy bandwagon to jump on. But there's a lot of exaggeration about what ethanol is capable of doing."

Beginnings

Ethanol is alcohol distilled from fermented, mashed grain. It took a century for it to make a big splash on the U.S. energy scene, even though Henry Ford built his first Model T in 1908 to run on either gasoline or ethanol. Over the decades, petroleum proved cheaper, and grain alcohol was relegated to college fraternity parties rather than gas tanks. No one looked seriously at ethanol as fuel until the oil price shocks of the 1970s, when Congress decided to subsidize a homegrown alternative-most significantly through a tax credit to oil companies for every gallon of the costly alternative they blended into gasoline. But when oil prices fell again in the late 1980s through the 1990s, the nation's dependence on petroleum imports mushroomed to 60 percent, and ethanol was reduced to a performance-boosting additive for some midwestern gasoline-a nice, subsidized side business for the dominant producer, Archer Daniels Midland.

Will: Inconvenient Kyoto Truths (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Was life better when a sheet of ice a mile thick covered Chicago? Was it worse when Greenland was so warm that Vikings farmed there?

Enough already. It is time to call some bluffs. John Kerry says that one reason America has become an "international pariah" is President Bush's decision to "walk away from global warming." Kerry's accusation is opaque, but it implies the usual complaint that Bush is insufficiently enthusiastic about the Kyoto Protocol's binding caps on emissions of greenhouse gases. Many senators and other experts in climate science say we must "do something" about global warming. Barack Obama says "the world" is watching to see "what action we take."

Fine. President Bush should give the world something amusing to watch. He should demand that the Senate vote on the protocol.

Climate Cassandras say the facts are clear and the case is closed. (Sen. Barbara Boxer: "We're not going to take a lot of time debating this anymore.") The consensus catechism about global warming has six tenets: 1. Global warming is happening. 2. It is our (humanity's, but especially America's) fault. 3. It will continue unless we mend our ways. 4. If it continues we are in grave danger. 5. We know how to slow or even reverse the warming. 6. The benefits from doing that will far exceed the costs.

Only the first tenet is clearly true, and only in the sense that the Earth warmed about 0.7 degrees Celsius in the 20th century. We do not know the extent to which human activity caused this. The activity is economic growth, the wealth-creation that makes possible improved well-being—better nutrition, medicine, education, etc. How much reduction of such social goods are we willing to accept by slowing economic activity in order to (try to) regulate the planet's climate?

We do not know how much we must change our economic activity to produce a particular reduction of warming. And we do not know whether warming is necessarily dangerous. Over the millennia, the planet has warmed and cooled for reasons that are unclear but clearly were unrelated to SUVs. Was life better when ice a mile thick covered Chicago? Was it worse when Greenland was so warm that Vikings farmed there? Are we sure the climate at this particular moment is exactly right, and that it must be preserved, no matter the cost?

It could cost tens of trillions (in expenditures and foregone economic growth, here and in less-favored parts of the planet) to try to fine-tune the planet's temperature. We cannot know if these trillions would purchase benefits commensurate with the benefits that would have come from social wealth that was not produced.

In 1997, when the Kyoto Protocol's essential provisions were known, a "sense of the Senate" resolution declared opposition to any agreement that would do what the protocol aims to do. The Senate warned against any agreement that would require significant reductions of greenhouse-gas emissions in the United States and other developed nations without mandating "specific scheduled commitments" on the part of the 129 "developing" countries, which include China, India, Brazil and South Korea—the second, fourth, 10th and 11th largest economies. Nothing Americans can do to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions will make a significant impact on the global climate while every 10 days China fires up a coal-fueled generating plant big enough to power San Diego. China will construct 2,200 new coal plants by 2030.

The Senate's resolution expressed opposition to any agreement that "would result in serious harm to the economy of the United States," which the Senate correctly thought Kyoto would do. The Senate said any agreement should be accompanied by "a detailed explanation of any legislation or regulatory actions that may be required to implement" it, and an analysis of the agreement's "detailed financial costs and other impacts" on the U.S. economy.

The president is now on the side of the angels, having promised to "confront" the challenge of climate change. The confronting is one reason for his fascination with new fuels. (Another reason, he says, is U.S. imports of oil from unstable nations. Our largest foreign source of oil is turbulent Canada. Our second largest is Mexico, which is experiencing turbulence because of the soaring cost of tortillas. They are made from corn, which is ... well, read on.)

Ethanol produces just slightly more energy than it takes to manufacture it. But now that the government is rigging energy markets with mandates, tariffs and subsidies, ethanol production might consume half of next year's corn crop. The price of corn already has doubled in a year. Hence the tortilla turbulence south of the border. Forests will be felled (will fewer trees mean more global warming?) to clear land for growing corn, which requires fertilizer, the manufacture of which requires energy. Oh, my.

President Clinton and his earnest vice president knew better than to seek ratification of Kyoto by a Senate that had passed its resolution of disapproval 95-0. Fifty-six of those 95 senators are still serving. Two of them are John Kerry and Barbara Boxer. That is an inconvenient truth.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

21 In Dorchester, Quincy Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Charles A. Radin, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 3, 2007

Called members of drug rings tying Canada to Boston area

They worked out of nondescript little storefronts around Dorchester and Quincy: a flower shop, nail salon, grocery store, and wood floor finishing business. But yesterday law enforcement officials said the unidentified businesses were covers for members of Vietnamese drug rings who had been smuggling ecstasy and marijuana from Canada over the past two years and peddling it throughout Greater Boston.

Four indictments handed down by a federal grand jury Thursday and unsealed yesterday charged 23 people, ranging in age from 22 to 56, with conspiring to sell ecstasy or marijuana, and in some cases both. Three of them were also charged with money laundering.

"This ecstasy was manufactured in clandestine laboratories in Canada, then smuggled into the United States, ending up in Boston and further distributed to gangs and other buyers in the city," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Boston office.

The alleged drug organization was dismantled from top to bottom by investigators who targeted the Canadian supplier and arrested local gangs that sold the drugs in the Boston area, Stansbury told reporters during a news conference yesterday.

The investigation started when an immigrant, who was facing possible deportation in February 2005 after his arrest on charges involving drugs, guns, and an assault on a police officer, began cooperating with Boston police and the DEA and identified a list of local drug dealers, according to an affidavit filed in federal court.

A task force of federal agents, state troopers, and local police tapped telephones, sifted through trash, made undercover drug buys, and conducted exhaustive surveillance during a 15-month probe dubbed Operation Polar Express that led to the four indictments, according to law enforcement officials.

Investigators seized 85,000 ecstasy pills, worth nearly $2.6 million on the street, 130 pounds of marijuana, five guns, and $25,000.

Law enforcement officials raided houses in Dorchester and Quincy yesterday and arrested 21 of those charged.

The remaining two suspects were being sought last night, officials said.

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the indictments "will have an immediate and positive impact on the city of Boston and the neighboring communities."

Some of the ecstasy pills seized were laced with methamphetamine, which was added by the manufacturer to make the drug more addictive.

Sullivan called the mixture "a dangerous trend" that has been developing across the country over the past few years.

Boston Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis said, "These drugs that were being sold on the streets of our city were destroying the qualify of life for people and driving the crime rate up."

Among those indicted were a family that lives on Bloomfield Street in Dorchester, including Tiem Trinh , 54; his wife, Anna , 51; and their sons Antwon Trinh , 24, and Quoc Boa Trinh, 27.

Quoc Boa Trinh, an alleged ringleader, is charged in three separate indictments with conspiring to sell ecstasy and marijuana and money laundering.

His parents and brother are charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

Boston lawyer Michael C. Andrews, who is representing Quoc Boa Trinh, said his client works at his father's convenience store, TJ Variety, and is "a hard-working young man from a good family."

His client is "looking forward to his day in court," Andrews said.

A neighbor of the Trinhs said they "were very nice people."

"I don't know much about them, but we never had any trouble," the neighbor said.

The family had lived in the house for more than two years, the neighbor said.

But affidavits filed in federal court offered a different portrait.

A witness told investigators that Quoc Boa Trinh wore a bulletproof vest, owned a couple of guns, and obtained up to 300 pounds of marijuana a week from his supplier, Tan Dinh Phung, 43, of Dorchester. Phung was also arrested yesterday.

Last night, investigators were searching for Hung Van Le, 37, of Revere and Van H. Nguyen, 25, of Dorchester.

Affidavits also assert that Nguyen and another man indicted , Long T. Vu, picked up 40,000 ecstasy pills in Buffalo in December. They were stopped by Massachusetts State Police, who seized the drugs. Vu, 23, of Christy Lane in Randolph, is in custody.

DEA: Wide-ranging Drug Ring Busted (BOSH)

Boston Herald, February 3, 2007

Federal authorities said they seized 85,000 tablets of ecstasy and 100 pounds of marijuana when they dismantled what they described as an international drug ring with tentacles that reached north to Canada and across the Pacific to Vietnam.

Twenty-three defendants - all Vietnamese or Vietnamese Americans from Dorchester, Quincy, and Randolph - are accused of orchestrating the operation, distributing the drugs and laundering thousands in cash. Nineteen of them were arrested in a sweep Thursday and yesterday by federal agents. Arraignments are set for Monday.

The Drug Enforcement Administration has been investigating the operation for the past 15 months though surveillance, undercover purchases and “trash pulls” - or garbage searches.

All of the ecstasy and some of the greenhouse-grown marijuana came from Canada, agents said, and hundreds of pounds of marijuana were moved into the United States each week. The ring transferred the money it reaped in the United States to Canada and Vietnam.

Federal prosecutors now want the defendants to turn over hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash and land purchases. The ring had more than $150,000 in Bank of America accounts, $16,000 in money orders and three pieces of property, one in Dorchester and two in New York state,federal court documents state.

Feds Charge 23 In Ecstasy, Marijuana Ring (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

BOSTON (AP) - Federal authorities in Boston say 23 people in four states are facing drug charges for allegedly operating an ecstasy and marijuana ring with suppliers from Canada.

All but one of the defendants is Vietnamese, and most live in the Boston area.

One suspect lives in Woonsocket, Rhode Island; another in Hamden, Connecticut.

Nineteen arrests were made early Friday and authorities were searching for the other four.

Prosecutors say none of those charged live in Canada.

At the peak of the operation, officials say several hundred pounds of marijuana were transported to the Boston area from Canada and other U-S points.

The probe started in October 2005 and resulted in the seizure of 85-thousand ecstasy pills and 100 pounds of marijuana.

Mexico's Gangs Take Over U.S. Meth Trade (AR)

The Arizona Republic, February 4, 2007

MEXICO CITY - Four guards lay dead in pools of blood, their hands and feet bound with gray duct tape, as dawn broke over the Medix pharmaceutical plant in Mexico City. The gate was open, the security system dismantled.

It looked as well-planned as a bank heist. Except these robbers made off with a far bigger treasure: more than one ton of the chemical pseudoephedrine, enough to make 4 million hits of crystal methamphetamine, the hottest drug in America. The finished product could fetch $120 million on U.S. street corners.

The robbery at the Medix lab in July is part of a boom in Mexican meth as "superlabs" controlled by Mexican cartels take over what was once a mom-and-pop business in the United States.

"Mexican drug-trafficking organizations, being the entrepreneurs they are . . . decided they could produce large amounts of meth in Mexico, then smuggle it across the Southwest border using the same drug routes they've used for generations," said Steve Robertson, a spokesman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The cartels' labs in Mexico and California now produce about 80 percent of the meth in the United States, according to a November report by the U.S. National Drug Intelligence Center. And the cartels are far more organized than previous meth rings.

In August, Arizona prosecutors filed indictments against 69 people suspected of working with a meth and cocaine ring in Mexico's Sinaloa state. Police seized 50 pounds of meth and $2.5 million in cash.

"These were very sophisticated criminal operations," Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said. "They had lots of foot soldiers, they were very well armed, they were incredibly well financed. They are a very, very serious opponent."

A new business

Ice, crank, crystal, tweak, chalk, glass or speed: Methamphetamine goes by a lot of names. It's one of the most addictive drugs around and is as dangerous to make as it is to consume. The "cooking" process creates toxic chemicals, and labs often catch fire or explode.

For decades, homemade meth was a small-time drug. Meth "cooks" worked in home kitchens, making a few ounces for themselves or to sell through motorcycle gangs. A typical dose is one-quarter of a gram and costs $30, though price and purity vary widely.

The most popular meth recipe uses ephedrine, an ingredient in some asthma medications, or its chemical cousin pseudoephedrine, which is widely used in cold remedies.

But since the late 1990s, U.S. states have been passing laws limiting the sale of those drugs. Arizona passed a law in 2006 limiting purchases to 9 grams. Phoenix, Tucson, and 44 other Arizona cities and towns adopted even tougher rules, and President Bush signed a similar federal law in March.

As the raw materials become harder to get, small-time cooks are being put out of business. The Mexican cartels have rushed to fill the demand with California-based superlabs, which can produce more than 10 pounds of meth a day.

Less sophisticated cooks are usually caught when neighbors notice chemical smells or suspicious people hanging around at odd hours. But the Mexican cartels have built their superlabs shacks in remote areas of California's Central Valley.

Many of the labs have ventilation systems to combat the smells, and smugglers visit only a few times a week to pick up meth or drop off supplies. That makes the labs hard to find.

"We still have what we call the Beavis and Butthead labs . . . but the ones that we really have problems with are the large labs, the superlabs or even megalabs," said Kent Shaw, assistant chief of California's Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement. "Those are run by organized-crime groups, and almost exclusively those are Mexican-operated drug cartels."

DOJ_NMG_0127150

To augment their labs in California, the Mexican cartels began building labs in Mexico, where, until a recent crackdown, it was easy to import tons of raw pseudoephedrine from Asia.

In 2004, a Mexican government study found Mexico was importing four times the pseudoephedrine needed to treat the country's respiratory illnesses.

As the labs in Mexico ramp up production, meth seizures at border ports along the drug's main smuggling routes - California, Arizona, New Mexico and western Texas - have risen from 1,130 pounds in the 2002 fiscal year to 3,648 pounds in fiscal 2006.

"Most of the meth on the street right now is crystal meth from Mexico, I have no doubt about that," Goddard said. "It has created a national phenomenon, where a few years ago it was a regional phenomenon."

Butterflies and ice

For eons the towering fir trees of Michoacan state have sheltered clouds of monarch butterflies that migrate from across North America during the winter. They used to be the western state's only claim to international fame.

But now Michoacan is known for something else: cheap, high-quality meth.

Michoacan is ideally located between two big sources of raw materials: pharmaceutical plants in Mexico City, increasingly a target for looters, and the Pacific seaports where shipments of pseudoephedrine arrive from factories in Asia. Couriers take finished meth to Arizona and California along Mexico's Highway 15. Of the 31 major meth labs dismantled in Mexico in the past two years, 12 were in Michoacan, a Republic analysis shows.

During the same period, the state has become one of the bloodiest battlefields between warring cartels. Gangs have taken to decapitating their rivals: In one case in September, gunmen barged into a nightclub and threw five severed heads onto the dance floor.

In December, incoming President Felipe Calderón ordered 7,000 soldiers and federal police into Michoacan to stop the violence. During one raid, they seized 21 tons of Chinese pseudoephedrine at the port of Lazaro Cardenas. It was the biggest such bust in Mexican history.

Cracking down

Despite the boom, many experts believe the Mexican meth labs may have peaked.

"Further production increases are unlikely in the near term," the National Drug Intelligence Center said in its report.

It cited new rules the Mexican government has imposed on importers of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine. Authorities slashed the number of import permits from 246 tons in 2004 to 77 tons in 2006. Companies can import only 6,600 pounds of raw ephedrine or pseudoephedrine at a time, and they can get import permits only if the government determines there are enough patients to warrant more drug production.

To keep feeding the drug labs, gangs have begun looting pharmaceutical factories and hijacking medicine shipments. In August, shortly after the Medix heist, robbers stole a truck full of cold medicine from the Diprofar plant in Mexico City but were quickly caught.

In November, another gang killed a police officer and stole a truck full of cold medicine from the Marsan plant on the outskirts of the city.

The supply problem is acute because there are no producers of raw pseudoephedrine or ephedrine in Latin America.

"These (gangs) are facing serious difficulties in switching to the trafficking of pseudoephedrine," Mexican Attorney General Eduardo Medina told lawmakers in January.

Meanwhile, the U.S. has started training Mexican police to find meth labs. In September, 49 agents and six prosecutors graduated from the DEA's new anti-meth school in Quantico, Va. The U.S. government plans to train 1,000 more officers and is providing them hazardous-materials trucks.

"Whatever our differences in language, culture and, at times, opinion, we are united partners in our desire to drive the drug traffickers out of business and into jail," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a binational conference on meth last year.

2 Of 3 Men Sentenced In Cocaine Racket Get Life (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post, February 3, 2007

Two Jupiter men were sentenced to life in federal prison Thursday for their roles in a countywide cocaine distribution ring.

Their supplier, a Boynton Beach man, was sentenced to 20 years.

Winfred Lorenzo Hunt, 33, and Leonard Allen, Jr., 31, sold the narcotic from Delray Beach to Jupiter, with Hunt dealing about 2 kilograms of crack cocaine and a kilogram of powder cocaine a week, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Carlton Potts, 41, supplied Hunt with 2 to 3 kilograms of powder cocaine a week for more than 10 months. Hunt then turned the cocaine into crack cocaine and sold it on the streets of Delray Beach, officials said.

They were arrested along with 35 others in May in a massive sweep that included 450 officers from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office and the Boynton Beach, Delray Beach and Jupiter police departments.

Sixteen of those arrested are serving sentences ranging from two to 10 years, officials said.

Operation Magnum Force, the investigation leading to their convictions, spanned a year.

Hunt, considered a ringleader, had been arrested more than 25 times, according to Florida Department of Law Enforcement records. He was charged with several violent crimes, including shooting a 17-year-old in the abdomen, according to police records.

Allen had three prior convictions for selling cocaine, records show.

Potts' record includes 30 arrests on charges such as burglary, battery, drug sales and attempted murder.

"The investigation was in response to a community outcry for help," Delray Beach police Lt. Tommy Mitchell said. "It was a community effort involving law enforcement and the neighborhoods in which the drugs were being distributed."

Heroin In The Suburbs: Some Experts See Use On The Rise (PHI)

By Andrew Maykuth And Julie Stoiber

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

The questioning last week of the eldest son of Eagles coach Andy Reid in Montgomery County and his alleged confession of heroin use has renewed attention to narcotics abuse by affluent suburbanites.

"These stories are not uncommon, but they still seem to shock people," said Jeremiah Daley, executive director of the Philadelphia County High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area, a law enforcement clearinghouse.

While national statistics indicate that heroin abuse has been steady in recent years, some Philadelphia-area drug-treatment experts say it appears to be on the rise.

"We're seeing a number of young, affluent kids getting themselves hooked on heroin," said Risa Vetri Ferman, first assistant district attorney in Montgomery County, where Garrett Reid, 23, was taken in for questioning after his Jeep Liberty reportedly was speeding, ran a red light, and crashed into a Ford sedan Tuesday in Plymouth Township. Police said Garrett Reid had acknowledged using heroin that day and possessed drug paraphernalia.

"I wouldn't call it an epidemic, but it's a trend," she said. She declined to speak specifically about Garrett Reid or his brother Britt, 21, whom police questioned after a separate road-rage confrontation in West Conshohocken the same day.

Kim Bowman, executive director of the Chester County Department of Drug and Alcohol Services, said she believed more young people were dabbling with the drug, which can be injected or inhaled in powder form.

In a survey of 2,839 Chester County high school seniors last year, Bowman said, 1.3 percent said they had used heroin the previous month - above the national average. Four years before, 0.3 percent admitted using the opiate.

Other law enforcement officials, however, say national statistics do not support the anecdotal accounts of regional officials.

"Heroin has been and continues to be a drug-trafficking and drug-abuse problem in the Philadelphia area," Daley said. "It has not changed much in the past eight to 10 years."

William R. Hocker, spokesman for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said heroin use appeared stable.

"Heroin's a mainstay," he said. "It's always going to be there."

Most studies peg the number of Americans using heroin at a fraction of 1 percent. The federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration in 2004 estimated that 400,000 people had used heroin the previous year, compared with 25.5 million marijuana and hashish users and 5.8 million cocaine users.

But heroin remains one of the most ferociously addictive drugs, and the tolerance that users develop with prolonged use can lead a two-bag-a-week dabbler to escalate into a 12-bag-a-day addict. A bag typically costs $10 to $20.

While heroin use may be steady, there was a dramatic increase in deaths last year tied to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl.

In Philadelphia, about 70 people died last year from fentanyl-laced heroin, Hocker said.

In South Jersey, 133 people died between April and September from spiked heroin, half of them outside of Camden County, said Capt. Joe Bowen, with the Camden County Prosecutor's Office.

Bowen said that heroin had lost much of its stigma, and that young suburbanites routinely ventured into Camden to score from street-corner dealers.

"It's become more acceptable, more social," he said. "These young kids are not scared of heroin."

DOJ_NMG_0127152

Lloyd D. Johnston, a researcher at the University of Michigan and principal investigator for its annual survey of drug abuse, said heroin use among teens increased in the early 1990s, when the purity rose and forms of heroin that could be snorted or inhaled became more widely available.

Johnston's survey found that reported heroin use among eighth graders jumped in the early 1990s, reaching 1.2 percent in 1994. Use later declined and is now stable at about 0.8 percent.

Some heroin users say they started out first abusing legal painkillers such as OxyContin, an opiate frequently prescribed for patients recovering from surgery or injuries.

Most experts say the common impression of a heroin user as a destitute urban dweller is out of date.

"Our perception of an addict is someone who shoots dope, is homeless, and has lost everything," said William J. Lorman, clinical director of residential services at the Livengrin Foundation in Bensalem. "That is becoming less and less the case. We are seeing more middle-class working folks, young adults."

In that sense, the case of Garrett Reid is unusual only in that his father is a famous football coach, known as a practicing Mormon. The faith forbids use of alcohol, caffeine and drugs.

"It's sad that the Reid family has to deal with a substance-abuse problem in its midst with all the media attention," Daley said. "It's sadder still how may thousands of other families in the Delaware Valley have to deal with this every day."

Authorities served a search warrant Tuesday at Reid's home in Villanova. They said they had seized a shotgun and a handgun, along with containers of white powder or residue from a vehicle.

No charges have been filed against either of Reid's sons, and officials said their investigation was continuing. Police said they were waiting for drug and toxicology test results.

IMMIGRATION:

Ex-officer Pleads Guilty To Immigration Fraud (DMN)

By Jason Trahan, The Dallas Morning News Jtrahan@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 3, 2007

Dallas: He faces 10 years in deal for helping wife obtain fake visa

A former Dallas police officer has pleaded guilty to a federal charge of immigration fraud for helping his wife, a native of Mexico who was in the U.S. illegally and had ties to drug traffickers, obtain a fake visa.

Jose Luis Cabrera, 37, an 11-year Dallas Police Department veteran, was fired in December after a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment accusing him of conspiring with his wife, Moraima Cabrera, 34, to commit passport fraud.

Prosecutors on Thursday also said they had reached a plea deal with Mohammad Hakemy, 39, of Southlake, who officials said helped Mrs. Cabrera get a fake passport in 2002.

Mr. Hakemy, who owns several liquor stores and other businesses in the area, was once in a relationship with her. They have a 12-year-old daughter.

The Cabreras married in 2004.

Both Mr. Hakemy and Mr. Cabrera face up to 10 years in prison if their plea deals are accepted by a federal judge. Each could receive lighter sentences if they cooperate by giving prosecutors information about other crimes, but the U.S. attorney's office declined Thursday to say what cases they might know about.

Mrs. Cabrera has pleaded not guilty in her own case. She is accused of obtaining a driver's license and passport under a fake name and using it to travel to France and Italy with Mr. Hakemy, and, later, to Colombia with her husband after they married.

Her attorney, Jay Ethington, said she is ready for trial on Feb. 26. He said she hasn't been offered a plea bargain.

Patrick McClain, Mr. Cabrera's attorney, could not be reached for comment. Mr. Hakemy's attorney, Kevin Clancy, declined to comment on his client's plea deal.

Mrs. Cabrera helped prosecutors make cases against drug traffickers in the late 1990s after she herself faced a felony drug charge.

After they married in March 2004, Mr. Cabrera was so desperate for his wife to avoid deportation to Mexico that, according to federal officials, in April 2005 he brought her to the Dallas office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. He offered agents a deal: His wife would share what she learned from her drug trafficking past in exchange for legal immigration status. The interview room was wired, according to authorities, and efforts by the DEA to follow up with the couple were unsuccessful. Mrs. Cabrera remained in the country illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0127153

The pair traveled to Colombia shortly after their marriage to visit Mr. Cabrera's family. Mr. Cabrera also accompanied his wife when she transported more than $50,000 in cash across the border to Mexico. She told federal agents that the money belonged to another woman and that she was delivering it.

The current federal indictment makes no allegations of drug activity against either Mrs. Cabrera, her husband or Mr. Hakemy. But authorities say more charges and more arrests are pending.

Guatemalans In S. Florida Face Expulsion (FLSUNSEN)

By Tal Abbady, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 5, 2007

Juana Tomas resolved to forget the ghosts of San Miguel Acatán.

She fled her native Guatemalan village, tucked in the rural highlands where civil war raged, and headed north in 1991.

In the United States, Tomas sought political asylum. She was 17. Adolescence turned into adulthood. She gave birth to two sons and made a home for them in Lake Worth, joining a large, Qanjobal-speaking community of Mayan farm workers and day laborers in Palm Beach County. Raising her children and working in a nursery, she waited for a response from the government.

Fifteen years later in 2006, Tomas, now 33, learned that federal authorities denied her asylum claim. An immigration judge recently ordered her deported to Guatemala, a country still reeling from the effects of a war that ended a decade ago. Advocates say she is one of roughly 250,000 Guatemalans whose asylum claims from the 1990s U.S. authorities rejected. All could be deported.

U.S. officials say Guatemalans no longer qualify for political asylum because their country's civil war ended in 1996. Due to a massive backlog, the government only last year began notifying applicants that they must leave the country, immigration lawyers say.

During her long wait, Tomas took refuge in her new home and put the war behind her. A childhood memory of the great-aunt she saw dragged and decapitated slowly faded. So did the image of a neighbor whose body she found hanging from a tree one night while gathering firewood with her father. Every year, she renewed her work permit, raised her sons, and had little idea that her newfangled American life was built on borrowed time.

"The memories are less now. But I can't go back. We have a life here. There's only poverty in Guatemala, and crime," said Tomas in a dimly lighted apartment she shares with U.S.-born sons, Alex, 14, and Jesus, 10, and another family.

Now Tomas finds herself challenging the government whose protection she sought. She and other exiles in Florida, home to 28,650 Guatemalans, plan to join a California lawsuit against the Justice Department, said her attorney, Aileen Josephs.

Attorneys for the nonprofit group Casa de Cultura de Guatemala in Los Angeles are preparing a lawsuit demanding a halt to pending deportations of Guatemalans who entered the United States before the end of the civil war. The suit, which will seek class-action status, also will ask for legal status for Guatemalans who applied for asylum after 1990 but before that country's 1996 peace accords. Those who applied in the 1980s are protected under a federal program.

South Florida Guatemalan activists also have mobilized. Members of the Miami-based Coalition of Guatemalan Immigrants in the United States met with representatives of Congress in late January to press for a moratorium on deportations.

"Just when Congress is about to renew the push for immigration reform, immigration authorities decide to dump all these Guatemalan asylum cases," said Marlon Gonzalez, the coalition's president.

Government officials restricted their comments because of the pending lawsuit.

"We look at every case diligently before we let someone know they've been denied asylum," said Chris Bentley, spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Tomas, who was 8 when she says soldiers burned her house and jailed her father for one year, lived among villagers caught in the crossfire between leftist guerrillas and government militias that fanned out into the country's highlands. Roughly 200,000 Guatemalans died in the 36-year war, many of them indigenous farm workers.

"If the soldiers saw you speaking to the guerrillas, they killed you. If the guerrillas saw you speaking to the soldiers, they killed you. You spoke to no one. You locked yourself up inside your house," Tomas recalled.

In 1997, the Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act allowed Guatemalans who applied for asylum in the 1980s to seek legal residency, but it did not grant benefits to those who fled during the last years of the war.

Advocates argue that because the U.S. government had a role in the civil war that displaced about 1 million Guatemalans, all asylum seekers from that era should be allowed to stay here.

"The government that provoked this war is forcing us back to a country that we no longer know, a country where people now live in anarchy, amid gangs," said Byron Vasquez, director of the Case de la Cultura de Guatemala.

Vasquez referred to the U.S.-backed ouster of democratically elected leftist president Jacobo Arbenz Guzman in 1954, an event that was followed by years of instability and, in 1960, the rise of successive right-wing governments that, with U.S. support, waged decades of war against leftist guerrillas.

Despite the peace accord between the military and an umbrella leftist group, kidnappings and gang-related crime have overwhelmed parts of Guatemala.

"You could say, in quotation marks, that the war ended. But the war's legacy is the gangs. They'll murder you over a cell phone," said Reyna Valenzuela, a Hollywood housekeeper who left Guatemala in 1983 and is now a U.S. resident. Her nephew, Lester Betancourt, 17, was shot and strangled in the town of Villa Nueva last year by gang members, she said.

TAX:

Barry At Risk Of Losing Probation (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors want to revoke D.C. Council member Marion Barry's probation in a criminal tax case because he has failed to pay 2005 federal and D.C. income taxes.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys James Cooper and Thomas Zeno said in a court memo Friday that Mr. Barry, a former D.C. mayor, has shown "unworthiness to reap the benefits of a lenient sanction." Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying his income taxes, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office.

Mr. Barry was sentenced to three years' probation in federal court last year for not paying taxes for five years, after reaching a plea deal with the U.S. attorney's office. A spokesman declined to comment on the development.

"The court's patience should be at an end," the prosecutors wrote. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own return for six years."

Mr. Barry, a Ward 8 Democrat and four-term mayor, also has not made arrangements to pay taxes on more than $500,000 he earned in previous years, officials said.

The prosecutors call Mr. Barry's failure to file 2005 tax returns the latest in a series of "willful acts in defiance of the tax laws." They also say Mr. Barry's actions puts him in violation of an express condition of his release.

Mr. Barry asked the Internal Revenue Service for an extension to allow him to file his return by Oct. 15. However, no return had been filed as of last week, according to an affidavit submitted by an IRS special agent investigating the case.

The IRS began garnishing Mr. Barry's paycheck in November.

In December, the D.C. council voted to raise members' salaries to $115,000 a year.

Mr. Barry could not be reached for comment yesterday. WTOP Radio, which has reported on the request to revoke Mr. Barry's probation, reported that the tax troubles could be the result of his changing accountants.

If prosecutors succeed in getting probation revoked, Mr. Barry could return to prison. He faced up to 18 months in prison under sentencing guidelines before getting probation in the tax case.

Mr. Barry served six months in prison in 1990 after he was convicted of cocaine possession.

During a court-ordered drug test in the criminal tax case, Mr. Barry tested positive for cocaine and marijuana use. Under his probation, he must stay drug-free. The memo seeking to revoke Mr. Barry's probation gave no indication that he had relapsed.

Even if Mr. Barry goes to prison, he technically could retain his council seat because the criminal tax case charged him with a misdemeanor, not a felony crime.

Prosecutors did not charge Mr. Barry with tax evasion, a felony.

Citing Mr. Barry's prompt guilty plea in 2005, prosecutors at the time agreed to take no position at his sentencing on whether he deserved prison time.

Their memo last week, though, said Mr. Barry has continued to flout the "standards applicable to all persons who reside in the District of Columbia who pay a portion of their income to support his salary."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Nominate Former White House Associate Counsel To D.C. Court (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 5, 2007

President George W. Bush is expected to nominate former White House insider Dabney Friedrich to fill the recently vacated seat on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, two sources familiar with the process say.

The White House is in the final stages of finalizing her nomination to replace Judge Gladys Kessler, who took senior status last month.

Friedrich, 39, was appointed to the U.S. Sentencing Commission in December. Before that she spent three years as an associate counsel in the White House, where she oversaw judicial nominations, including nominations for the Supreme Court.

A Yale Law School graduate, Friedrich began her career as a clerk on the District Court to now-Chief Judge Thomas Hogan. In 1994, she joined Latham & Watkins in San Diego. A year later she became a prosecutor in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, where she worked with now-U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Jeffrey Taylor.

In 1998, she moved to the Eastern District of Virginia, where she served until 2002. That year, Friedrich was hired as a staffer for the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

She is married to Matthew Friedrich, former Enron task force prosecutor and now counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Bush Budget Projects A Surplus By 2012 (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The budget that President Bush will submit to Congress today shows the federal deficit falling in each of the next four years and would produce a $61 billion surplus in 2012, administration officials said. But to get there, Bush is counting on strong economic growth, diminishing costs in the Iraq war and tight domestic spending to offset the cost of his tax cuts.

Democrats yesterday criticized the five-year budget plan as overly optimistic, and predicted that extending the tax cuts past their 2010 expiration date would dig the nation deeper into debt rather than produce a budget surplus. Republicans countered that the tax cuts are critical to maintaining a healthy economy and that a balanced budget is not possible without them.

"Raising taxes . . . won't help balance the budget -- it will slow the economic growth that is creating the new jobs of tomorrow and increasing revenue to the federal government," House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) wrote in an essay distributed yesterday by his office. "Keeping our economy strong and promoting fiscal responsibility will get the job done. Raising taxes won't."

Republicans hope to make the tax cuts a central feature of this year's budget debate, the first in which Bush will present his request to a Democratic Congress. Both the White House and Democratic leaders have vowed to eliminate the federal deficit by 2012, but Democrats have signaled their intention to do it in part by targeting tax breaks for corporations and taxpayers earning more than $500,000 a year.

"We think it's absolutely critical that they be extended in 2010, when they otherwise would expire. Why? Because they have contributed to this growing economy," White House budget director Rob Portman said yesterday on CNN's "Late Edition."

"We think it would be a mistake and a risk to our strong economy to have these tax cuts not continue," Portman added.

Recent estimates by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office suggest that it would be difficult to balance the budget if the tax cuts -- a collection of rate reductions and tax credits that have reduced Treasury collections by an estimated $1 trillion since 2001 -- continue.

According to the CBO, a vibrant economy has indeed produced a gusher of revenue over the past two years that could help turn the nation's $248 billion deficit into a $170 billion surplus by 2012. But if the tax cuts and other expiring tax provisions are extended, the CBO predicts, the deficit would hit $146 billion in 2012 and grow thereafter as health costs skyrocket and the baby-boom generation retires.

The White House takes a different view, assuming that continuing the tax cuts would produce slightly more robust economic growth than the CBO foresees.

"The big difference between CBO and us is the tax relief. They don't make it permanent, and we do. And we stand behind the economic benefits of the tax relief," said an administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the budget had not yet been released.

There are other differences between the two projections. Bush's budget projects slower spending growth from 2008 to 2012, with outlays rising 11.8 percent, compared with 14.7 percent in the CBO's estimates.

Administration officials also exclude some potentially expensive items. Their request, for the first time, attempts to show the true cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in the coming fiscal year, $145 billion, but includes just $50 billion for fiscal 2009 and nothing thereafter.

DOJ_NMG_0127156

The president's budget would also reduce spending for Medicare and Medicaid, the federal government's health programs for the elderly and the poor, by about $100 billion over five years. And it would provide insufficient extra cash to maintain coverage for poor children currently enrolled in the Children's Health Insurance Program.

Democrats blasted those proposals, noting that the Republican-controlled Congress last year did not approve much smaller reductions in federal health-care spending.

"Rather than trying to solve our health care crisis by lowering costs and covering more people, the President's plan will make the crisis worse by raising costs and failing to cover those who need it most -- our nation's children," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said yesterday in a statement.

Democrats also pointed to an assumption common to projections by the CBO and White House: Both assume that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to expand to millions of additional families, generating billions in additional tax dollars by 2012. Democrats and some Republicans have vowed to halt the growth of the tax and, ultimately, repeal it.

Portman said the White House proposal is a "tight budget, but a more realistic budget" that contains much to appeal to Democrats, such as a small increase in non-security domestic spending, the first in two years.

But Democrats were skeptical.

"With their track record, everything they present is going to be viewed skeptically. Because they've been deceptive year after year after year," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). "Every projection shows the cost of making all the tax cuts permanent explodes at the very time the baby boomers start to retire," driving "the deficit and the growth of the debt to the moon."

Bush To Submit $2.9 Trillion Budget (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

President Bush will send Congress a $2.9 trillion spending request today that seeks billions of dollars more to fight the Iraq war and tries to restrain the spiraling cost of the government's big health care programs.

Responding to the new political realities of a Democrat-controlled Congress, Mr. Bush will propose balancing the budget in five years, matching a goal put forward by Democratic leaders. But Mr. Bush would achieve that feat while protecting his cherished first-term tax cuts.

The arrival of the massive four-volume set of green budget books, which will cover the budget year that begins Oct. 1, will be followed by months of debate in Congress. Democrats charged that Mr. Bush wants to make painful cuts across a wide swath of government programs to protect his tax cuts and to keep funneling money to the unpopular Iraq war.

"It just gives you sticker shock. Every time you turn around, it's another $100 billion," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat, said of Mr. Bush's war spending.

The federal deficit hit an all-time high under Mr. Bush of $413 billion in 2004. It has been declining since that time and the 2008 budget projects it will continue to decline and show a surplus in 2012, three years after Mr. Bush leaves office.

To accomplish those reductions, Mr. Bush would allow only modest growth in the government programs outside of defense and homeland security. He is proposing eliminations or sharp reductions in 141 government programs, for a savings over five years of $12 billion, although Congress has rejected many of the same proposals over the past two years.

Mr. Bush also will seek to trim spending on farm subsidies by $18 billion over five years, mainly by reducing payments to wealthier farmers, an effort certain to spark resistance among farm-state lawmakers.

The president's budget would achieve nearly $100 billion in savings over five years by trimming increases in Medicare, the health insurance program for 43 million retirees and disabled, and Medicaid which provides health care to the poor.

The president appealed for Democratic support during an appearance at a House Democrats' retreat on Saturday, saying the government must do something to restrain the soaring costs of costs of entitlement spending on health care and Social Security before the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers.

"I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be," he told the Democrats. "The only thing I want to share with you is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

For the first time, Mr. Bush will spell out details of the spending requests for Iraq and Afghanistan in the budget books. Previously, he has lumped that spending into supplemental requests with less detail.

Mr. Bush said he would ask for an additional $100 billion for Iraq and the global war on terrorism this year, on top of $70 billion already sought. For 2008, that spending would drop to $145 billion and fall to $50 billion in 2009, although administration officials conceded that the 2008 and 2009 requests could go higher depending on the progress of the war effort.

As in past years, the Pentagon is scheduled to get a hefty increase in spending authority of 11 percent, pushing its 2008 budget to $481.4 billion.

Tank-size Defense Request (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — When the Bush administration unveils its annual spending request today, it is expected to ask for a defense budget of $481 billion — near historic highs, even when adjusted for inflation.

It will also ask for additional funding for Iraq and Afghanistan, taking the cost of those wars this year to close to $165 billion, and will present estimates for next year's costs that would push war spending above the total cost of the Vietnam War.

But if the military's top officers have their way, today's proposal may be only a precursor to a future of even larger defense budgets.

The chiefs of the Army, Navy and Air Force are gearing up for a long-term campaign to convince Congress and the public that the growing demands of the Iraq war — plus the administration's aggressive global security ambitions — require tens of billions more each year to meet the nation's defense needs.

For more than a year, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the outgoing Army chief of staff, has pointed out that defense spending accounts for about 3.8% of the gross domestic product — a figure that is projected to drop over the next five years, to near the lowest levels since World War II, even though the U.S. is involved in protracted fighting.

He is calling for a wider national debate on whether that percentage should be significantly increased — and the chiefs of the Navy and Air Force said in interviews last week that they would publicly support that call in upcoming hearings on the defense budget.

"In working that [budget] problem, I believe I'm seeing challenges that leads us to the notion that maybe it's time to have this discussion about a higher percentage of GDP" devoted to defense, Air Force Gen. T. Michael "Buzz" Moseley said in a telephone interview during a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq.

"It's going to be very, very hard to get where we're going as defined in the [Pentagon's strategic plans] and to do this business on a global scale with the resources that we have."

Navy Adm. Michael G. Mullen added: "At 3.8%, it just isn't enough for the strategic appetite, and the strategic appetite is tied directly to the world we're living in."

According to a senior Pentagon official, the Air Force alone is expected to tell Congress that it will need an additional $20 billion per year over the next five years, on top of the White House funding request, just to meet the strategic plans laid out by the Pentagon and the increasing demands resulting from the troop buildup in Iraq.

Questions of sacrifice

It is certainly not unexpected for military officers to seek more money for personnel and weapons systems, defense budget experts said. But the increasingly vocal complaints from all three service chiefs, even as the administration is increasing troop levels in Iraq, add complexity to the debate over the war and the challenges presented by other global adversaries.

It is also, in part, a reflection of a view held by many throughout the armed services that the military is the only U.S. institution bearing the burden of the Iraq war. In interviews and in comments reported by superior officers, many veterans have argued that the U.S. hardly seems like a country at war, with civilians making little sacrifice even as troops put their lives on the line.

That perspective on the war may set up awkward circumstances for the White House and Congress. For the White House, the services' appeal for more funding comes as Democrats argue that repeated deployments to Iraq are leaving the military without the equipment and personnel it needs if other situations arise.

At the same time, congressional Democrats — whose new House and Senate majorities are largely based on opposition to Bush's Iraq policy — must also balance that opposition with the public's ongoing support for the troops in harm's way.

"Nobody wants to cut off somebody's body armor or someone's Humvee, or somebody's ability to sustain themselves in Baghdad," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition," referring to Democratic concerns that military spending is already too high. "Many people believe that the administration will turn around and say, 'See? They cut money from our troops that are there already.' "

Record spending

Any increase in military spending above the administration's request would be on top of what is, in inflation-adjusted dollars, one of the biggest defense budgets in history.

But even at those levels, the service chiefs argue that the war's wear and tear on their equipment, along with the strategic planning that calls on them to check such global threats as a rapidly modernizing China, a nuclear-armed North Korea and an increasingly hostile Iran, has begun to outstrip their ability to fund the Army brigades, Air Force wings and Navy strike groups needed to meet all contingencies.

DOJ_NMG_0127158

"What I have found in the 18 months I have been here as chief is … the worldwide demands are increasing," said Mullen. "Obviously, there's an extraordinary amount of pressure on the ground forces, but there are other things in the world right now, and there will be in the future, that don't have anything to do with Iraq and Afghanistan."

Tough trade-offs

Some defense budget experts say the military is in a crisis of its own making. Although critics acknowledge that the armed forces faced a nearly decade-long "procurement holiday" at the end of the Cold War, they argue that the services chose to replace aging, overused weaponry with highly sophisticated, complicated armaments that in some cases cost three times the systems they replaced.

By attempting to take huge technological leaps instead of incremental improvements, these critics argue, the replacement weapons face years of delays and vast cost increases, forcing the Pentagon to buy fewer of each weapon.

"They have demonstrated that they have absolutely no discipline in dealing with the money they've gotten, and their only response when they get more money is to ask for still more money," said Winslow Wheeler, a former defense budget staffer in the Senate who now works for the nonpartisan Center for Defense Information.

According to an October study by the Congressional Budget Office, the Pentagon may need as much as $560 billion every year — or $80 billion more than the administration is proposing in the nonwar portion of its 2008 budget plan — just to pay for all the weapons on order and to meet growing personnel and operational costs.

The services insist that they are working to drive down such delays and costs, but defend the need to push the technological envelope.

"When you actually have to put someone in an airplane and send them into combat, do you want to win this ballgame by one run in the bottom of the ninth, or do want to have the game called in the seventh inning by 20 runs?" Moseley asked.

The first hints of a rebellion within the armed services over funding levels came last summer when Schoomaker, convinced that he did not have the resources to maintain troop levels in Iraq and meet the Army's other commitments, did not submit his 2008 budget plan to then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, saying Pentagon spending guidelines were nearly $25 billion short of what he needed.

When Bush's budget is announced today, Schoomaker is expected to get about $13 billion more than those original suggested guidelines. But his refusal to go along with the normal Pentagon process caused consternation among the other service chiefs. According to one senior Pentagon official, Mullen and Moseley confronted Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, expressing concerns that they were being penalized for playing by the rules.

"That has created some turmoil," said the Pentagon official. "It appears that a certain track and a certain behavior has paid off — and if that's reasonably valid, then stand by."

Another senior Defense official said the Air Force was likely to make an appeal directly to Congress that it is $9.8 billion short in 2008, and that over the next five years it will need about $20 billion more each year.

Mullen said he was not planning to go to Capitol Hill with a specific proposal for more money for the Navy, but he added that the current plan to reverse the shrinking number of ships under his command — there are now 276 warships, less than half the number in the 1980s — to a goal of 313 may not be sufficient.

"I'm about as tightly wound, budget-wise, as I can be and deliver the Navy we need for the future," Mullen said.

Defense budget experts said that any decision by Congress to examine greater increases in defense spending could evolve into a defining discussion over U.S. foreign policy goals and the Pentagon's vision of its armed services in a post-Cold War world.

"Clearly there's a big mismatch between the projected costs of the Defense Department's plans and the money that's currently projected to be provided for those plans," said Steven Kosiak, a defense budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a nonpartisan policy research organization. "Then the question becomes: Is the problem that not enough money is projected, or are the plans too ambitious?"

His Budget On The Line, Bush Courts Dems (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And David Jackson

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush presents a $2.9 trillion budget to Congress Monday amid a charm offensive intended to woo Democrats.

His speech Saturday at a House Democratic retreat was the latest effort to reach out to opposing party members, who felt widely ignored during six years of GOP dominance. It was his first visit to the annual retreat since 2001.

Bush said he understood Democrats' doubts about White House cooperation, but "in order to do big things, we're going to have to do it together."

DOJ_NMG_0127159

Other signs of outreach:

·Bush regularly invites Democrats to the Oval Office and went out of his way to attend Saturday's getaway at Colonial Williamsburg, a historic district in Virginia. Before his Jan. 10 address on Iraq, Bush or top aides met with at least 45 congressional Democrats.

·Top administration officials, led by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House budget director Rob Portman, have made the rounds on Capitol Hill. They met with new committee chairmen and other influential Democrats, focusing particularly on moderates and those willing to work with the administration.

·The White House emphasizes areas of possible compromise, such as an expanded "guest worker" program for illegal immigrants and an increase in Pell grants for low- and middle-income college students. Both will be highlighted in the budget released Monday.

Even so, bigger issues loom. Congress has made clear its intention to play a stronger role on the Iraq war. Bush has stated his desire to tackle the long-term sustainability of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. Both sides want to balance the budget in five years but favor vastly different means to that end.

"This depends on the administration's attitude," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. A panel meeting he arranged with Paulson and Portman went well, he said, but "I don't know how short a leash they're on."

Trying to build trust

Bush's immediate predecessors reached deals across the aisle. President Clinton worked with Republicans to overhaul welfare. The first President Bush raised taxes to get a major deficit reduction agreement with Democrats. President Reagan worked with Democrats to revamp the tax code.

None of them had so little time to get accustomed to a Congress run by the other party. To fix the long-term financing of Medicare and Social Security, Bush will have to get along with Democrats like he did as Texas governor in the 1990s.

Presidential historian Fred Greenstein of Princeton University said Bush can do it by reverting to "the Texas persona." He sees more of the affable Reagan than the obstinate Woodrow Wilson in Bush, who began his presidency socializing with the Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy.

Others doubt Bush's ability to get major policies through a Democratic Congress. Republican John Kasich, who as House Budget Committee chairman helped craft a 1997 deficit reduction package with Clinton, said Bush lacks leverage. "People are not afraid of George Bush," he said.

Democrat Leon Panetta, a former Clinton chief of staff, said there's more bad blood to overcome now. "There has to be a degree of trust that you can work with the other side without getting a knife in your back," Panetta said.

That's where Paulson and Portman come in. The Treasury secretary, who left the chairmanship of Goldman Sachs to join the administration, has urged lawmakers to call him "Hank." His Wall Street pedigree gives him an above-politics reputation. The budget director, a former Republican congressman from Ohio and U.S. trade representative, wins friends with his personable demeanor.

"Part of this is about building trust," Portman said. "These are very frank exchanges."

Both Cabinet members want to make progress on what may be the toughest issue next to Iraq: making Medicare and Social Security whole for the long-term. Without changes in benefits, taxes or both, the programs will be insolvent within decades.

Portman worked with members from both parties before last week's announcement that Bush's proposed budget would include $25 million for 9/11-related health assistance. Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., credited his help.

"We want to get things done," Portman said. "There is a willingness to try to work together."

Democrats on the receiving end of the outreach give the administration better grades for style than substance. Still, Maloney said there is only one alternative: "Stalemate. No one wants that."

Lots of talk, little action

Paulson has used his friendship with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., whose help will be needed to get anything done on taxes, trade or entitlement programs. "There's no question in my mind that Hank Paulson is a very sincere man," Rangel said.

The Treasury secretary has also renewed ties with House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C., with whom he served as a budget analyst at the Pentagon during the Vietnam War. "It makes me more comfortable approaching Paulson," Spratt said.

Rep. Ellen Tauscher of California, chairwoman of the moderate New Democrat Coalition, said the administration should have the ability to wheel and deal with a Democratic Congress the way the Clinton White House did with a Republican majority.

DOJ_NMG_0127160

In his meeting with her group, Paulson "made all the right points" about working together and taking risks on tough issues, she said.

While the meetings have been cordial, Democrats say, little progress has been made. "With all of the progress in terms of discussion," Rangel said, "we haven't agreed on a darn thing so far."

Democrats say it's hard to trust an administration that largely ignored them when they were in the minority. "There's been virtually no communication for six years," said Rep. Allen Boyd of Florida, a co-chairman of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition, which met with Paulson and Portman. "There's a wall that exists. You have to figure out how to tear the wall down."

President Pushes Boost In Funding For National Parks (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — National parks would be a big winner under President Bush's 2008 budget, and a plan to match up to $100 million annually in private donations could guarantee increases for a decade.

Bush's budget, being unveiled today, would give the National Park Service $2.4 billion next year, administration officials told USA TODAY. That includes a $258 million increase for daily operations, up 14.5%. Since 2002, those funds have risen 1.5% above inflation.

The president proposes adding at least $100 million a year for the next 10 years. The funds would be used to hire 3,000 seasonal park rangers, guides and maintenance workers each summer, an increase of more than 50%. In addition, more than 1 million children could be enrolled in youth programs.

On top of that, Bush wants Congress to guarantee that the federal government would match philanthropic donations each year, up to another $100 million. Currently, about $20 million is contributed each year by supporters of national parks, such as family foundations.

Taken together, the proposals could provide $3 billion in new parks funding over the coming decade. In 2016, the parks will celebrate their 100th anniversary; Bush wants them to be in better shape than they are today.

"I think it can be a source of healing for Americans," Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said. "This one is not partisan. This one is American."

The proposal is being welcomed by groups that advocate on behalf of the nearly 400 sites managed by the National Park Service and have been a thorn in the Bush administration's side during lean years. The National Parks Conservation Association was seeking an increase of $250 million in operating funds for the parks.

"This is a renewed commitment that national parks should be a national priority," said Tom Kiernan, the group's president. "It's a catalyzing initiative at a wonderful time for the national parks."

The proposals would have to be approved separately by Congress. The $2.4 billion parks budget, with its record increase in operating funds, would become final if Congress allocates the funding. The matching-funds proposal would have to be approved by committees with jurisdiction over the Interior Department.

Taken together, they would add thousands of new park workers to guide visitors with programs such as interpretive walks and campfire talks. Volunteer coordinators would be added in 44 sites.

Seasonal workers have been cut during lean budget years, resulting in a 10-year decline.

"We simply have lost contact people who meet the American public," said Stephen Whitesell, superintendent of the San Antonio Missions National Historical Park in Texas. "What they're not seeing are rangers in flat hats."

Since 9/11, most of the money added to the National Park Service budget has gone for added security in such places as New York City, Washington, D.C., and along the U.S. borders with Canada and Mexico.

Some of the new funds will be used to attract young people to the parks through Internet programs and podcasts. Kempthorne and others see it as mutually beneficial: The parks would avoid a loss of visitors in future generations, and children would reap the health benefits of the great outdoors.

"We're competing with an electronic world," Kempthorne said.

Bush Plays Traffic Cop In Budget Request (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With much of his domestic agenda stalled by Congress, President Bush is embracing a new cause he is hoping will cross party lines and leave him with an end-of-term accomplishment: easing rush-hour traffic.

In his annual budget blueprint to be unveiled today, Mr. Bush intends to showcase a highway "congestion initiative," according to White House documents, with grants for state and local governments to experiment with anti-jam strategies.

DOJ_NMG_0127161

In a surprise that could foreshadow how Mr. Bush might reach out to Democrats -- and disappoint conservatives -- for the rest of his term, the centerpiece of the traffic plan involves an initiative that some critics say amounts to a tax, a plan depicted by administration officials as "congestion pricing." The administration will award $130 million in grants starting this spring to help cities and states build electronic toll systems that would charge drivers fees for traveling in and out of big cities during peak traffic times. The money also could go to other congestion strategies such as expanded telecommuting, but administration officials make it clear they think congestion pricing is the most powerful tool they have. The White House will seek an additional $175 million for congestion initiatives in next year's budget.

Beyond automobile traffic, the administration will also introduce legislation soon that could seek to impose a form of "congestion pricing" on airline travel, likely through user fees on airlines. The idea is to spread flights more evenly.

Travel congestion is "increasingly troubling," Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said in an interview. "It's a cost to business and probably affects our ability to be competitive on the global market. But it's also something that just drives people crazy."

The White House is also planning a high-level transportation summit this month that will bring together officials from around the country to discuss the congestion initiative.

The Bush traffic plan is likely to draw support from some Democrats. It is reminiscent of Vice President Al Gore's 2000 campaign proposal to relieve traffic and other effects of urban sprawl through "smart growth" initiatives. Back then, Mr. Bush questioned the federal government's role in local planning.

Big-city mayors and urban business leaders may also embrace the administration initiative. Recently, many have been weighing politically dicey "congestion pricing," a strategy used to a limited extent today in Southern California, Denver and Minneapolis, among other places.

A New York business coalition that is pushing congestion pricing for lower Manhattan praised the new White House strategy. "Without some political cover ... it's a very hard thing to sell," says Kathryn Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City. "We think the federal government stepping up to provide incentives for local government to take on what is a tough issue ... is very important."

But some conservative allies of the administration fear the initiative could mark a turn for the president, who has made cutting taxes the core of his domestic policy. Some critics are already upset that Mr. Bush's new health-insurance proposals include higher taxes on individuals with high-price employer-provided plans, and worry that the White House would accept higher Social Security taxes as a part of a deal to overhaul the retirement program.

Highway tolls "are increasingly a form of tax" to support other government spending, for instance on mass transit, says Ronald Utt, an expert on transportation at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "Make it any more difficult or unattractive to get to downtown, and you'd reduce congestion -- but you'd do so largely by reducing jobs," he adds.

Anticipating such attacks, transportation officials have armed themselves with studies suggesting that traffic itself is becoming a big hidden tax on businesses across the country, as well as the No. 1 quality-of-life concern in many urban areas.

Congestion pricing "is a lot cheaper than the way we're paying now ... with time, unreliability, psychological hell," said Tyler Duvall, DOT's assistant secretary for policy.

The DOT estimates the total cost of U.S. congestion at about $200 billion annually, or almost 2% of GDP, counting wasted fuel, delays, environmental costs and increased inventory needs.

The White House, under fire for failing to embrace a more aggressive global-warming policy, is portraying the plan as part of a climate change strategy. Administration documents estimate that "travel delay ... wasted 2.3 billion gallons of fuel" in 2003, a total that "accounts for more than 20 million metric tons of carbon dioxide emissions."

In cities and regions that have adopted congestion-related fees, the most common approach is to offer solo commuters the choice of paying during rush hour to travel in the high-occupancy lanes reserved for car-poolers. Some tolls on existing turnpikes also have been adjusted higher for rush-hour travel.

Now the Bush administration is encouraging city and state transportation officials around the country to go further where appropriate, and even impose "cordon" tolls on rush-hour commuters -- in which toll-collecting devices are installed all around a city's perimeter. The tolls could be collected without making drivers stop, through electronic tag readers.

The Bush administration is distributing $130 million in grants to help cities build the electronic systems needed. Department of Transportation officials expect more than 10 major cities to apply before the April deadline.

Currently, only San Francisco is planning "cordon tolls" that would impose a charge on essentially all rush-hour commuters. Other cities, including New York, are taking a look.

Officials in northern Virginia plan to build four "High-Occupancy/Toll" lanes along 15 miles of the I-495 Beltway around Washington, according to DOT officials and documents. They are also studying converting High-Occupancy Vehicle, or HOV, lanes into HOT lanes along nearly 50 miles of the I-95/I-395 corridor in Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0127162

Even a 5% reduction in traffic jams can increase traffic speeds by as much as 50%, says Mr. Duvall. DOT officials figure a typical big-city traffic jam can be cleared with tolls of as little as $2 to $2.50 a day, if all lanes on a big highway are charged. But on some Southern California highways where fees are charged only for the former high-occupancy lanes, prices at the peak of rush hour have reached $8.50.

Congestion pricing has already taken hold in Europe, and the success of a congestion pricing system for London's roads three years ago motivated U.S. officials and major businesses to consider the idea. Voters in Stockholm approved a similar plan in September, after a test run during the summer.

But tinkering with highway prices also means political perils. That became apparent in Indiana last year when Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels pushed through the sale of a big toll road to private investors, who announced plans to raise the tolls for the first time in years. State Republicans took a beating in the November elections.

GUNS AND BUTTER How War's Expense Didn't Strain Economy (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Since President Bush took office, he's boosted annual defense spending by 50% -- including $500 billion over five years for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan -- and doubled spending on homeland security. At the same time, he's cut taxes, expanded Medicare to cover prescription drugs, approved $100 billion to clean up after Gulf Coast hurricanes, and signed bills that spend a little more each year on domestic programs.

For years, critics said it couldn't last, backed by some historical precedent: President Johnson is blamed by many for triggering inflation in the 1970s by spending on both guns and butter.

· The Issue: President Bush has managed to wage a war, cut taxes and boost other spending without triggering Vietnam-era inflation.

· The Background: The spending spree has been aided by foreign borrowing and a strong economy.

· What's Next: While economically painless so far, war and military spending will soon collide with looming entitlement obligations.

But this time, it's been nearly painless. Inflation is in check. The federal budget deficit is down from its 2004 peak, and rests near its historical average of 2% of gross domestic product, a measure of the nation's total output. Long-term interest rates are relatively low.

What's Mr. Bush's secret? Ingredient one: strong revenue growth driven by an economy distinguished by surging profits and rising incomes at the top, which are taxed more heavily than incomes at the bottom. Ingredient two: tax cuts and spending increases, which arrived when the U.S. economy needed a boost. Ingredient three, and perhaps the most significant: the willingness of foreigners to lend to the U.S., which finances the budget deficit without pushing up interest rates at a time when Americans don't save very much.

"This situation is what you'd call an exorbitant privilege," says Menzie Chinn, a University of Wisconsin economist. "We've gotten a pretty good deal so far."

No one knows when this bonanza might end, although end it must. For the coming year, Mr. Bush is expected to shave costs from programs and agencies unconnected to defense. In the future, the flow of cash from foreign lenders could dry up. Health care and Social Security could swamp the federal budget. In the shorter term, the combination of military spending and tax cuts could collide with spending priorities outlined by the capital's newly empowered Democrats.

For now, the budget the president will offer today essentially counts on continued good luck. Both he and Congress recognize that neither the war in Iraq nor the buildup in homeland-security spending is a one-time-only expense. Both sides are talking about the need for a larger military, a sharp contrast to the decline in post-Cold War defense spending that helped produce Bill Clinton's surpluses.

Mr. Bush's budget estimates Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years alone will cost about $300 billion, and analysts say the five-year price tag could reach $500 billion. Mr. Bush is seeking to add 92,000 troops to overall Pentagon forces over the next five years. Democrats are even more eager to increase homeland-security spending than Mr. Bush. Indeed, the Congressional Budget Office last week estimated a bill the House has passed to improve aviation security and implement other recommendations of the 9/11 Commission would cost $21 billion over six years, a sum equal to roughly half the Department of Homeland Security's current annual budget.

Democrats also have a long list of other domestic priorities to fund, which include lower student-loan rates and more science and health research. They've pledged to balance the budget and adhere to rules that require tax cuts and benefits increases to be offset somehow.

"It will be hard to attain those goals because of the squeeze that the defense budget, and in particular that the cost of war in Iraq, is placing on us," says House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt, a South Carolina Democrat. "These expenditures at this sort of level are consequential -- they necessitate trade-offs."

In the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, Mr. Bush has said he will show how the deficit can be eliminated by 2012 without raising taxes. The budget will give the administration's best guess (about $141 billion) at the cost of Iraq and Afghanistan for 2008, a departure from past practice, and what one administration official calls "a plug number" for 2009 -- an estimated $50 billion -- but nothing beyond that.

The president is also expected to project spending less, in inflation-adjusted terms, on annually appropriated spending outside of defense and homeland security. Much of that squeeze is expected to come in proposed freezes or cuts to federal agencies and programs.

"It's going to be the tightest budget we've seen," says Brian Riedl, a budget expert with Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. He predicts a call for "freezing most discretionary programs for the next five years."

The big problem, however, remains the government's entitlement programs. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson says the budget deficit is "well below where anybody would have expected it to be several years ago" despite the costs of war and hurricanes. He credits a strong economy and record tax receipts.

But he warns of "a looming collision with entitlements," and adds: "I have no doubt we will deal with it. But the longer we wait to deal with it, the more expensive and the more painful it's going to be to do it."

Some academic economists are beginning to gauge what the sums spent on Iraq could have financed -- a down payment on a Social Security fix, for instance. Nobel laureate Joseph Stiglitz predicts Iraq will cost at least $1 trillion, assuming troops are withdrawn by 2010. "Half that sum would have put Social Security on a firm grounding for the next 75 years," he wrote last year in a paper. "If we spent even a small fraction of the remainder on education and research, it is likely our economy would be in a far stronger position."

Comparisons to Vietnam are tempting but Iraq isn't, at least yet, as costly as Vietnam, when compared to the overall economy. It's running about $100 billion a year, or about 1% of GDP. By the time it was over, Vietnam cost the equivalent of about $660 billion in today's dollars.

Overall defense spending today is higher than it was during Vietnam, when adjusted for inflation, but is just about 4% of GDP. That's an increase from when Mr. Bush took office, but far from the Vietnam peak of 9.5% of GDP in 1968, and less even than the 1980s Cold War buildup. Even with the planned troop surge, the U.S. will have about 160,000 troops in Iraq, well below the 550,000 Vietnam peak.

It was the combination of military spending and President Johnson's "Great Society" programs -- Medicare health insurance for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor -- that many say led to the "Great Inflation" of the 1970s. Like Mr. Bush, Mr. Johnson at first tried to fund the war through supplemental spending bills, a move historians and contemporaries believe was aimed at cloaking the true costs so Congress wouldn't scale back his ambitious domestic agenda. Inflation, which had been below 2% in the early 1960s, was running at above 6% in 1970. By 1970, the U.S. was in a recession.

Vietnam-era defense spending added fuel to an economy that was already running at full employment and producing at capacity. Mr. Johnson resisted calls for tax increases to reduce the inflation risk, fearing Southern Democrats would instead insist on cutting social programs. The Federal Reserve, partly under pressure from Mr. Johnson, but also because it mistakenly believed the economy had spare capacity, was reluctant to raise interest rates. To control inflation, it had to raise rates higher later on. By the time Mr. Johnson imposed a 10% surcharge on individual and corporate income taxes in 1968, it was too late.

Although the government borrowed heavily in the 1960s, most of its borrowing came from inside the U.S. Interest rates rose as a result. The yield on 10-year Treasurys, a benchmark interest rate, began the 1960s at 4.72%; it ended the decade at 7.65%. But the private sector saved enough to offset government borrowing, and the U.S. economy was a net lender to the world.

This time, interest rates haven't risen as much, because foreigners, particularly in Asia, are eager to lend to the U.S. economy at fairly low rates. The economy as a whole is a heavy borrower from the rest of the world.

In fact, the U.S. government is particularly dependent on the willingness of foreigners to lend it money. As of November 2006, foreigners owned about $2.2 trillion of U.S. Treasury securities -- or about 52% of the public debt not held by the U.S. government, compared with about 20% in the early 1990s. (The total U.S. debt, which includes what the government owes itself, is about $8.7 trillion.)

Mr. Bush's ability to sustain spending and tax cuts depends largely on the willingness of foreigners to continue lending the U.S. money. Mr. Chinn, the economist, says that at some point, global investors will lose their appetite for ever-larger amounts of American debt. That would trigger a decline in value of the U.S. dollar and an increase in interest rates.

"So far it's not a problem because foreigners are willing to lend, but you've got to wonder what happens when the rest of the world says, 'We're tired of taking paper that loses value pretty quickly,' " says Mr. Chinn.

The Bush era upturn in defense and homeland-security spending came not during a 1960s-style boom, but in a lull in the U.S. economy, which had tumbled into recession even before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. That meant the economy had plenty of slack to absorb increased government spending without sparking inflation. Lee Price, an economist who until recently was research director at the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal Washington think tank, says defense spending created 1.3 million private-sector jobs between 2001 and 2005 while all other private-sector employment fell by 1.2 million.

At the same time, the Bush administration cut taxes in 2001 and 2003 on individuals, dividends, capital gains and estates, among other areas. The administration and some economists credit the cuts with spurring economic growth, saying they provided incentives to business to invest and buoyed consumer spending.

The moment of economic slack may be in the past, which raises the specter of inflation. Unemployment is about as low as the Fed will tolerate, and there are some hiring bottlenecks of the sort that were common during Vietnam. "We're starting to see tightening up in the high-tech market, and people who were tied up with defense or homeland security are not available," says EPI's Mr. Price.

War has other costs, too. Some companies are struggling to keep jobs open for military reservists. A 2005 Congressional Budget Office report found that "some businesses may absorb the loss of personnel at little cost, but others may experience slowdowns in production, lost sales or additional expenses as they attempt to compensate for a reservist's absence." The problems are more severe for small businesses or those that employ highly specialized workers, the CBO said.

At Fallon Ambulance Service in Quincy, Mass., more than 20 of the company's 500 full-time employees are reservists, and several have been deployed for stints lasting as long as two years.

"It does at times put a strain when we have large deployments," says Stephanie Eastwick, director of human resources for the family-owned company.

In the end, it may be Johnson's ballooning programs that prompt tough decision making. The government has expanded greatly since the 1960s and has made all sorts of promises to pay benefits, particularly to older Americans, in coming years. As war costs preoccupy official Washington, the retirement of the baby boom generation is growing closer; the oldest boomers turn 60 this year. There is no sign of a political consensus on changing Social Security, which has expanded since Roosevelt launched it, or on making more affordable Mr. Johnson's health-care programs.

Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid already consume 36 cents of every dollar that the government spends, about $1.2 trillion this year, and are growing faster than the economy as a whole. Defense accounts for about 20 cents of every dollar, up from 16 cents when Mr. Bush took office in 2001, more than the government spends on education, transportation, scientific research and housing aid combined.

"We can continue doing what we're now doing subject to foreigners being willing to finance it but eventually it's going to do us in because Medicare and Social Security are going to overwhelm the budget," says Charles Schultze, a Brookings Institution economist who was among Jimmy Carter's advisers.

The Fed is watching carefully, the lessons from the 1960s inscribed in the minds of today's policy makers. "There were plenty of signs in the 1960s that inflation was accelerating, yet monetary policy wasn't fundamentally changed," says former Fed Governor Edward Gramlich. "Today, [the Fed] would be more alert and is more likely to react forcefully to signs of accelerating inflation."

Democrats Seek Unpaid Taxes, Setting Up Clash (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Congressional Democrats, hoping to finance an ambitious agenda without raising taxes, are on a collision course with the Bush administration about pursuing the potentially vast amount of money that people hide from the Internal Revenue Service.

House and Senate Democrats say the government could collect as much as $100 billion more a year by whittling the tax gap — the unpaid taxes, mostly on unreported earnings, that the I.R.S. estimated was about $300 billion a year.

But the Treasury Department, which oversees the I.R.S., says it cannot realistically recover one-tenth as much as Democrats suggest.

On Monday, as part of President Bush's budget proposal, the Treasury Department will unveil more than a dozen proposals to pursue tax cheats. But officials said those ideas would bring in less than $10 billion a year in extra revenue.

DOJ_NMG_0127165

Mark W. Everson, the I.R.S. commissioner, has expressed far greater optimism. At a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee a year ago, he told lawmakers that the government could recover "between $50 billion and $100 billion without changing the dynamic between the I.R.S. and the people."

Recouping unpaid taxes is a perennial concern in Washington. But the issue may have new urgency with the Democrats now in power and driving the considerable momentum behind it. Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has cited the tax gap as a top priority for increasing revenue, ahead of any discussion about rolling back President Bush's tax cuts.

Democrats badly want the money because they have adopted strict "pay as you go" budgeting rules that require Congress to pay for any new programs or tax cuts with revenue from other areas.

"The tax gap is the logical place to go," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "It's also the fair thing to do. When you have a number as high as $300 billion in unreported and uncollected income taxes, that puts a burden on everybody."

Administration officials contend that Democrats have exaggerated the amount of money they can recover.

"At this point we have to do more research to understand where this money is," said Michele Davis, a Treasury Department spokeswoman. "We are very mindful of the compliance burden on taxpayers who do follow the law."

The Democrats have offered only a few specific proposals, and lawmakers have conspicuously refused to comment about proposals that could raise money but also provoke a political reaction from legions of self-employed people and family businesses.

Based on an analysis of audited tax returns from 2001, the I.R.S. recently estimated that the government lost $290 billion that year as a result of underreporting and underpayment of taxes.

More than 80 percent of that loss stemmed from underreporting by individuals, not corporations.

And the biggest problems were with people in business for themselves, who earned income that was not reported to the I.R.S. on W-2 forms or on the Form 1099 that businesses file when they pay independent contractors.

The I.R.S. estimated that it lost $109 billion on unreported business income, almost all of that from sole proprietors, like painters, plumbers, dry cleaners, florists, limousine drivers and restaurant owners.

Small-business lobbying groups have begun to mobilize against proposals intended to reduce the tax gap.

Two of the biggest trade associations in Washington, the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business, organized the Coalition for Fairness in Tax Compliance in December to address lawmakers about proposals that might burden law-abiding business owners.

"I'm focused on avoiding the wrong solutions," said Macey Davis, tax counsel for the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents more than 600,000 small companies, half of which have fewer than five employees. "We're not out to protect noncompliance. We're out to protect those who are compliant and whose businesses could be hurt."

Small-business groups have provided powerful support to President Bush and to Republican lawmakers. But they are poised to fight at least one proposal by the Treasury Department, which would authorize the I.R.S. to obtain information about a business's revenues from credit card companies.

The proposal would allow the I.R.S. to compare the credit card payments made to a business with the revenues the business owner reports on his or her tax return. If the credit card payments were suspiciously high compared with what the business owner reported to the government, the I.R.S. could begin an audit.

Opponents of the proposal contend that it would catch very little wrong-doing because it would not examine payments made in cash or by check. They warn that it could have disruptive side effects on business operations. (A similar idea proposed by the Bush administration last year received virtually no attention from the Republican-led Congress.)

The Democrats' biggest obstacle is that the tax gap is in some ways as amorphous as "waste, fraud and abuse" — everyone is against it, but no one is sure how to go about dealing with it. Many tax experts agree that increasing compliance would require an array of tactics, from increased auditing to tougher reporting requirements, to address scores of different practices.

Many such efforts would probably prompt political resistance, whether from small-business lobbying groups or from the credit card companies that might be ordered to provide the I.R.S. with transaction data at no charge. And some efforts may not yield much extra revenue. Another proposal that could lead to organized political opposition is a plan to crack down on investors who understate their profits when selling stocks.

The I.R.S. estimated that it lost about $11 billion in 2001 from people who understated their capital gains after selling stock. According to the agency's review of tax returns that year, a year when the stock market was plunging and losses were more common than gains, about 38 percent of all people underreported their capital gains.

DOJ_NMG_0127166

The problem, I.R.S. officials said, is that brokerage firms report only how much money a person receives from the sale of stock, not how much the person paid for it. Without an audit, the government has no way of verifying the profits that people report.

Nina Olson, the I.R.S.'s independent taxpayer advocate, has proposed that Congress require brokerage firms to report a person's purchase cost as well as sales proceeds to the government. Mr. Emanuel has introduced a bill based on the idea.

The Bush administration is also planning to ask Congress to provide more money for enforcement efforts, including money for more auditors. But the I.R.S. currently audits fewer than one out of 435 tax returns. Doubling the number of auditors would mean that the I.R.S. would still audit less than 1 percent of all returns.

Democratic lawmakers contend that the Bush administration has been dragging its feet on efforts to track down underreporting.

"I know they can't recover every dollar of the tax gap, but the I.R.S. needs to make an aggressive effort, and an honest one," said Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Finance Committee. "Treasury shouldn't lowball their estimate."

But in an interview last week, Mr. Baucus declined to propose any of his own ideas for reducing cheating. "I'm leaving it up to them," he said, referring to the Treasury Department.

Some Treasury officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because President Bush had not announced his proposals, said that Democrats had exaggerated the amount of money they could recover. But in his testimony before the Senate budget committee last February, Mr. Everson said the government could recover much more than it has been collecting.

"What we've said is, between now and 2009, we want to get the compliance rate from 83.5 percent to 85 percent," Mr. Everson said. "That gets you about $30 billion in improved compliance."

Ms. Olson, the I.R.S. taxpayer advocate, said it was not implausible to recover something in the neighborhood of $100 billion a year.

"There's no silver bullet," Ms. Olson cautioned, noting that the government had to use an array of tactics to address scores of different compliance problems. But she added, "I think there's a significant amount of money that's left on the table and that's not hard to recover."

Needy Seniors Still Have Trouble Getting Drugs (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Eight months after Congress implored pharmaceutical companies to restore programs offering free drugs to needy Medicare recipients, advocacy groups say that some patients are still having trouble.

"Before the Medicare program, we had close to 4,000 seniors getting free drugs," says Patricia White, executive director of the West Virginia Health Right clinic in Charleston, W.Va. "We're probably down to 400 now."

The issue arose after many drug companies halted their assistance programs for Medicare-eligible patients once Medicare's drug benefit began last year. The drug companies feared running afoul of federal anti-kickback rules if they did not. Since then, Medicare officials and other regulators have said such programs can be set up in a way to avoid violating any laws.

Currently, some drug companies, including AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline, Merck, Pfizer and Wyeth, offer help to Medicare members. Income limits and other rules vary, as do which drugs are covered. Dozens of other drugmakers, however, bar Medicare-eligible patients from assistance programs.

In May, several members of the Senate Finance Committee met with top executives from eight drugmakers, urging them to continue the assistance programs.

"A company ought to be ashamed if it's still using (the Medicare drug program) as an excuse to abandon people with these extraordinary needs," Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, said in a written statement Friday.

About half of the members of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America provide assistance to Medicare members, says spokesman Ken Johnson, but many are still concerned about the legality of doing so.

Affected Medicare members include Mary Morey and Pat Martinez of Charlotte. "It's like I have fallen through a crack," says Morey, 67, who takes 10 drugs for diabetes and high blood pressure.

Her $15,000 annual income is under the $19,600 limit for assistance through Merck's and Wyeth's programs. Still, letters from Merck and Wyeth have told her she doesn't qualify. Wyeth has a requirement that applicants, or their doctors, write a letter stating they have a hardship. Morey has asked her doctor to write a letter.

"Every month, before it's time for Social Security to come again, I run out of food money," she says.

Martinez, 76, takes 19 drugs. The insulin she needs for diabetes comes from samples her doctor gives her. One of her drugs is made by Glaxo, which requires patients spend $600 on drugs before being eligible for assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0127167

"Pat doesn't have $600 to spend, so she can't qualify," says Susan Basini, executive director of MedAssist, a free pharmacy for uninsured and low-income residents of Mecklenburg County, N.C. Martinez works part time at MedAssist.

Inside Bush's Fixation With Harry Truman (NSWK)

By Holly Bailey, Richard Wolffe And Evan Thomas

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

President Bush was reaching out—sort of. It was Dec. 7, the day after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group had delivered its recommendation that the administration begin to tamp down its war effort in Iraq and turn to diplomacy. Bush had invited the leadership of the newly Democratic Congress to the Oval Office, a sign that he was perhaps willing to listen to new ideas.

The president did seem mildly chastened by his party's defeat in the midterm elections—but not inclined to change course dramatically in Iraq.

He compared his situation to the crisis Harry Truman faced in the early days of the cold war. Then, as now, Bush said, the United States confronted a dangerous ideological foe. Truman had answered with the Truman Doctrine, a vow to protect free peoples wherever they were threatened with communist domination. Truman's policies had been unpopular in their time, but "history showed he was right," said Bush, according to Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate.

The Truman comparison didn't seem quite right to Durbin. When the president went to him for comment, Durbin voiced his doubts. "Harry Truman had allies," Durbin pointed out. The Truman administration had helped create the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to contain communism. After Britain withdraws its troops later this year, Durbin says he told Bush, "we will be virtually alone in what we are trying to accomplish there." Durbin says that Bush did not become angry, but he did seem irritated and "insisted that this was an ideological struggle, which wasn't my point at all," says Durbin. "He was very defensive." (White House spokesman Tony Snow confirmed the exchange between Bush and Durbin but said "the president was not really trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle.")

Bush's grasp of history may have been a little shaky, but there is no doubting the force of his conviction. Bush wants his legacy to be the long-term defeat of Islamic extremism. Indeed, senior officials close to Bush who did not wish to be identified discussing private conversations with the president tell NEWSWEEK that Bush's plan after he leaves the White House is to continue to promote the spread of democracy in the Middle East by inviting world leaders to his own policy institute, to be built alongside his presidential library.

Many presidents find solace in comparing themselves to their predecessors, the only people who could truly understand the job at hand. Truman is a favorite, particularly for presidents with low poll numbers. By 1952, the last year of his presidency, Truman's approval rating sank as low as 22 percent, about 10 points lower than Bush's. David McCullough, author of the Pulitzer Prize-winning biography "Truman," tells NEWSWEEK that, faced with an uphill re-election fight in 1992, George H.W. Bush invited McCullough to the White House to talk about how Truman had beaten the odds in the 1948 campaign (unlike Truman, Bush lost his re-election bid). The two Roosevelts and Lincoln, of course, are popular role models. Bill Clinton, who spent many hours in office fretting over his legacy, lamented that he might not rank highly because he lacked the opportunity to be a "war president"—perhaps overlooking in his meditations the impact of the Lewinsky scandal.

An avid reader of history and presidential biographies, President George W. Bush after 9/11 felt a kinship with war leaders, including Britain's Winston Churchill. In the last year or so, as Bush's approval ratings have tumbled and the Iraq quagmire has deepened, the president has increasingly invoked Truman. His aides say that Bush wants to be remembered for creating a new and effective framework for fighting the war on terror, just as Truman did for the cold war. That may be so, though no one would put the Department of Homeland Security on the same plane as the Marshall Plan.

Senator Durbin tells NEWSWEEK that the better historical model for Bush is Lyndon Johnson, who was overwhelmed by Vietnam. But that comparison is not quite right, either. Bush has said that he does not want to be like LBJ, who micromanaged the Vietnam War right down to picking bombing targets. Presidents, Bush has said, should leave war fighting to the generals. This is Bush's misreading of history: Lincoln constantly second-guessed his generals; Roosevelt and Churchill plotted strategy in the White House Map Room and John F. Kennedy was the strongest voice in the "ExComm," his council of advisers, during the Cuban missile crisis.

Those who see the war as a growing disaster might be surprised by Bush's ability to remain upbeat. When he visits the families of the dead, or sees the casualties come home from the battlefront, doesn't he have crises of confidence? Doesn't he wonder if he's made a terrible mistake that has cost the lives of more than 3,000 Americans and more than 54,000 Iraqis, not to mention the stature and prestige of the United States? Those close to Bush say that such questions misunderstand a fundamental aspect of his character: he doesn't get tangled up thinking about his own mistakes in the raw, recent times of his own making. "He's the least backward-looking person I have ever known in my life," says a senior staffer who didn't want to be named discussing the president's emotional state. Bush laments the casualties, says the aide, but never regrets the decision to go to war.

As more details emerge after Bush leaves office, we may learn that he was not quite so detached, that he privately agonized over decisions. A reconstruction of Bush's past six months as commander in chief shows that he has taken a greater interest in the details of the war in Iraq than he has before. Still, he has repeatedly followed his own certitudes over the advice of others. As the war and his poll numbers worsened, Bush did, for the first time, begin to talk to soldiers with on-the-ground experience and civilian experts with a range of views. But it appears that he was at least two years too late, and that he has somewhat simplistically and unrealistically narrowed his options to victory or defeat. He has kept his focus on the big picture, the great march of freedom, from decades past and decades into the imagined future, as a way to insulate himself against the horrors of the moment.

The Bush White House has long counted on democracy to produce a viable Iraqi government. Last June, when Bush traveled to Baghdad to meet Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, he returned optimistic. The president told reporters on Air Force One that he found Maliki to be tough, direct and truthful. Bush was buoyed by the lack of sectarian finger-pointing in his talks with Maliki and his cabinet.

American military commanders, however, were much less sanguine, say informed high-ranking officers who did not wish to publicly discuss the private views of their superiors. Senior officers on the ground feared that Maliki would be politically ineffective in confronting the growing violence.

The military's fears were quickly realized. Two successive major operations to pacify Baghdad, Together Forward I and II, were complete flops in the summer. Iraqi troops failed to show up as promised, and Maliki's administration interfered when American troops tried to go after Shiite militias. By September, the top American commander, Gen. George Casey, feared that his strategy of training Iraq forces was failing but did not know what else to do, say four senior military officials who declined to be quoted discussing the private views of top commanders. (Casey, who was preparing for Senate confirmation hearings, was unavailable for comment. Last week he testified to Congress that he believed that the war would be long, but still winnable.)

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld sensed that his long and domineering reign was coming to an end, and offered his resignation. With the mid-term elections less than a month away, Bush could not publicly reveal that Rumsfeld was on the way out. At a post-election press conference, Bush virtually admitted that he had held back because voters would see Rummy's exit as a sign of failure.

The GOP defeat at the polls could have been an opening to find a bipartisan way out of Iraq. The report of the Iraq Study Group was greeted with much hoopla in the press. But at the White House, it was a nonstarter. Bush, say two aides who didn't want to be named discussing the president's thinking, dismissed its conclusions; the White House had already begun its own in-depth review, they point out.

The election forced Bush to make a public show of announcing a new strategy in Iraq. He had the usual three options: pull back, stand pat or escalate. Retreat was intolerable; the president could not conceive of managing defeat. In late November, Bush was almost truculent as he publicly addressed reports that the Iraq Study Group would call for a pullout from Iraq. He openly scoffed at the notion of a "graceful exit." At first, say the Bush aides, the president was tempted to pull U.S. troops out of Baghdad and let the sectarian fires burn themselves out. But he soon decided that U.S. forces could not stand by and watch civilian massacres or the breakup of the country.

The president is sensitive to the caricature of Bush-in-a-bubble, and he began reaching out more actively for independent assessments of Iraq. He had two important strategy sessions, described to NEWSWEEK by knowledgeable military and White House officials who wished to remain anonymous discussing confidential presidential meetings. On Dec. 11, Bush summoned five military experts to the Oval Office: retired Gens. Jack Keane (former vice chief of staff of the Army), Wayne Downing (former head of Special Forces) and Barry McCaffrey (armored-division commander in the first gulf war); and two well-known scholars, Eliot Cohen of Johns Hopkins University and Stephen Biddle of the Council on Foreign Relations. Two of the generals, Keane and Downing, argued for significantly more forces—but while Downing argued for more Special Forces, Keane pushed for as many as 50,000 to 60,000 combat troops to protect the population in Baghdad. McCaffrey countered that such a surge would fail. The two civilians warned that it might be too late to save Iraq, but backed a buildup.

On Dec. 13, Bush met directly with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in their Pentagon meeting room, the Tank. After four years of war, it was the first time Bush had directly quizzed the top brass in their own lair. The recently resigned Rumsfeld was still in the room, but for once he was not an overbearing presence. The chiefs were grim. The Coalition forces were not winning in Iraq, said Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Gen. Peter Pace, which meant they were losing because time was not on their side. (Pace's staff declined to comment.) The generals warned that a significant escalation—along the lines proposed by Keane—ran the risk of "breaking" the Army, which was already badly worn.

The outcome of these dire warnings was a compromise. The clamor in Congress for a pullback seems to have only stiffened Bush's resolve to show that he could make the hard choices of a lonely war leader. But he could not create troops out of thin air. Bush decided to surge in Iraq, but to request essentially half a loaf—some 21,000 combat troops. Not a few military commanders have privately complained that those reinforcements are too few to really take control of Baghdad and Anbar province, which is ridden with Sunni insurgents.

Bush seemed once again to be counting on sheer will power to bring success. His apparent plan: to buy time while still hoping that Maliki can create a viable government that won't allow the country to collapse into sectarian slaughter. The strategy may indeed produce a lull in the fighting. Press reports suggest that Shiite militiamen have been told to put away their guns and lie low—until the Americans leave. But counting on Maliki to countenance raids on militias that keep him in power may be a forlorn hope. Even Bush's own national-security adviser, Steve Hadley, questioned Maliki's reliability and competence for the long haul in a secret memo that was leaked to the press, possibly by the military.

The cynical view is that Bush is also buying time for himself—so he can dump the problem on the next president without having to admit defeat. But two years is a long time, and Bush is no cynic. He is a true believer, and he is willing to wait to be vindicated by history. Though he has visibly aged on the job and can appear weary or miffed when speaking to reporters or in front of a camera, he is generally optimistic in private, say his friends and confidants. His routines are unvarying: he gets plenty of rest and exercise and reads voraciously. (After an election hiatus, he has recently resumed a competition with political adviser Karl Rove to see who can read the most books.) But when Bush reads, does he learn? At Henry Kissinger's recommendation, he recently read "A Savage War of Peace," an account of the failed French attempt to suppress the rebellion of its Algerian colony in the late 1950s. American military officers in Iraq regard the book, by British war historian Alistair Horne, as required reading. Bush found the book interesting, says one of the aides, but regards the French experience in Algiers as fundamentally different from the American experience in Iraq. Bush focused on the problems of the French bureaucracy—as if to say the French failed because they were, well, French.

In his history reading, Bush likes to identify with Truman because the former Missouri haberdasher was also mocked by the chattering classes for being inarticulate and unsophisticated. Bush and Truman share a kind of flinty self-reliance: just as Bush likes to call himself "the decider," Truman liked to say "The buck stops here." There is a crucial difference between the approaches of the two men, however. Truman early and often sought out the advice of establishment foreign-policy experts like Gen. George C. Marshall and Dean Acheson, the two men most responsible for postwar European recovery and the Western Alliance. And then he actually listened, with close attention to detail, to what they had to say.

The Press, Turning Up Its Nose At Lame Duck (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Six months after his party lost both houses of Congress, Bill Clinton was reduced to declaring at a news conference that he was still relevant.

The next day, the Oklahoma City federal building was bombed. Clinton regained his footing and cruised to reelection the following year, his relevance never again in doubt -- even after his impeachment.

These days, many in the media seem to be writing off President Bush.

"The American people basically fired George Bush in the last election," writes New York Times columnist Tom Friedman. "We're now just watching him clean out his desk."

"A lot of Americans consider this presidency over," says CNN's Bill Schneider.

"If America were a parliamentary democracy, we would have a no-confidence vote and a new prime minister by spring," writes New York Daily News columnist Michael Goodwin.

Are these and other pundits giving us the unvarnished truth, that we are witnessing the historic collapse of a presidency? Or is this the triumph of quick-draw, poll-driven journalism?

"It's a predictable bit of conventional wisdom," White House spokesman Tony Snow says in an interview. He insists that Bush can make progress on such issues as energy and immigration, "and he still has the bully pulpit. A lot of these narratives about 'the president is a lame duck' assume nothing is going to change politically, anywhere in the world, in the next two years."

But the gibes keep on coming. "If we had a straight dictatorship," writes the New Republic's Jonathan Chait, "Bush would long ago have been dragged out of the White House either by an angry mob or by disgruntled generals." (Not that he's in favor of either.)

Chait agrees in an interview that the president still has power, but notes: "Psychologically, it does feel that people are starting to move past Bush. No one has changed his mind about Bush in the last two years. It's kind of boring to write about him anymore because he's so unchanging."

Fred Barnes, the Weekly Standard's executive editor, says Bush will concentrate on such areas as tightening control of regulatory policy to end-run a Democratic Congress. "The Republicans learned in the '90s -- and the press should have learned as well -- that presidents have great inherent powers," he says. But "Nancy Pelosi at the moment is a more interesting story than George Bush. She's new, she's attractive and she has an agenda."

The media, as always, are mesmerized by polls. When Bush was riding high in the "Mission Accomplished" days of 2003, some of the coverage was almost giddy. If Bush's current approval ratings were at 50 percent, his media portrayal would look very different. With the president having sunk as low as 28 percent in a CBS News survey, it is all too easy to dismiss him, even as he mounts an escalation of the war in Iraq.

That war, of course, is the reason why the mainstream media see no possibility of Bush bouncing back. Things are a mess in Iraq; the country has turned against the war; and few journalists think the "surge" is going to work. Therefore, the reasoning goes, Bush will continue to sink into the quagmire of the war he chose to wage.

There's little question that Bush has never been weaker politically. He got no traction from the State of the Union (as measured by the almighty polls). His domestic proposals seem to have sparked little interest, at least from the press. Here he is talking about income inequality, global warming and tougher auto mileage standards -- all typically Democratic themes -- and the journalistic reaction is a barely suppressed yawn. He's yesterday's news.

But with Bush constitutionally entitled to two more years in the White House, it is risky for journalists to declare him a marginal figure, even if they are far more absorbed in covering the race to succeed him.

Other unpopular war presidents have staggered to the ends of their terms -- Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson come to mind -- and Bush may do the same. But because Iraq is now widely viewed as having been an unnecessary personal crusade on Bush's part, there seems to be an extra element of derision in the political commentary, especially from the left.

Bush's father recently vented his frustrations with the coverage. "It's one thing to have an adversarial . . . relationship -- hard-hitting journalism. It's another when the journalists' rhetoric goes beyond skepticism and goes over the line into overt, unrelenting hostility and personal animosity," the former president said.

Actually, even some of the journalists who are especially aggressive in their coverage of Bush like him in private settings, where the president has a joshing manner and enjoys handing out nicknames. But professional resentment may still be behind some of the increasingly negative coverage. "In the press corps," Chait says, "there's a little bit of a realization that they had been played."

From Iraq, where the media fell down on the WMD debate, to Bush's 2000 campaign persona as a compassionate conservative, many journalists now believe they were led astray. That has given an extra edge to their stories and columns on Bush being out of touch and has fueled an effort to vindicate their darker picture of the war. In short, the mainstream media no longer give this president the benefit of the doubt.Getting Even?

Jim Cramer, CNBC's manic "Mad Money" host, is accustomed to people taking potshots.

Former investment banker Henry Blodget used some heavy ammunition last week in Slate. Blodget said that although Cramer can be "brilliant, in an idiot-savant, freak-show sort of way," he gives "terrible investment advice," and that ordinary folks should invest in index funds rather than following stock picks from "a chair-throwing, self-aggrandizing clown."

Cramer, a former hedge fund manager, says this is nothing but "revenge." He harshly criticized Blodget for his conduct at Merrill Lynch, which led to a $4 million fine against the young analyst and a lifetime ban from the securities industry. Blodget kept touting high-flying Internet stocks that later crashed, while privately deriding them as "junk" and pieces of excrement.

"What he did was egregious," Cramer says. "He was paid millions of dollars to tell the truth. He should go opine on something else. He should not opine on stocks."

What's more, Cramer says it is "appalling" that CNBC recently interviewed Blodget about his new book. Blodget's retaliation, says Cramer, came after Cramer took the unusual step of criticizing his own network for doing the interview.

Blodget says he wrote the Slate column because Cramer is "so influential and omnipresent that just about everyone I know asks me what I think of him. . . . Jim can't possibly believe that trying to out-trade thousands of full-time professionals is an intelligent strategy for average investors."Media Lesson

Last Monday, the George Washington University student paper broke a story about college coaches checking out Facebook to see whether their players had posted racy pictures of themselves.

Days later, WJLA-TV ran the same story -- without credit.

DOJ_NMG_0127171

"Absolutely, the idea originated out of their article," says Channel 7 reporter Kris Van Cleave. "But I don't think anyone owns ideas. We went out and obtained the information ourselves. Honestly, it didn't feel like we needed to attribute the story. Otherwise, we would have."

David Ceasar, an editor at the GW Hatchet, says the station used similar phrases in its version. "I felt flattered that a network news affiliate would use material from a 19-year-old sophomore, but it rubbed me the wrong way that it didn't mention us at all."Risky Move

John Edwards has hired Amanda Marcotte, of the liberal site Pandagon, to blog for his presidential campaign. But the trouble with bloggers is that they leave a sometimes inflammatory trail.

As noted by OpinionJournal's James Taranto, Marcotte wrote last month of the Duke rape case that she "had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and [sexually assaulted] her against her will -- not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair."

A misguided attempt at sarcasm? "No comment," Marcotte e-mailed Friday. "But thanks for asking!"

U.S. Treasury Adviser To Leave; Post Played International Role (WSJ)

By Elizabeth Price

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Treasury Department's top international-policy adviser, Timothy Adams, is resigning after seven years with the Bush administration.

Mr. Adams, a 45-year-old Kentucky native, led efforts to give the International Monetary Fund more power to crack down on members' economic policies, particularly countries that meddle with exchange rates to gain an advantage in international trade.

He also played a role in getting the IMF to overhaul its governance structure to give Asian countries more clout in decision making and pushed the powerful Group of Seven industrial countries to deepen the engagement with emerging economic powers, including China, Brazil and India.

In his resignation letter, Mr. Adams said his responsibilities to his wife and three young children were "incompatible" with the job's demands. Since becoming undersecretary for international affairs in 2005, Mr. Adams has spent much of his time traveling to more than 40 countries. He previously was chief of staff to former Treasury Secretaries John Snow and Paul O'Neill.

Pelosi To Fly In Air Force Plane (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The Defense Department has agreed to furnish House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) with a jet big enough to fly nonstop coast-to-coast, despite complaints from some Republicans that the request was causing friction at the Pentagon.

Drew Hammill, a spokesman for the Speaker, said Friday that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for “clarification” on rules governing her use of military planes. After Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker was granted access to military transport for additional security, given the person in that job is third in the line of succession to the presidency.

The plane used by former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for frequent trips back to his Illinois home was a small, Lear-type jet, according to a Republican leadership aide. But that plane needs to refuel every 2,000 miles and could not make the nonstop haul to California.

“The Air Force determined that [Pelosi’s] safety would be best ensured by using a plane that has the fuel capacity to go coast-to-coast,” Hammill said. “All we’re asking for is what Hastert had.”

Hammill pointed to the busier Congressional work schedule as a reason why it was necessary to avoid lengthy layovers, especially in Plains States, where harsh winter weather could cause further delays.

“There’s a certain amount of inefficiency and risk involved in stopping and having to refuel,” he said.

On Friday, Pelosi’s office waded into the growing public relations battle over how the Speaker travels and with whom. The Washington Times reported last week that Pelosi was demanding permanent access to a large military jet for herself, her staff, other Members and supporters.

A Bush administration official and a senior Hill Republican said that Pelosi’s requests were causing serious friction in the Pentagon, which views them as a strain on a system that is charged with providing military transport for Cabinet officials and top generals and commanders. A permanent large plane for Pelosi, the Hill Republican said, would mean less availability for other high-ranking officials.

DOJ_NMG_0127172

"The Department of Defense offered Speaker Pelosi the same aircraft" as the one used by Hastert, said one senior Republican who has spoken extensively with Defense Department officials about Pelosi's requests. "She found it was not big enough for staff, supporters and other Members."

But Hammill denied any substantial controversy with the Pentagon brass. "Were not talking about major negotiations here. We're talking about a few phone calls seeking clarification."

One administration official said that the new Speaker had asked that a plane be designated for her use in traveling to the Democratic retreat late last week in Williamsburg, Va., which is 152 miles from Washington, D.C.

Hammill confirmed that Pelosi had asked the Pentagon for guidance regarding the use of military aircraft for Congressional retreats.

"The request was to clarify whether retreats are covered," Hammill said. "We had the knowledge that Hastert had used [a military plane] for a retreat on one occasion."

Ultimately, Pelosi did not use the plane to travel to the retreat; the administration official said that request had been denied.

Hammill said that so far, the California Democrat had only used the Air Force plane for a single January trip back to San Francisco. He added that Pelosi asked the Pentagon a number of questions regarding how the plane could be employed, such as whether it could be used solely for official business or also for political travel. The Speaker's office also requested clarification on who can legally travel on the plane in addition to the Speaker, such as staff and supporters.

Hammill said the Pentagon has yet to respond to these specific queries. Defense Department officials did not return repeated calls to comment for this story.

Lawmaker access to military jets may be even more important now that the House has instituted new gift rules that prohibit lawmakers from using corporate jets under any circumstances.

One Republican leadership aide said Hastert routinely flew commercially, usually on United Airlines, back to his Illinois district until Sept. 11, 2001. At that point, the White House decided for security reasons the Speaker should have access to a military plane for his travel.

Despite the lack of clear restrictions on the plane's use, the leadership aide said Hastert decided to use the plane solely for official business and not for political travel, which would have required reimbursements to the government of several thousand dollars per hour of use.

Hastert sometimes traveled on the plane, which was described as relatively small, with other staff and occasionally his wife.

"We would not use it for political business," said the leadership aide. "We would take corporate or commercial."

"There were no clear rules," the aide added.

The White House would not comment on the issue and referred all questions to the Defense Department, which responded with guidance on appropriate Congressional foreign trips.

Under Defense Department rules, Members of Congress typically fly military planes for official foreign travel or for domestic trips to military bases. Before Sept. 11, 2001, the Speaker had to abide by the same rules as everyone else.

Reached by phone on Friday, ex-Speaker Jim Wright (D-Texas) said that he typically flew commercial like everyone else.

"I traveled almost exclusively by commercial jet. I didn't have access to a military plane that I was aware of," Wright said. "I do have some memory that someone called me and said there would be one available if I needed to use it, and I don't think I ever did take them up on that."

US Public Sector Faces Talent Drain (FT)

By Rebecca Knight In Boston

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The US federal government faces a massive talent drain in the coming years as many senior government officials reach retirement age and fewer bright young people opt for careers in public service.

About 90 per cent of senior managers in federal government are eligible to retire in 10 years, and more than 40 per cent of all federal employees will be eligible for retirement by 2010, according to the Council for Excellence in Government, a non-partisan research group.

At the same time, fewer young people are choosing to work for the federal government. Many top US colleges and public policy schools report that the number of graduating students going into public service has decreased. For instance, at Columbia University's School for Public Affairs, 73 per cent of the graduating class went to work for federal, state or local government in 1979, compared with 36 per cent who choose public sector work today.

Anne Marie Slaughter, dean of Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, told the Financial Times she has observed a "brain drain both to private sector and the non-profit sector".

DOJ_NMG_0127173

"Students don't see the government as a place you can make a difference," she said. "The common perception is that if you go into the private sector, you're an economic entrepreneur, if you go into the non-profit sector you're a social entrepreneur, but if you go into government, you're a bureaucrat."

President John F. Kennedy once enticed the best and brightest of young people into careers in public service by saying: "Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country."

However, the Vietnam war, the Watergate scandal and the subsequent political apathy coupled with the changing economics of the marketplace – especially the rise of non-government industries – resulted in fewer of the best and the brightest choosing government work.

Stephen Bosworth, the dean of Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, said he believed one of the biggest reasons for this was pay. "Students have an opportunity to earn significantly more money in the private sector," he said.

The government also has a reputation among young people for having a slow and confusing recruitment pro-cess, according to Paul Light, a public service professor at the Wagner School at New York University. "This is stunningly evident at the college level perhaps because government is rarely a presence at job fairs and rarely mentioned by career counsellors."

Linda Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, said the federal government was trying hard-er to attract young workers by increasing its recruitment on college campuses and through television advertisements.

In addition, she said, the government was overhauling its hiring practices, expanding its health benefits and student loan forgiveness programmes.

Job Shadowing Sheds Light On Defense Work (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The first questions were right to the point: Is there a lot of paperwork in applying for a federal job? What's the easiest way to get a security clearance?

The questions came from Washington area high school students participating in the Information Technology Job Shadow Day at the Defense Department, one of 26 agencies hosting events last week aimed at recruiting the next generation of computer professionals into government.

As the shadow day activities underscored, many federal agencies are trying to build a recruitment pipeline that goes beyond colleges and into high schools, where teenagers can be introduced to federal work through summer jobs, internships and scholarship programs.

"We're hitting all ages," said Joyce France, director of the management services directorate for Defense's chief information officer. "We want to reach back to high schools, and show them how critical and important information technology is, and grow these students for the Defense Department and the federal government and for private industry."

Like other parts of the government, Defense is concerned about its aging workforce. The department has about 69,000 technology professionals in its civil service ranks, and officials estimate that 10,000 will be eligible to retire at the end of this year.

Not all of them will leave, of course, but Defense officials are looking to the future and want to make sure that teenagers understand the importance of math, science and English courses as building blocks for technology careers.

For the job shadow day, the Pentagon revved up briefings and tours worthy of visiting dignitaries.

Lt. Gen. Michael W. Peterson, the Air Force chief information officer, welcomed one group of students. Army Maj. Jim Enicks, who has served in Iraq and currently works for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, shared his experiences with another. Civilian executives and managers, including France, Debra Filippi and John Venit, offered advice and fielded questions.

Tour stops for the students included the National Military Command Center, which links the defense secretary to other top government leaders during emergencies; the office of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates (who was not in); the Pentagon courtyard; and the 9/11 Memorial Chapel.

One group of students started their Pentagon day with a "talk show" segment taped by the Pentagon Channel, the in-house TV and Web broadcast service.

Two Defense computer scientists, Alex Eisen and Kunal Johar, urged the students to look into education scholarships provided by Defense and to think about what they want out of life and how a technology career might help them achieve personal goals.

Defense officials told the students they looked for potential hires who had good grades and had tried to apply their skills, by building a Web site or by using commercial software to compile data.

About 30 Washington area students participated in the Defense shadow day, coming from Ballou Senior High, Benjamin Banneker, the Edison Academy, the Fairfax Academy and T. C. Williams.

DOJ_NMG_0127174

They were part of an estimated 280 students attending technology job shadow days across the government, drawn from 27 area high schools. The schools included Anacostia, Cardoza, Chantilly, Frederick Douglas, Gaithersburg, Springbrook, West Potomac and Wheaton.

The government's effort was organized by the Federal Chief Information Officers Council, an interagency group, in partnership with the Association for Federal Information Resources Management, a nonprofit group; and Junior Achievement, a group dedicated to educating young people about business and economics.

Last week's events marked a reinvigoration of technology shadow day. It was last held in 2003, drawing about 100 students from nine high schools for visits at nine agencies.

Doris McGuire, a co-chair with Ned Kieloch of the information officers council's student outreach subcommittee, said organizers went into the event hoping to match past participation and double the turnout. The advance planning paid off.

She said the students turned in feedback cards with comments, such as "I had a first-hand experience of what people do at work" and "How cool is that!"

Jonathon Glad, a senior at Thomas Edison High School in Alexandria, told reporters that he decided to participate in the shadow day because of his interest in technology and he wanted to see the Pentagon. He said he thinks technology will mesh with his career plan -- to join the Army after completion of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps program.

The Green-Zoning Of America (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

One of the best of the many recent books about the Iraq debacle is Rajiv Chandrasekaran's "Imperial Life in the Emerald City." The book tells a tale of hopes squandered in the name of politicization and privatization: key jobs in Baghdad's Green Zone were assigned on the basis of loyalty rather than know-how, while key functions were outsourced to private contractors.

Two recent reports in The New York Times serve as a reminder that the Bush administration has brought the same corruption of governance to the home front. Call it the Green-Zoning of America.

In the first article, The Times reported that a new executive order requires that each agency contain a "regulatory policy office run by a political appointee," a change that "strengthens the hand of the White House in shaping rules that have, in the past, often been generated by civil servants and scientific experts." Yesterday, The Times turned to the rapid growth of federal contracting, fed "by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does."

These are two different pieces of the same story: under the guise of promoting a conservative agenda, the Bush administration has created a supersized version of the 19th-century spoils system.

The blueprint for Bush-era governance was laid out in a January 2001 manifesto from the Heritage Foundation, titled "Taking Charge of Federal Personnel." The manifesto's message, in brief, was that the professional civil service should be regarded as the enemy of the new administration's conservative agenda. And there's no question that Heritage's thinking reflected that of many people on the Bush team.

How should the civil service be defeated? First and foremost, Heritage demanded that politics take precedence over know-how: the new administration "must make appointment decisions based on loyalty first and expertise second."

Second, Heritage called for a big increase in outsourcing — "contracting out as a management strategy." This would supposedly reduce costs, but it would also have the desirable effect of reducing the total number of civil servants.

The Bush administration energetically put these recommendations into effect. Political loyalists were installed throughout the government, regardless of qualifications. And the administration outsourced many government functions previously considered too sensitive to privatize: yesterday's Times article begins with the case of CACI International, a private contractor hired, in spite of the obvious conflict of interest, to process cases of incompetence and fraud by private contractors. A few years earlier, CACI provided interrogators at Abu Ghraib.

The ostensible reason for politicizing and privatizing was to promote the conservative ideal of smaller, more efficient government. But the small-government rhetoric was never sincere: from Day 1, the administration set out to create a vast new patronage machine.

Those political appointees chosen for their loyalty, not their expertise, aren't very good at doing their proper jobs — as all the world learned after Hurricane Katrina struck. But they have been very good at rewarding campaign contributors, from energy companies that benefit from lax regulation of pollution to pharmaceutical companies that got a Medicare program systematically designed to protect their profits.

And the executive order described by The Times will make it even easier for political appointees to overrule the professionals, tailoring government regulations to suit the interests of companies that support the G.O.P. — or to give lucrative contracts to people with the right connections.

Meanwhile, never mind the idea that outsourcing of government functions should be used to promote competition and save money. The Times reports that "fewer than half of all 'contract actions' — new contracts and payments against existing contracts — are now subject to full and open competition," down from 79 percent in 2001. And many contractors are paid far more than it would cost to do the job with government employees: those CACI workers processing claims against other contractors cost the government $104 an hour.

What's truly amazing is how far back we've slid in such a short time. The modern civil service system dates back more than a century; in just six years the Bush administration has managed to undo many of that system's achievements. And the administration still has two years to go.

A Bid For Better Student Loans (WP)

By Michael Dannenberg And Phillip Longman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

The average graduate of a four-year college now sets off in life burdened by almost $20,000 in student loans. Among those graduating from four-year private schools, it is not uncommon to owe $40,000 or more. Responding to this unprecedented burden on Americans seeking to improve themselves, the House recently passed a bill that, on average, would reduce the loan interest paid by college students by about $30 a month.

That's welcome relief. But by forcing banks to compete for the right to make government-guaranteed student loans, we can do much more to ensure that young Americans are not sunk by debt before they get a chance to start their careers and families.

How much could interest rates and government subsidies for student loans fall without causing banks to stop lending? Probably a lot, though no one can say for sure because there is no market mechanism for determining the price of student loan subsidies. Instead, the federal government guarantees banks that the student loans they issue will be repaid in full, and then, through the political process (i.e., after listening to bank lobbyists), promises banks a profit set in law by formula. Separately, Congress also sets the interest rates that borrowers pay.

Those terms leave the good folks who make student loans with little to complain about. Loan giant Sallie Mae makes a 43 percent return on its cost of capital while incurring virtually no risk. Such rich rewards suggest that guaranteed profits on guaranteed student loans could be cut substantially without reducing the number of Americans who can obtain such loans. But finding exactly the right subsidy price or market-clearing interest rate for student loans is not something Congress or anyone else can divine in the absence of a market.

Fortunately, there is an easy solution: Make lenders bid for the right to sell federally guaranteed student loans.

As the commercial says, when bankers compete, you win. The right to originate loans guaranteed against default by taxpayers is something of great value that the government currently gives away for free to the banking industry. Why shouldn't banks have to bid against one another to secure this sure source of profit, especially when it's the taxpayers who create this "business opportunity"? Banks could compete by offering the highest bid for the right to sell guaranteed student loans to designated schools or by agreeing to accept the lowest amount of subsidy.

How much revenue would such an auction raise? It's hard to say exactly in the absence of a market. But recently, one of the country's largest lenders, the Missouri Higher Education Loan Authority, sold off half its portfolio of student loans at a premium of 7.1 percent. This hints at the market value of government-guaranteed student loans and suggests that taxpayers could save $15 billion to $20 billion over the next five years if Washington relied on market mechanisms instead of backroom politics to establish subsidy rates.

We could use all that extra revenue to benefit needy college students directly through grants or by cutting interest rates on their loans. Or we could extend the No Child Left Behind Act into high schools, as the Bush administration wants. Really, we should do all three.

The idea of such an auction is hardly radical. The government auctions off its Treasury debt, as well as spectrum licenses and offshore drilling rights, among other things. These auctions are not without their flaws, but they are preferable to the government simply giving away public assets to the well-connected.

From the borrower's perspective, loan terms would not change. Banks with winning bids would be required to make the same government-guaranteed loans that are available today.

Yes, the auction system might reduce the number of lenders, but the difference wouldn't be much. According to the Education Department, 32 lenders control 90 percent of the market, and one, Sallie Mae, already owns more than half of all outstanding federal family education loans.

Besides, in the event of poor service, colleges that don't like the winning bidders would retain the option of shifting to the government's own Direct Loan program, which provides the same loans under the same terms and conditions as the subsidized bank alternative. And if borrowers are upset with the winning bidders' service, they could refinance with another lender, as millions who hold consolidated student loans already have.

The American system of financing higher education needs reform, and soon -- but we must do it by moving away from the current system of government price controls. Conservatives should approve of a system that lets a market mechanism determine the cost of student loans, while liberals should applaud the dismantling of one of the country's most egregious examples of corporate welfare.

On Race And The Census: Struggling With Categories That No Longer Apply (NYT)

By Brent Staples

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Imagine the Census Bureau announcing that it would end the practice of asking people to identify themselves by race beginning in 2010. Black elected officials and their allies in the civil rights community would fight the proposal tooth and nail by arguing that racial statistics were necessary for enforcing civil rights laws — especially the Voting Rights Act — and that dropping race from the census would dilute black political strength. Enemies of affirmative action would jump for joy, believing that they had finally won.

But these antagonists aren't the only factions in the fight. A growing number of demographers and historians who are fully sympathetic to the civil rights struggle would probably be happy to see the word "race" disappear from the census as well. There seems to be an emerging consensus that the system of racial classification that has dominated national politics and the census for nearly two centuries is so fraught with imprecision — and so tainted by racist ideas that have been disproved by science — that it should eventually be dropped altogether.

This view has been percolating among census historians for years. But it has gained traction since the 1990s, when there was a pitched battle over a proposal that would have added a "multiracial" category to the 2000 census. A compromise allowed people to check more than one box for race. But that change only fueled the debate by revealing a conflict between the fixed racial categories that have long dominated American life and a different sense of identity that's clearly on the rise among younger Americans.

Most Americans think of racial categories as objective, even benign, descriptions that are part of the social fabric. But the historian Margo Anderson writes that official statistics on "race" or "color" were inaugurated into the federal statistical system in the early 19th century. By then the government had embraced the view that people of African descent were from genetically inferior ancestral groups and could never escape subordinate status.

Armed with this view, the Census Bureau became the fountainhead of 19th-century racist dogma. The bureau reported, for example, that free black people were disproportionately insane, thus supporting the view that slavery was the only suitable status for them. It actively promoted the eugenicist view that Americans of African descent were so inferior and ill equipped to survive that they would eventually become extinct.

The bureau during this period was obsessed with the notion that sexual contact between people of African and European dissent was polluting the theoretically "pure" white society. The belief that the so-called "races" had been set apart by God and nature led to the popular theory that children of mixed ancestry were akin to mules, which are sterile, and would die out after a single generation.

With an eye out for what the government saw as racial abomination, census wardens went house to house, eyeballing ostensibly white people for traces of creeping "blackness." This period marked the rise of the so-called "one-drop rule" — which defined as black anyone with any African heritage at all. That often meant banishment from jobs, housing and public schools set aside for whites. The "one-drop rule" has been stripped of its worst penalties. But it is still evident in the census, as Kim Williams of Harvard points out in her recent book, "Mark One or More: Civil Rights in Multiracial America." For example, people who checked both "white" and one minority race in 2000 were counted in a single-race minority group.

The system of racial classification used in this country will never be scrubbed clean of its racist origins. Indeed, the seemingly innocuous act of assigning people to "races" still sets them sociologically and biologically apart in a way that scientists and anthropologists have long since rejected. The Americans who checked more than one box in 2000 seem to reject this fixed, "one drop" formulation of race.

Many people now see race as a facet of personal identity that changes from time to time or even from place to place. In a follow-up survey just a year after the initial 2000 census, for example, about 4 of 10 people who had listed more than one race decided to change their responses. Kenneth Prewitt, a Columbia University professor and former census director, wrote in the journal Daedalus in 2005 that these people seem to see race not as a fixed demographic fact, but as "something closer to an attitude toward oneself."

The 2000 census suggests that we are gradually moving away from the rigid, racialist system of classification that has long dominated this country and toward a system that sees racial identity as more fluid. Even historians and demographers who sympathize with the civil rights struggle and who recognize the need to document discrimination now see that the "one-drop rule" will not be sustainable in the new, multiracial America. We may be stuck with the old formulation for the moment. But it's no longer a matter of if it will fall away. It's a matter of when.

Exports And Free Trade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

President Bush's trade promotion authority expires in a few months, and along with it the ability to strike new free-trade deals. So it's worth highlighting that some of the fastest-growing destinations for American products are the countries with which we've signed trade-opening accords.

According to the U.S. Trade Representative's office, U.S. goods exports have climbed by some 26% among the 10 countries with which the U.S. has signed accords since 2001. Meanwhile, goods exports to the rest of the world have only grown by 13% across the same period.

The differential is even larger over the 12 months through November 2006 for new free-trade partners Australia, Chile, Jordan and Singapore. U.S. exports to those nations rose at a rate of 40.5%, compared with 14.4% to the rest of the world. No doubt this reflects the commodity (copper) boom in Chile, where, for example, Caterpillar has been able to double its exports of heavy equipment.

But bilateral free-trade agreements have also made those markets more accessible by sharply reducing tariffs on U.S. manufactured goods. These export markets have been especially important to manufacturers during the recent U.S. housing and auto slumps, helping to keep American workers employed.

The U.S. had three free-trade accords when Mr. Bush took office, and his Administration has put in place 10 more. While these trading partners represent only 7.3% of world GDP, they are the destination for 42% of U.S. goods exports. Agreements with the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica and Oman have passed Congress and await implementation, while pacts have been signed with Peru and Colombia, and still others are in the works.

We don't want to sound like mercantilists here. The freer flow of imports is arguably even a more important by-product of free trade, because imports allow U.S. consumers to buy more at cheaper prices and because they make American companies more efficient and competitive. In developing countries, imports also help to disperse political power by opening up cartels and monopolies to competition.

However, the new trade "populists" in Congress like to claim that U.S. exporters are getting a raw deal from Bush trade policy. As the export facts show, the truth is precisely the opposite.

Moving Toward Greater Drug Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration is making encouraging moves to strengthen its regulation of drugs that are already on the market. But the changes fall far short of what's needed to protect millions of unsuspecting patients whose adverse effects may show up only after years of use.

The agency has traditionally focused on the drug-approval process to determine if a drug is safe and effective. Unfortunately, by that time a drug has typically been tested in only a few hundred or a few thousand patients — too few for many kinds of adverse effects to become apparent. Once the drug is being used by millions, the agency has limited powers to halt sales that begin to look risky.

Last September, the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a report decrying the big imbalance between premarketing and postmarketing regulation. The report, which had been requested by the F.D.A., made some 25 recommendations for strengthening the agency.

The F.D.A had already been moving to strengthen its safety assessments but now has developed a more comprehensive approach. One notable venture is a pilot program to assess the safety of a few breakthrough drugs about 18 months after they are marketed. The F.D.A. will collaborate with the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Medicare and Medicaid programs, and other groups to track drugs in use. It will publish results on its Web site. Such steps should greatly improve the agency's ability to monitor the use of drugs in the real world.

Even so, Congress needs to give the agency more money and more teeth: including explicit powers to impose conditions on drugs that begin to look risky, to require additional testing and even to yank drugs from the market.

Alter: No More Excuses For Bad Teachers (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

The crazy thing about the education debate in the United States is that anyone with an ounce of brains knows what must be done. Each political party is about half right. Republicans are right about the need for strict performance standards and wrong in believing that enduring change is possible without lots more money from Washington. Democrats are right about the need to pay teachers more but wrong to kiss up to teachers unions bent on preventing accountability.

As President Bush's flawed (but landmark) No Child Left Behind (NCLB) program comes up for reauthorization this year, the onus is on Democrats. Will they cave to their party's biggest special interest—or do what most of them acknowledge in private is essential? Among Democratic presidential candidates, supporting accountability with teeth and more charter schools should be a litmus test for anyone serious about proving he or she is not just another hack.

The good news is that we're getting some leadership in New York, long a bastion of mindless paleoliberalism. Gov. Eliot Spitzer unveiled his first budget last week and it offers a grand bargain on education—much more money in exchange for much more accountability—that should be a national model. Predictably, State Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, in the pocket of teachers unions, objects to Spitzer's plan to allow for more charter schools, even though thousands of low-income parents are on waiting lists to get into them. The president of the United Federation of Teachers, Randi Weingarten, called the new governor and tried to buffalo him on charters. She failed.

Spitzer seems game to fight his own party's instinct to pander. "The national Democratic Party has got to understand that real education reform is a central issue both politically and for our economic future," he told me last week. "We have to get our arms around the idea that if there's no performance, you must remove those responsible for the failure." It's a sad commentary on Democrats that they've allowed "educational accountability" to become a winning issue for the GOP.

In New York City—home to 1,400 schools, 80,000 teachers and 1.1 million students—Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg (a huge improvement over his predecessor, Rudy Giuliani) is showing what accountability means. First, he won mayoral control of the school system, a prerequisite for getting anything done in a big city. Now his tough-minded schools chancellor, Joel Klein (a Democrat), is moving forward on an important new plan to slash administrative layers and empower individual schools. The idea is to make each principal "the CEO of the school instead of an agent of the bureaucracy," Klein says. More than 300 New York principals are signing performance contracts that give them more control in exchange for being accountable. Klein means business: "If your school gets a D or an F, I'm gonna fire your ass."

A big accountability problem nationwide is teacher tenure, which is almost automatically awarded whether a teacher is good or not. If he's not, he gets to commit educational malpractice for the next 40 years. In New York, Klein wants to toughen standards for receiving tenure, and he has already succeeded in ending union "bumping rights," where lousy teachers with seniority can bump good, younger teachers and move into a school where a good principal doesn't want them. Above all, a principal must have control of who teaches in his or her building. All other reforms depend on it.

At the five-year mark, NCLB is a mixed blessing. While Bush has sharply increased federal aid to at-risk schools, he broke his 2001 funding promises. Where's the cash to attract talented teachers? But once the Democratic Congress addresses the money problem and works out some testing kinks, the real fault of NCLB will become clear: it doesn't go far enough.

It's time to move from identifying failing schools to identifying failing teachers. That sounds obvious, but until now it hasn't happened in American education. "We need a management tool that can show whether Ms. Jones can teach long division," says Margaret Spellings, Bush's sensible secretary of Education. Too many educators are still caught in what Klein calls a "culture of excuses." The excuse du jour is that NCLB is "punitive." But Spellings has a point that basic assessment is both right and popular: "I don't think parents see reliable data as punitive."

Do Democratic presidential contenders? Education Week rated Iowa and New Hampshire as having the two least-accountable state education systems in the country. Uh-oh. Let's hope the press and public are prepared to call candidates to account if they undertake a primary-season panderfest.

A Bounce For Bush (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

It's not really too surprising that George W. Bush's visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange last week marked only the second time that a sitting president had made such an appearance. (The first was Ronald Reagan in 1985.) After all, most politicians probably think it's better to be seen as a representative of the common man and Main Street than of shiny-suited financiers and Wall Street.

But Bush's big problem right now is that instead of Main Street or Wall Street, he might be more associated with Haifa Street, the lethal "street of fear" in Baghdad where U.S. and Iraqi troops fought insurgents last month. So Wall Street's not a bad alternative for an embattled president dealing with a foreign policy nightmare, especially when he can talk up what's turning out to be a vibrant economic boom. On the same day that Bush visited the NYSE and gave an upbeat speech at historic Federal Hall in Manhattan-"consumers are confident, investors are optimistic," the president declared-the Commerce Department reported that the U.S. economy grew at a snappy 3.5 percent pace in the fourth quarter of 2006. "This was a strong number," says Joel Prakken, chairman of Macroeconomic Advisers in St. Louis, "that showed the year really ended strong."

Investors agreed, pushing the Dow Jones industrials up nearly 100 points. The economy's performance was especially impressive considering that it wasn't so many weeks ago that economists were whispering that the fourth quarter might be a "one handle"-meaning growth between 1.0 and 1.9 percent. Now instead of a "hard" or "soft" landing, bearish investment pros are talking about a "growth scare" where a surprisingly robust economy would push the Federal Reserve into raising interest rates. (The Fed, in its placid statement last week, seems to be worrying less about both weak growth and rising inflation.)

The fourth-quarter spurt brings the economy full circle. Growth started fast in 2006, up 5.6 percent in the first three months of the year, but then weakened dramatically as the housing market tanked, oil prices rose sharply, and auto production slackened. Gross domestic product grew by only 2.6 percent in the second quarter and 2 percent in the third. Yet for the year, the economy expanded by 3.4 percent-better than the 3.2 percent rate in 2005 despite all those challenges.

Even though many Americans own houses worth less than they were a year ago, they continue to spend like NBA rookies after draft day. Real personal consumption expenditures-a measure of consumer strength-rose 4.4 percent in the fourth quarter. Helping consumers afford their spending habits was a 5.4 percent jump in real disposable personal income. For the year, it climbed 2.7 percent vs. 1.2 percent in 2005. The recent drop in gas prices "means that consumers had more money in their pockets than they expected," says Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner, "and they spent it." Vitner also notes that lots of those dollars went toward buying ever cheaper flat-panel televisions. "They just flew off the shelves."

Most Agree: Housing Crunch Isn't Over Yet (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Housing is proving to be one of the biggest wild cards in the economy in 2007 as analysts are deeply divided about whether the worst in the downturn is over or there is much more pain to go.

Only 9% of economists say the housing decline ended in 2006, according to a USA TODAY survey of 55 economists taken Jan. 18-24. Another 42% said the downturn will end in the first half of the year, and 45% said housing will bottom out in the second half.

"This is one of those hot-button issues," says Christopher Rupkey, chief financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi. He estimates the downturn ended last year. "I don't know why people are so pessimistic."

When housing bottoms out is key for the economy. Thus far, the fallout has been small. The economy grew at a faster pace in 2006 than in 2005 even though sales of previously owned homes fell 8.2%, the biggest drop in 17 years, the National Association of Realtors says.

But the economy may not be able to shrug off further declines, A.G. Edwards & Sons chief economist Gary Thayer says. Lower energy prices and a strong job market have thus far helped consumers weather the housing downturn. But going forward, those two factors may not be big enough to offset further weakening, Thayer says.

"Seeing things stabilize and hearing reports that housing is stabilizing is good for consumer confidence," he says.

The NAR's index of pending home sales, which is adjusted for seasonal variations, rose in December at the fastest pace since March 2004. The level of unsold homes on the market appeared to have peaked in July, the group says.

But Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says although recent housing data have been upbeat, they have been skewed by warmer-than-usual weather.

"That brought out a few more buyers and allowed for more building in the Northeast," he says. Vitner says the warm weather "pulled sales forward." Come spring, housing activity will be slower than normal, he says.

"I haven't met a home builder yet who thinks things have bottomed out," he says.

Economist Tucker Hart Adams says the housing market won't stabilize in 2007. The combination of resetting adjustable-rate mortgages, homeowners unable to keep up with payments on so-called exotic mortgages such as interest-only loans, and other debt will lead to higher foreclosure rates and more homes on the market, she says. "It's really optimistic to think that it just took a little adjustment and everything is fine," she says. "It's one time I would like to be wrong."

Renters Will Dig Deeper In 2007 (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, February 5, 2007

Renters be warned: Landlords are expected to raise apartment rents for a third-straight year in 2007, forcing tenants to turn over a growing chunk of their pay and making it harder to save for a home, a report to be issued today by Marcus & Millichap finds.

With the projected rise of 5% this year, rents would be 14% higher than at the end of 2004, the report says. Over the same period, paychecks are expected to rise 4%, adjusted for inflation.

The widening gap is likely to worsen the crisis for workforce housing, especially in coastal cities, says Hessam Nadji, a managing director at Marcus & Millichap, a real estate investment brokerage. "This is a national trend. We're seeing rents rise in the majority of markets, and we see this continuing for at least three years."

From 2000 to 2004, most landlords couldn't raise rents because so many tenants were leaving to buy houses or condos. To feed that buying frenzy, about 300,000 apartments were converted to condos for sale in the past three years. Now, even with 92,000 new rental units this year, the stock is still too little to meet rising demand.

"It's horrible. I'm going to pull my hair out," says Veronica Gonzales, 25, CEO of an event planning firm in Manhattan, where rents are expected to jump more than 7% this year, the sharpest increase in the USA. Gonzales has been hunting for six months for a place in the city for $2,000 a month. Unfortunately for Gonzales and other apartment dwellers, rents are rising because the payment gap between renting and owning remains wide. Even with this year's increase, the national median rent will be $943 a month, only 60% of the median mortgage payment of $1,566.

Renters will get a bit of a break in places such as Miami, Las Vegas and San Diego, where investors bought thousands of condos, hoping to flip them for a quick profit. Since the market faltered in late 2005, many of those condos have been empty, and investors are seeking tenants to help pay the mortgage.

Mohamed Amar bought two Las Vegas condos in 2005 that he's trying to rent. "I thought it was a good investment," says Amar. "But when I tried to put it on the market, the developer started cutting the price, and they killed everybody." Yet, even in these cities, the report says, rents will rise this year.

Democrats Expect GOP Bailout (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is watching more than two dozen House Republicans for signs they are ready to call it quits in 2008.

The Democrats believe a wave of Republican departures can help them cement their House majority.

“Democrats are on the offense and Republican seats that open up due to retirements are at the top of our bull’s-eye list,” said DCCC spokeswoman Jennifer Psaki.

Given the GOP’s new minority status in the House, Democratic strategists think some veteran Republicans will head into retirement while some younger Members will opt to run for other offices. Democrats also believe that ethics scrapes could force a handful of GOP incumbents from office.

“Being a seasoned Republican in Washington right now is like being a fifth-year senior in college whose fraternity was kicked off campus,” said one Democratic source close to the DCCC who did not want to be named. “Why would you want to stay if you can leave, make more money and avoid being in the minority?”

Even though many of the 27 districts in question are notable for their Republican tilt, House Democratic strategists, emboldened by wins in the previous cycle in Republican territory such as Kansas and close calls in GOP bastions such as Wyoming, believe they can put many open seats in play.

Of the districts that the DCCC believes could become open, only New Mexico’s 1st district, where Rep. Heather Wilson (R) eked out a 879-vote win over Democrat Patricia Madrid in November, and Delaware’s at-large district preferred Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) to President Bush in 2004. Wilson is seen as a possible Senate candidate if Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) retires next year.

Republicans argue that if Democrats are counting on picking up seats such as Louisiana’s 1st district — which gave Kerry only 29 percent of the vote, and where Rep. Bobby Jindal (R) is running for governor this year — then the GOP will take back the House in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0127181

"The National Republican Congressional Committee is optimistic about the energy, excitement and dedication of our incumbents to reclaiming the majority," spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said. "We also plan to be on offense around the country, reclaiming seats that have historically been in the Republican column.

"Wishful thinking and spin on the part of the Democrats is not going to do anything to obscure the fact that their freshmen and vulnerable are already making mistakes and casting bad votes for their districts," Boulanger added.

Democratic strategists familiar with the DCCC list obtained by Roll Call acknowledged that the likelihood that a particular Republican Member will retire, or that their party can even take advantage of a vacancy, varies greatly from district to district.

Topping the Democrats' list of pickup opportunities among potential retirees is Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.).

House Democrats made their biggest gains in the Midwest and Northeast in November and practically wiped out Republican moderates.

Castle, who suffered a minor stroke last year, may mount a Senate race if Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) vacates his seat to concentrate full time on his presidential bid. Democrats also believe the 67-year-old Republican incumbent might decide now is a good time to leave a Congress that increasingly has seen his party move to the right and become dominated by Southern conservatives.

But a spokeswoman for Castle — like aides to most of the Republicans on the DCCC's watch list — denied that her boss, who just won a ninth term, is ready to leave Washington.

"He was just appointed to the NRCC executive committee," said spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk. "It's kind of hard to say he's not going to run again when he's leading the effort to get the Republicans back in the majority."

That didn't stop the DCCC from deploying an operative to the First State last week to scout for potential candidates. The Democratic Party in Delaware is ready to target Castle, who won with 57 percent of the vote, even if he does not step down, according to a knowledgeable Democratic source.

Democrats picked up 11 House seats in the Northeast last year, and while they failed to knock off Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), they did not focus on Castle at all, which likely makes him an even more inviting target this time.

The DCCC also hopes to duplicate its success taking down Republicans caught in ethical storms. In 2006, Democrats ousted Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) and won open seats in Republican districts that had been held by indicted former GOP Reps. Bob Ney (Ohio) and Tom DeLay (Texas).

The Democrats' list demonstrates that they hope the ethics issue will play again in 2008.

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) reportedly is under FBI investigation, which has Democrats dreaming about his Inland Empire-based 42nd district, even though it gave Bush 62 percent of the vote in 2004. The same goes for the neighboring 41st district, where Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), former Appropriations Committee chairman, also is being scrutinized by federal authorities.

Both have hefty campaign bank accounts. Miller confirmed through a spokesman that he plans to seek a sixth term.

A spokesman for Lewis, Jim Specht, said: "He's never speculated this early. He's focused on what he's supposed to be doing, which is providing the best possible service to his constituents and returning the Republicans back to the majority."

While Lewis has not committed to running for re-election, Democrats acknowledge that others on their list, such as Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.), are probably long shots for retirement.

Renzi, who was held to 51 percent of the vote in November amid allegations of wrong-doing in connection with a real estate transaction, looks like someone running for re-election. Republican leaders, including House Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), are hosting a reception at the Westin Kierland Resort & Spa in Scottsdale, Ariz., on Feb. 17 to benefit Renzi.

Renzi's office did not comment for this story.

Other Republicans made the DCCC list for various reasons.

Rep. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.) seemed to invite the DCCC to come after her when she won a seventh term by barely 1,000 votes in the Equality State in November, where only 29 percent of the electorate supported Kerry in 2004. Cubin's office did not respond to telephone messages.

Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.) had to be coaxed into running for an 11th term by GOP leaders, though a Gallegly aide told Roll Call late last year that his boss would run again in 2008.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio), who will be 83 on Election Day 2008, said he hasn't formulated his plans for next term yet.

Can Republicans Count On A House Snapback? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg, Roll Call Contributing Writer

Roll Call, February 5, 2007

Most surge elections, during which one party makes sweeping gains in the House of Representatives at the expense of the opposition, have been followed by a surge back toward the other party two years later.

Will the 2006 elections produce the same snapback, with substantial Republican gains, or can Democrats minimize their losses, securing their control of the House after next year's presidential election?

The history of recent surges and snapbacks is pretty clear. In 1964, during the Democrats' anti-Goldwater surge, Democrats knocked off 39 GOP incumbents and won eight Republican open seats. Two years later, the Republicans snapped back, defeating 39 Democratic incumbents.

The wave that accompanied Ronald Reagan's presidential victory in 1980, which ousted 27 Democratic officeholders and secured 10 Democratic open seats for the GOP, beget 1982, when 22 GOP incumbents were bounced from office. And the wave against President Bill Clinton in 1994, which took down 34 Democratic House Members and turned a stunning 22 Democratic open seats red, produced 1996, when 18 GOP incumbents lost bids for re-election.

Snapbacks are not inevitable, of course. In the Watergate year of 1974, Democrats knocked off 36 Republican House Members seeking re-election and seized 13 GOP open seats, and two years later the parties lost almost equal numbers of incumbents (seven Democrats and five Republicans). Republican seats that went Democratic because of Watergate generally stayed that way for at least a couple of elections.

In November, Democrats knocked off 22 GOP incumbents and added eight Republican open seats. That means that the number of Republican incumbents defeated in their bids for re-election in 2006, while substantial, was below (and in some cases well below) the number of incumbents defeated in earlier waves.

In the three snapback elections mentioned above, the party that lost a large number of incumbents one year knocked off at least half as many of the opposition's incumbents two years later. Sometimes the snapback was even stronger, as in 1964 and 1966, when equal numbers of incumbents lost in consecutive elections.

But none of the examples noted above is exactly replicated in the scenario for 2006 and 2008. Both the 1964 and 1980 waves occurred in presidential years, which meant that the snapbacks occurred during a midterm election. The 2006 wave occurred in a midterm year, and any snapback, if there is one, would take place in a presidential year.

One wave/snapback sequence — 1994 and 1996 — did occur in a midterm election, followed by a presidential year. But 1994 was Clinton's first midterm election, while 2006 was President Bush's second, and that's a significant difference for many reasons. For instance, Clinton was able to run again and remake himself after only two years in office.

Moreover, the Iraq War was crucial in contributing to the formation of a Democratic wave in 2006, creating an environment that is unique in the recent history of surges.

The war could continue to pose problems for the Republicans in 2008, and if so, that would minimize the chances of a snapback. Even though Bush will not be on the ballot in 2008, he still could be a factor that undercuts the appeal of his party and enhances Democratic prospects up and down the ballot. If independents continue to reject the GOP, Republican candidates will have a hard time reclaiming districts that they lost last year.

The possibility of a GOP snapback also is minimized by the nature of the '06 wave. Almost half of the districts that turned from Republican to Democratic are either competitive or Democratic-leaning, and as long as the freshman Democrats in those districts don't stumble badly, history suggests that they will be difficult to dislodge.

Former Republican Congressmen Charles Bass (N.H.), Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Gil Gutknecht (Minn.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Jim Leach (Iowa), Anne Northup (Ky.), Rob Simmons (Conn.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.) didn't lose because they were terrible candidates. They lost because they were in marginal seats or in districts carried by Al Gore in 2000 and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004. It will be very difficult (though obviously not impossible) for the GOP to retake those districts, even if former Members run again for their former seats.

It also seems unlikely that GOP open seats that went Democratic in November in Iowa, Colorado, New York and Arizona suddenly will snapback to the Republicans.

So where are snapbacks most likely?

Republican chances of reclaiming seats lost in 2006 undoubtedly are strongest in fundamentally Republican and conservative districts. That means that Democratic House freshmen such as Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Nick Lampson (Texas), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and possibly Jerry McNerney (Calif.) are at greatest risk.

In addition, a couple of Democratic incumbents who almost lost despite the strong wind at their backs — Georgia Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall — surely have to consider themselves at considerable risk.

Obviously, the presidential contest will have a strong impact on the election year, as will the Democratic Congress' performance, party fundraising, candidate recruitment and retirements. We won't know for months which party will have the edge in House races in 2008, but it's likely that divided government will make it difficult to oust incumbents — and that should improve Democrats' chances of maintaining their House majority in next year's elections.

Eighty Percent In GOP See Return To Majority (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0127183

By Susan Davis
Roll Call, February 5, 2007

A wide-ranging survey conducted recently by Rep. Scott Garrett's (R-N.J.) office provides a glimpse into the overall mood of the House's 202 Republican lawmakers now serving in the minority. The seven-page document was hand distributed to Congressional offices Jan. 17, and responses were culled and presented at the annual GOP retreat at the end of January.

Roll Call obtained a copy of the original survey last week, prompting Garrett's office to agree to review the results of the poll Friday. Sixty-one Members, or 30 percent of the Republican Conference, responded to the questionnaire. All responses were anonymous.

The most overwhelming response was that more than 80 percent of respondents said they believed the GOP could win a majority in the 2008 elections.

Members also were asked to rate the issues that resulted in Republicans losing the House on Election Day, and the overwhelming majority said that the ongoing Iraq War, federal spending issues, and the scandals surrounding former GOP Reps. Duke Cunningham (Calif.) and Mark Foley (Fla.) were the dominant reasons. "Nothing else was close," said Garrett's spokesman, Will Holley.

In fact, social issues were at the very bottom of the scale. For instance, the survey listed Congress' intervention into the case of Terri Schiavo in 2005, which received one of the lowest rankings in the survey. "I barely got anything, it was really low," added Chief of Staff Michelle Presson. "Social issues actually were pretty low overall; people were definitely more interested in the fiscal side."

Another question asked of Members was whether the GOP was better served in the minority by working with Democrats to get things done, or to fight back and attack their agenda. Not surprisingly, more senior Members leaned toward compromise, while the younger Members leaned toward battle. "There's a generational split on that, definitely the younger Members are not going to sit tight," Presson said.

Additionally, Members were asked whether they should pursue a conservative or more moderate legislative agenda, and a "large majority" said a conservative agenda, Holley said.

In line with that, a majority of Members who responded also identified themselves as on the "more conservative end of the spectrum," Presson said.

Those responses are tied to a broad feeling within the Conference that they need to fight Democrats, particularly on fiscal and spending issues. Garrett's office said that already is starting to play out on the House floor in debates over the $463.5 billion fiscal 2007 spending bill. While GOP leaders and Appropriations ranking member Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) voted against and urged a "no" vote on the bill, 57 Republicans sided with Democrats.

On the other side of the aisle, Republicans said Democrats' use of outside groups aligned with their party and a message that touched on many of the GOP's long-standing identifiers helped seal the GOP's defeat.

Holley noted that groups such as MoveOn.org were in districts like defeated Rep. Chris Chocola's (R-Ind.) six months before Election Day. Left-leaning groups "went out early, they started to chip away, and then the [Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee] came in and finished it up," Presson said.

When asked what Democrats were credited for doing right, Presson said, "They stole our ideas, they ran as Republicans." Presson pointed to candidacies such as Sen. Bob Casey (Pa.), a pro-life, pro-gun Democrat who defeated Sen. Rick Santorum (R).

"They finally woke up to the fact that you have to accept some people who may not believe in everything you believe in," she said. "The question is: How long can they afford to have those people, one, not back in their districts and, two, voting on things that play really well with the Democratic base but not with the independent voters that put them in office?"

Garrett, a Member of the Republican Policy Committee, was given the green light to conduct the survey by RPC Chairman Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.). His office said it was undecided if these pulse-check surveys would become a routine matter for the Conference.

Cole: NRCC Will Sit Out Primaries (RC)

By David M. Drucker
Roll Call, February 5, 2007

The National Republican Congressional Committee will not take sides in any House GOP primaries this cycle, NRCC Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) said in an interview Friday.

Cole also said that he will refrain from doling out personal endorsements and campaign contributions in primaries while he is chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0127184

Cole's decision partly is due to the wishes of House Republicans, who in a recent closed-door meeting were fairly unified — and vocal — in their desire that the NRCC avoid playing kingmaker in contested primaries. But Cole also attributed his policy to a belief that candidates who navigate a primary without help or anointing from Washington, D.C., insiders emerge battle-tested for the general election and in a better position to secure the support of grass-roots Republicans.

Cole said he will not be endorsing any primary candidates as the 4th district Representative from Oklahoma because he believes his job as NRCC chairman doesn't allow for a distinction — and because such a move could be interpreted as a de facto endorsement by the committee.

"We're not going to be in primary situations. Our membership has made it pretty clear that they don't want us to do that," Cole said. He added: "There were a number of primaries I was in last cycle because of personal relationships. I don't have that luxury this time."

Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC chairman in the 2004 and 2006 cycles, took a slightly different view. During his tenure at the committee, the NRCC openly involved itself in at least one key primary, with Reynolds bestowing his personal endorsement on a primary candidate in an open or Democratic-held seat at least twice.

Reynolds' record on this front was mixed — and his moves angered some Members of the House Republican Conference. But some Republicans believe he was right on strategy, and say Cole must allow himself the same flexibility if the GOP is to have a shot at regaining the majority.

"If you seriously want to attempt to take the House back, you want to ensure the best candidate possible is running," said one Republican operative with experience running House races. "You can't do that if you're afraid of taking a risk."

Typically, the four Congressional campaign committees don't endorse in primaries as a general rule, though each cycle usually brings with it a few exceptions. It also is common for the committees to work behind the scenes on behalf of their preferred candidates, while maintaining an air of public neutrality.

In the previous cycle, the NRCC openly jumped into the primary in Arizona's 8th district, where staunch conservative Randy Graf was battling three moderate Republicans who were seen as a better philosophical fit for the moderate GOP seat and better positioned to beat the Democratic nominee in the general election.

The NRCC, believing Graf couldn't beat likely (and eventual) Democratic nominee Gabrielle Giffords, backed then-state Rep. Steve Huffman in the GOP primary. The NRCC spent money on independent expenditure advertising in an effort to aid Huffman, only to see him lose to Graf anyway.

Some Republicans believe this early pre-primary rebuke by the NRCC left Graf crippled in the general election, with almost no chance of beating Giffords, who went on to win handily. Had the committee refrained from playing in the primary, some critics say, Graf might have been able to beat her.

Still, Reynolds' strategy was successful elsewhere.

In 2004, in his capacity as the Congressman from the 26th district of New York, Reynolds personally endorsed now-Rep. Charlie Dent (R) in Pennsylvania's 15th district. Dent defeated two other primary challengers, winning 51 percent of the vote, and went on to win the open seat in the general election.

Last year, Reynolds personally endorsed Iraq War veteran Van Taylor in Texas' 17th district GOP primary. Taylor was seen as the most attractive candidate to take on incumbent Rep. Chet Edwards (D) in the solidly Republican district.

But after beating former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson in the primary, Taylor was beaten handily by Edwards in the general election.

Cole, a political consultant by trade before ascending to Congress in 2002, maintained that he is very unlikely to deviate from his vow to stay out of primary contests. However, there are exceptions.

If a GOP primary included a Republican candidate who is a racist or an anti-Semite, or exhibits other qualities that are extremely anathema to the values of the Republican Party, the committee would move to aid that candidate's opponent, Cole said.

Also, should a Republican incumbent draw a token primary challenger who is not in any real position to win the nomination, the NRCC will not sit on its hands and wait until after the primary contest to work on behalf of the incumbent's re-election. In the case where an incumbent Member attracts a serious challenger, those situations will be handled on a case-by-case basis.

"We will monitor races we think are important, but will not try and affect the outcome," Cole said. "We're really not in the game of picking winners and losers."

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007
Madame front-runner

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has a definite lead among 10 Democratic hopefuls in the 2008 presidential race, according to the American Research Group, which polled 600 Democratic and independent likely voters in both Iowa and New Hampshire on Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. Mrs. Clinton is favored by 35 percent of Iowans and 39 percent of New Hampshire respondents -- compared with 18 percent and 13 percent in each state, respectively, who favored John Edwards.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois mustered 14 percent and 19 percent, "undecided" was cited by 13 percent and 21 percent, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack 12 percent and 1 percent. The rest, including Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, only managed to garner the favor of between 1 percent and 2 percent of the respondents in both states, the survey found. It has a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points.

Nader raiding

Republican strategists can count on it: Democrats may strut their stuff on Capitol Hill, but still quibble among themselves. Asked his opinion of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader got crabby, indeed.

"I don't think she has the fortitude. Actually, she's really a panderer and a flatterer. As she goes around the country, you'll see more of that," Mr. Nader told CNN yesterday. "I think her main problem may well be right in New York City, [Mayor] Michael Bloomberg."

"You like Bloomberg?" asked anchorman Wolf Blitzer.

"I'm saying he'll give more diversity for sure, and he'll focus on urban problems," Mr. Nader replied, noting that he would never vote for Mrs. Clinton and is partial to Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich.

"We have got a money horse race now," Mr. Nader said. "The press and the polls are gravitating on cash-register politics as if there's a bar graph to see who's going to raise the $100 million or $200 million, [Senator John] McCain or [Senator Barack] Obama or Hillary. That's very unhealthy. That's rancid politics."

Still right-of-center

Sen. John McCain says it's only Washington insiders who think his 2008 presidential bid is in trouble because he supports President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

"I think there's that, maybe, perception inside the Beltway. But outside, a lot of Republicans are rallying to this belief that we need to have a strategy that can win and realize the consequences of failure," the Arizona Republican told ABC yesterday.

"Many people trust my judgment because they've known me for many years," he said. "I think we're doing just fine, and I think polls indicate that. We're still a right-of-center party. This nation is still a right-of-center nation. And I believe the Democrats are the left-of-center party. So, do we need to make significant adjustments, learn the lessons of the 2006 election? Absolutely."

The 'owe' factor

"A key supporter of Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support," wrote Ben Smith of the Politico.com yesterday.

The comments were made by Illinois state Senate President Emil Jones during the Democratic National Committee's black caucus at the Washington Hilton this weekend and "angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists," according to Mr. Smith.

Mr. Jones asked his audience, "How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" and later implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel and drag down a successful member of their community."

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant, told Politico, "The heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats. The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton."

Snow no-show

American Spectator senior editor Quin Hillyer thinks Tony Snow should consider a run for the U.S. Senate. Yes, that Tony Snow, White House spokesman.

"Conservatives have been desperately searching for a champion who knows how to communicate, how to engage and inspire the public, ever since Ronald Reagan left the scene. What has been missing in the interim is not merely some acquired skill or a trick of communicating, but a communications talent that is married to a genuine, heartfelt, long-developed set of beliefs. It's the marriage of communication with philosophy that is needed; one without the other won't do. Snow is clearly genuine," Mr. Hillyer wrote in a Jan. 31 column.

"Is this, then, an endorsement of Tony Snow for president in 2008? Not exactly. But it is a suggestion that Snow has a great deal of the 'right stuff' for which conservatives have been looking, perhaps enough of the right stuff to make the idea worth pondering for 2012 or even 2016 (he's only 51 right now).

"If Snow can't exactly pull off a race for president in 2008, there is another public office he ought to consider. Virginia's senior U.S. Sen. John W. Warner will be just shy of 82 when the next election rolls around."

DOJ_NMG_0127186

The notion piqued the interest of U.S. News & World Report's Paul Bedard, who went right to the source yesterday, asking Mr. Snow if he intended to pursue office.

"I am absolutely Shermanesque," came the reply. "After this job, the best I am likely ever to have, I'm going to do something that will enable me to spend much more time with the family."

Tough choices

Retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor left the Supreme Court because of her ailing husband, not because she was ready to retire, according to Newsweek. She had once planned to follow the tradition of previous justices, who work until they drop, essentially.

"Most of them get ill and are really in bad shape, which I would've done at the end of the day myself, I suppose, except my husband was ill and I needed to take action," she said.

Mrs. O'Connor, 76, currently divides her time between Washington and Arizona, where she cares for her husband, John, who has Alzheimer's and now resides in a Phoenix care center. She still has an office at the Supreme Court, still draws a salary and fills in as a federal judge. She also recently served on the 10-member bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

"I wasn't sure I should do it. It was so out of my field of judging. I don't know anything about the military," Mrs. O'Connor said, though she wouldn't weigh in on President Bush's rejection of the group's suggestions for a gradual withdrawal of troops.

"There are probably no perfect answers," she said.

Born Again Supply-Sider? (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Sen. John McCain, who echoed Teddy Kennedy on taxes when he ran for president in 2000, sounds more like Jack Kemp as a 2008 candidate. "I've never voted for a tax increase in 24 years," he told me last week. "Never, ever, not under any president, including President Reagan, and I will never vote for a tax increase, nor support a tax increase."

He wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent. ("If I didn't vote to make those tax cuts permanent, it would have the effect of a tax increase.") He supports radically scaling back the estate tax and does not now favor upper-income increases in the Social Security tax. McCain gets tax policy advice from conservatives, including supply-side founding father Arthur Laffer. "I may have changed some of my views," the senator said. "You learn over 24 years."

Thus, McCain passes the Republican tax litmus test, as he did not in 2000. That may be why McCain has lost liberal journalists and other non-Republicans entranced by his campaign against George W. Bush. McCain pained these former admirers by making peace with Jerry Falwell and advocating more troops in Iraq, but it is his current position on taxes that most aggravates them.

In an Iowa presidential debate on Jan. 15, 2000, he confronted Gov. Bush: "Your tax plan has 36 percent of it going to the richest 1 percent in America. . . . I think that we ought to give the tax relief to the people who need it most." In 2001, he broke party ranks to oppose President Bush's tax cut. Interviewed by Stephen Moore of the Wall Street Journal in November 2005, he preached class warfare in defending that vote: "I just thought [Bush's tax cut] was too tilted to the wealthy, and I still do. . . . We have a wealth gap in this country, and that worries me."

In contrast, McCain told me he voted against the Bush tax cut "because of my concerns with no commensurate restraint in spending." He said, "We are all happy with results of the tax cuts as far as revenues are concerned, and they have been justified." He added, "I am glad the tax cuts had the effect they did." So did McCain regret voting no? "I can't tell you that I cast exactly right votes over the years."

McCain sounded most like Kemp when he told me: "I want everyone to be rich. I worry about inequities. I think that corporate greed is hurting their image. But trying to enact some kind of legislation that would take money from the rich and give it to the poor, that's just out of the question."

He has not yet joined his confidant, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), in wanting to raise the cap on taxable income -- taxing the rich -- as part of general Social Security reform: "I have not taken any position that would either increase taxes or raise the cap." McCain's economic policy chairman is Douglas J. Holtz-Eakin, former head of the Congressional Budget Office. The senator has reached out to California financier Gerald Parsky, a former assistant Treasury secretary described by McCain as "very important to me." That was also how he labelled Laffer, who has been counseling him the past year. McCain's longtime political ally, former Texas senator Phil Gramm, advises him frequently. While McCain conceded disagreement among them, "the people that advise me, I guarantee, are very conservative economists."

It is difficult to measure how much the transformation of McCain from taxer to tax-cutter has contributed to his fading popularity among Washington's media elite, but the romance is gone. The change, however, has not boosted McCain's stock in Congress, particularly the House. Conservatives justifiably complain about his positions on global warming and campaign finance. But McCain was fighting congressional earmarks before it was popular, and that has antagonized Republicans. So do comments like the ones he made to me that Republicans "have spent more and increased the size of government more than at any time since the Great Society." Passing the litmus test on taxes will not make McCain popular with the House GOP elite.

McCain Calls New Advisers 'Good People' (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Senator John McCain said Sunday that several aides brought on to his presidential campaign were "good people," despite his own past criticisms of their work for others in the past.

Appearing on "This Week" on ABC, Mr. McCain was asked about a front-page article in The New York Times on Sunday noting that Mr. McCain's political team includes advisers who tried to skewer him in the 2000 primary against George W. Bush. And Mr. McCain has brought on members of the team that produced the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement in 2004 questioning the Vietnam War service record of Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, which Mr. McCain had criticized.

"These are good people who were doing as they were instructed," Mr. McCain said Sunday. "They are people who shape the message, don't dictate it."

Asked whether, as The Times reported, the hirings suggested that Mr. McCain would be "running a different kind of campaign this time around," he said: "Am I going to respond to a negative attack if there is one? Obviously, I would do so, but I hope we would do so in an honorable fashion. We will run an honorable campaign."

Edwards' Health Care Plan Includes Taxes (AP)

AP, February 5, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Sunday his plan for universal health care would require higher taxes and cost up to $120 billion year.

"The bottom line is we're asking everybody to share in the responsibility of making health care work in this country. Employers, those who are in the medical insurance business, employees, the American people — everyone will have to contribute in order to make this work," the 2004 vice presidential nominee said.

"Yes, we'll have to raise taxes. The only way you can pay for a health care plan that costs anywhere from $90 (billion) to $120 billion is there has to be a revenue source," the former North Carolina senator said.

Edwards said his plan would aim to provide health care coverage for the 47 million people who currently lack it and reduce the cost of health care coverage for middle-class families, partly by making health care programs more efficient.

Edwards cited health care insurance premiums that he said have risen 90 percent over the past decade.

"We want to make sure everybody's covered. We want to help middle-class families with the costs. We want to try to create competition that doesn't exist today," he said.

To accomplish all this, Edwards said he would expand Medicaid and a program that now provides coverage to 6 million people, mostly children, and provide federal health care subsidies. He said he wants employers to play a bigger role, either by offering coverage or buying into "health markets" that would include a government plan.

Edwards said he would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes.

On the war in Iraq, Edwards sought to distinguish himself from one of the Democratic front-runners, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Edwards, who served on the Senate's intelligence committee, repeated earlier statements that his vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq was a mistake.

"My vote was wrong and I take responsibility for it," said Edwards.

He added, "I think anybody who wants to be president of the United States has got to be honest and open, be willing to admit when they've done things wrong."

Clinton, who also voted to authorize force, has said "there are no do-overs in life." She says Congress received bad information from the Bush administration going into the vote and she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

"If she believes that her vote was wrong, then yes, she should say so," Edwards said. "If she believes that her vote was right, then she should defend it."

Edwards appeared on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

Edwards Again Says He Was Wrong To Vote For War (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0127188

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Of the 2008 Democratic presidential contenders who voted to give President Bush authority to wage war in Iraq, only one will have no chance to make a very public U-turn when resolutions opposing the president's new war plan come before Congress in the coming days.

That one is John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator who showed again yesterday that he will find other venues to parlay his Senate vote into an extended mea culpa.

Edwards began drawing attention to his vote in fall 2005, writing an op-ed piece in The Washington Post that began with: "I was wrong."

The soul-searching continued yesterday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"It wasn't just the weapons of mass destruction I was wrong about," Edwards said. "It's become absolutely clear -- and I'm very critical of myself for this -- become absolutely clear, looking back, that I should not have given the president this authority."

Edwards's nationally televised admission was just the start of a lengthy public dissection of the errors he said he made in casting the most important vote of his Senate tenure.

Some believe that kind of introspection has helped Edwards build a bridge to the most vocal anti-Iraq-war quarters of the Democratic Party and may help distinguish him from one of his chief rivals for the party's nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.).

During yesterday's broadcast, Edwards said he believes that "anybody who wants to be president of the United States has got to be honest and open, be willing to admit when they've done things wrong."

"If she believes that her vote was wrong," Edwards said when asked about Clinton, "then, yes, she should say so. If she believes her vote was right, then she should defend it."

Clinton has not retracted her vote to authorize the war, saying "there are no do-overs in life." But she has made no secret of her distaste for the war.

On Friday, she defended her support for a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq but also said she is ready to press for tougher action.

"John Edwards is fully aware that Senator Clinton has been a strong and consistent critic of the war and has taken responsibility for her vote," said Phil Singer, a Clinton campaign spokesman. "Instead of attacking the character of fellow Democrats, she is working to stop President Bush's escalation and bring an end to the war."

Edwards's apologies have earned him respect in some quarters of the antiwar movement.

Tim Carpenter, national director of Progressive Democrats of America, said in a recent interview that he believes many in that camp "have really reacted to some very strong statements [by Edwards] on the war. What he has shown is a capacity to grow and to learn."

Darcy Scott Martin, who runs the antiwar True Majority Action PAC, said yesterday that she can sense candidates are "searching for a level of credibility" on the war.

"It's pretty clear," she said, "that antiwar people don't really have a candidate yet. And he's trying to capture those people."

One candidate who will not have to develop a strategy to justify early backing of the Iraq war is Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who expressed strong opposition while still a state senator in Illinois. Russert asked Edwards whether Democratic voters would say, "On the big issue of the war, Obama was right, Edwards was wrong."

"I was wrong," Edwards replied, but he added that voters should also consider "who has the depth, the maturity, the judgment to be president of the United States."

During the interview, Edwards also gave new details of his plan for universal health care, which he said would require new taxes.

He said he would propose spending $90 billion to $120 billion a year to expand Medicaid, provide subsidies for people who lack coverage, ask employers to take on additional coverage needs and create what he called "health markets" around the country to create some efficiencies.

"Yes, we will have to raise taxes," he said. That would start, he added, by repealing the tax cuts introduced by Bush during his first term.

Familiar Face, But A New Tone (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — John Edwards has no intention of getting lost in the shuffle.

DOJ_NMG_0127189

Faced with what he always knew would be a tough race against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination and now the challenge of convincing his party that he is also a better alternative than Senator Barack Obama, Mr. Edwards is trying to muscle his way past them and the rest of the field, in part by staking out early and provocative positions on the big issues.

On the war in Iraq, Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, not only came out for a complete withdrawal within 12 to 18 months, but he also challenged his Democratic rivals who are still in government to confront President Bush more directly. And on Monday, Mr. Edwards will set out a plan to provide health insurance to the 46.6 million Americans who do not have it, stealing a march on Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats on what is shaping up to be one of the biggest domestic issues of the presidential race.

Appearing on "Meet the Press" on NBC on Sunday, Mr. Edwards said he would raise taxes on people making more than $200,000 a year to help pay for the plan, which he estimated could cost up to $120 billion a year.

Mr. Edwards, his party's nominee for vice president in 2004, has taken on a sharper tone since that campaign ended in defeat.

He is campaigning as a harder-edged economic populist now, which he says represents more a change in tone than in substance. He says he is both more electable and more authentic than Mrs. Clinton, and more experienced than Mr. Obama.

The rapid emergence of Mr. Obama has scrambled the Democratic field in a way that poses a particular challenge for Mr. Edwards. He now faces intense competition for the role of fresh-faced change agent. His appeal to voters who feel disenfranchised by the economy and aggrieved by the war must now carry over the similar message being developed by Mr. Obama.

But in the battle to be the most credible alternative to Mrs. Clinton in the Democratic primaries, Mr. Edwards has built some early advantages.

He has avidly pursued labor support, marching on picket lines in Miami, Las Vegas and Chicago, pushing for state minimum wage increases and speaking at union conventions. He is offering proposals on the war, health care and the environment that are more audacious and more specific than those of his rivals.

His efforts have paid substantial dividends. He leads in early polls in Iowa and is near the top in New Hampshire surveys. He is ahead of his principal rivals in organizing in the two new early caucus and primary states of Nevada and South Carolina. He has a solid financing base in trial lawyers and antiwar Internet activists, high name recognition and experience on the campaign trail.

Mr. Edwards acknowledged that he was running as a very different candidate this time. He said he had grown and matured and learned from his mistakes, and has told friends that he really was not ready to run for president in 2004. He has spent the past two years directing a poverty center at the University of North Carolina and traveling the country and world to learn about the problems that will confront the next president. He said he had learned more in the past two years, a period that included the recuperation of his wife, Elizabeth, from a life-threatening encounter with breast cancer, than in his six years in the Senate.

"I, like all of you, have evolved," Mr. Edwards said last week to a sizeable crowd at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H. "It is not enough to do small things. Baby steps and incremental change are not enough. We need transformational change."

Mr. Edwards said such change would involve considerable sacrifice by Americans who can afford it, in the form of higher taxes for the wealthy to pay for health care for those who do not have it now and voluntary reductions in the use of fossil fuels to address global warming. He said the nation had more important priorities than balancing the federal budget.

He has clearly migrated to the left in the past several years. He has repudiated his 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq and has called on Mrs. Clinton to do the same. He said nonbinding resolutions on the war, like those supported by Senators Clinton and Obama, were meaningless.

Some critics and aides to rival candidates say all of this is nothing more than an opportunistic rebranding to attract labor and Internet support to mount a viable primary challenge to Mrs. Clinton and the unexpected threat from Mr. Obama.

Others say that though Mr. Edwards is a credible contender, like anyone running an insurgency against the establishment candidate, he will not be able to fall back on the top-tier institutional and financial support that will rescue Mrs. Clinton if she should stumble in the early states where Mr. Edwards appears strongest.

"He has a distinguishing message, he has deep committed organizational help as a result of the work he's done both with unions and other groups around the country, and he's leading in Iowa," said John D. Podesta, who served as chief of staff in the Clinton White House and is now an adviser to Mrs. Clinton. Despite all that, Mr. Podesta said, Mr. Edwards will have trouble overcoming Mrs. Clinton's broad and deep support.

Mr. Podesta cited the example of Gary Hart in 1984, who ran as a progressive alternative to the establishment candidate, former Vice President Walter Mondale. "He couldn't convert his early strength into the nomination," Mr. Podesta said. "There was enough time and enough influence by the party elites to backstop Mondale when he took some early blows."

The John Edwards of the 2004 campaign is still recognizable today: the youthful face, the story of the son of the mill worker who made good as a trial lawyer fighting for the wronged against the powerful.

But his campaign voice is different, at times angry and more impatient. He said that in his last campaign he was handicapped first by his inexperience as a national candidate, and then by his subordinate role as Mr. Kerry's vice presidential nominee. He said that this time he was more seasoned and unshackled, which he believes gives him advantages over his two most prominent rivals, Senators Clinton and Obama.

Americans assume they know Mrs. Clinton, he said, "But what is unknowable is what will happen during the course of the campaign, what it will reveal about the character, the integrity, the decency of the candidates involved." He said that Mr. Obama had no idea what was about to hit him. "The intense spotlight of a national campaign is an experience that is unique for any American," Mr. Edwards said. "You may think you know what it's like, but if you haven't been through it, you don't."

He said he had seen the impact of free trade on workers in the United States and abroad and now doubted whether he would again support permanent normal trade relations with China, which he voted for as a senator. He said he probably would support the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act again, but would demand stronger protections for domestic civil liberties.

He displayed another difference from 2004 at the meeting at Dartmouth last week. A student asked him whether he would support a law allowing for full marriage benefits for gay men and lesbians.

He said he had grown up as a Southern Baptist in a conservative small town and was torn by the concept of same-sex marriage. "I'll admit I'm personally conflicted about these issues," he said. "I am not personally for gay marriage, but it troubles me that I'd use my own experience as the basis for a policy decision." He said that while he opposed same-sex marriage, he supported civil unions for gay couples and all anti-discrimination laws.

Mr. Edwards said later that had he been asked the same question in 2004, "I would have finessed it and given a formulaic answer." He added, "I just find it easier to be more candid now."

Mr. Edwards and his aides are counting on the work of the past two years to help overcome his biggest challenges. He has hired a new campaign manager, David E. Bonior, former Democratic representative of Michigan and an unreconstructed pro-labor liberal, and is hoping for organizational help, if not endorsements, from politically active unions. Mr. Edwards makes a point of greeting bartenders, kitchen workers and hotel clerks at all his campaign stops.

Anna Burger, secretary-treasurer of the Service Employees International Union, which has 1.8 million members, said the union would not necessarily endorse a candidate in the Democratic primary, but she spoke warmly of Mr. Edwards.

"He's been in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago and Boston talking to hotel workers," Ms. Burger said. "He believes deeply in the rights of working people."

What is unknown is how he, and all the other contenders, will stand up under a full year of scrutiny in a primary process that began earlier and promises to be more intense than ever.

"Now that," Mr. Edwards said as he and his wife flew to New York to raise money from a passel of Wall Street barons at the Regency Hotel, "is a good question. But we've been through it before."

Fineman: Dem Candidates Come Out Swinging (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

John Edwards played defensive back in high school, and waiting offstage to speak, he looked eager to get onto the field and hit someone. That is what he did (rhetorically) in the first scrimmage of the 2008 presidential campaign last Friday. Speaking to the Democratic National Committee after Sen. Barack Obama and before Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, he accused Senate Democrats (that is, Obama and Clinton) of caving in to President Bush's Iraq escalation policy. Democrats had to use all their "vigor and tools and strength" to block the surge and begin a withdrawal. "Americans are counting on us not to be weak, political and careful," he said. "It's time for political courage."

Isn't it a little early to start calling your opponents cowards, even if you don't do it by name? Not this time: nasty is in season already. One reason is the insane money scramble, which literally raises the stakes. And with such a demographically diverse field, chances for emotional collisions abound. When Sen. Joe Biden called Obama "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Hillary's minions didn't focus on Biden; they focused on Obama, who was accused by some black leaders of not being indignant enough on behalf of his own racial heritage.

But the real flash point is Iraq. Hillary's idea of threatening to pull support for the Iraqi government would produce "nothing but disaster," Biden told The New York Observer. He was equally critical of Edwards's plan to call home 40,000 troops now.

Senators are bumping into each other as they move left. Sen. Chris Dodd says Democrats should stage a new "authorizing" vote on the war itself. "The original justifications are gone—discredited," he told me. Obama unveiled his own Iraq plan, which sets a March 31, 2008, deadline for removing all American troops unless the Iraqi government meets tough conditions.

Going "negative" on the war is tricky for Obama, who says he wants to walk the high road. At the DNC, he hushed the crowd with a sermon about how politics should not be "blood sport." But his campaign brags that he was "alone among the candidates in opposing the Iraq war" from the start, and in his speech he proclaimed that he was "opposed to this invasion publicly, frequently and before it began." No blood, but a sharp jab.

Edwards embodies the darker tone. In a hotel "holding room" after the DNC meeting, he was a tougher, more combative character than the one I had met eight years ago. Now you see the Dennis Quaid grin less often. "I've grown up," he said with a shrug.

And he brims with what seems like resentment at Democrats who won't support national health insurance right now (take that, Hillary) or who "talk about labor's concerns only in front of union audiences" (take that, Obama). "I want people to know exactly what I stand for." That sounds like an obvious enough game plan, but it is one he didn't have when he took the field four years ago.

Obama Confronts 'Outsider' Dilemma (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

In the nearly three weeks since Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) made his unofficial debut as a presidential candidate, his senior advisers have been holed up in a temporary office on Connecticut Avenue NW, feverishly working to translate the huge excitement about his candidacy into a political strategy.

For all the buzz about his running, Obama did not enter the race with the conventional weapons of a presidential candidate -- a deep database of donors, a tactical road map for winning primaries or even a sign marking the entrance to his ad hoc campaign headquarters. Obama is only now starting to build a political infrastructure that matches his growing support.

But the challenge for Obama is not just assembling the nuts and bolts of a national campaign on the fly. He must, his advisers believe, do so in a way that reflects the distinct, next-generation message of his candidacy, or at least avoids making him look like every other politician in the race. "I would sooner lose the race than lose having him the way he is," said David Axelrod, his chief media strategist.

While acknowledging that there are "certain immutable realities of the process," Axelrod insisted that "the kind of things we do over time will be emblematic of the campaign that we're running. And if we are doing it right, they won't be identical to everyone else's."

That vague mission -- not unlike the one that faced both Howard Dean and retired Gen. Wesley K. Clark as relative outsiders who came late to the 2004 presidential race -- is in the hands of a growing group of respected, if not exactly unconventional, operatives who have had to spend an inordinate amount of time in the past few weeks simply mastering logistics. Led by David Plouffe, the campaign manager, the team spent the day of Obama's exploratory-committee announcement answering phones and taking down volunteers' phone numbers.

Now the advisers are beginning to implement a broader strategy. In contrast to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who spent the first two weeks of her official candidacy trying to project strength and inevitability, Obama will seek a more pared-down image that focuses on the substance of his message ("the audacity of hope," as his book title put it) rather than on proving his ability to win a general election.

Obama gave a glimpse of how his campaign will look and feel on Friday, when he delivered somber remarks at the Democratic National Committee meeting that left the audience hushed at points. No one passed out "Obama" posters; the candidate took the stage without any music, unlike some other Democratic contenders who bounded to the dais to the blaring sounds of rock-and-roll oldies.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope," Obama told the crowd. "They say, 'Well, we want specifics, we want details, and we want white papers, and we want plans.' We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope. And over the next year, over the next two years, that will be my call to you."

From Washington, Obama headed to Fairfax for an event that his advisers said illustrated his campaign strategy even more directly: a student rally organized through the online networking site Facebook.com. Thousands of students attended the Web-driven event at George Mason University -- evidence, the Obama campaign said, that the popularity of its candidate will spread virally through the electorate rather than as a result of paid television ads or campaign mailings.

"Our campaign will never be the most rigid, structured, top-down, corporate-type campaign in this nomination battle," said senior Obama adviser Robert Gibbs. "There are plenty of other people that can do 'politics as usual' far better than we can. But I hope we have a campaign whose support continues to expand even faster than you can put a fence around it."

Matt Bennett, a senior adviser to the Clark campaign in 2004, described the phenomenon as trying to "ride a tiger."

"It's the toughest thing to do in presidential politics, which is to walk the line between maintaining your genuine attractiveness to the grass roots and becoming a credible national candidate, because often those things are in direct conflict," he said. "He is the candidate that is exciting this huge mass of people, and he cannot let them down in a fundamental way. But he has also got to do the blocking and tackling that candidates do."

To that end, the Obama campaign spent the weekend moving its headquarters to Chicago (far away, they note, from the sprawling Clinton offices on K Street) and organizing Obama's official campaign debut this Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

And they are already bumping up against the realities of riding his booming grass-roots support while obeying the conventions of running for president. Logistical concerns, such as how much time to spend campaigning in Iowa and New Hampshire, are at odds with the imperative for him to prove his seriousness in the Senate.

The task of raising millions of dollars to survive the primaries is competing with Obama's core image as a fresh face -- a familiar dilemma for a professed outsider, but one that his advisers and rivals alike believe he can overcome.

Perhaps most important, Obama's strategists are scrambling to manage expectations. "Given the need to build a fundraising infrastructure and the fact that we do not accept contributions from federal lobbyists and political action committees, raising $8 to $10 million in the first quarter would be great news," spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said.

"An Obama campaign clearly has tremendous fundraising potential in the long term," Pfeiffer said. "But it is absurd to assume that we should raise as much or more than others who have been building fundraising networks for years and years."

Rivals in the Democratic contest contend that he could raise as much as $40 million, potentially raking in $1 million in a single Hollywood fundraiser, and will all but fail an early test of his viability if he comes up with less than former North Carolina senator John Edwards before April. Edwards is expected to raise as much as $15 million in the first quarter, and Clinton is expected to raise as much as $30 million, though both of those campaigns, like Obama's, insist they could take in less.

"By all accounts, Obama is poised for a huge fundraising quarter," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson, predicting that Obama will raise $25 million or more. Wolfson played down the notion that Obama's campaign needs time to get up to speed. "You can build an operation fairly quickly if you know what you're doing, and I suspect they know what they're doing," he said.

Still, Clinton spent more than $30 million during the 2006 election cycle, much of it on building an infrastructure, including a donor database, that could be used in her presidential bid. That puts a gulf between her and her rivals, including Obama. "Nobody has ever come to the table with the built-in advantages that Hillary Clinton has," said Jim Jordan, a Democratic strategist advising Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.) in the race. "She has had decades to build this organization, and clearly has been running for president more or less for six years, on top of everything else that was previously built for her husband."

Obama "started later than other people, and that's going to show for a while," Jordan said. "But ultimately that's not what's going to decide whether he wins."

Instead, he and others said, Obama will rise or fall on his ability to continue coming across as the candidate who is different, new and charismatic.

"If he tries to run a traditional campaign -- that is run, staffed, managed and operated in a traditional way -- he is playing to his opponents' strengths, both in terms of going head-to-head where they're going to be really strong, but also in terms of undermining a good chunk of his message," said Chris Lehane, a former spokesman for Al Gore who is not currently on the payroll of any presidential campaign.

It remains to be seen how the kind of nontraditional campaign Lehane envisions would work in a round-the-clock news environment. Would Obama decline to respond to attacks? Or to skewer his rivals? Or to answer activists' questionnaires? Or to give detailed answers about his views on policy? Or to play pop music and blast red-white-and-blue confetti at his events?

For now, the answer is yes.

"I think he is very focused on the fact that he doesn't want to lose his essential self in this process, and if he does -- and if what he projects and delivers is just more of the kind of politics people have become accustomed to -- it would be a disappointment to him, and to them," Axelrod said.

"It's not just how he delivers the message but how we deliver the message, and what kind of relationship we develop with our supporters," he said. "If this campaign is what it should be, this is not going to be the hoisting of an icon. It's going to be the movement of millions of people."

Black Rift Widens Over Obama (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127193

A key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still "owe" Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians.

The comments by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists.

"How long are you going to owe politicians for past favors?" Jones asked in a speech Friday to more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC, according to people who were there.

Jones, a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel" the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community.

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant who was at the caucus meeting, said Jones' words and the heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats.

"The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton," he said.

Jones spoke after the DNC's chief of staff, Leah Daughtry, told the group that she and the DNC would remain neutral in the 2008 presidential nominating contests.

"This is no time for neutrality," Jones said in an interview Saturday. "We have a well qualified candidate, and I urged them to get behind his candidacy."

"I didn't mention Clinton by name," he said.

But the remarks by one of Obama's longtime political mentors in Illinois was widely taken to refer to a debt felt in the black political community to Bill Clinton, who enjoyed deep black support in the White House and rewarded black allies.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., who is now mounting her own campaign for the presidency, is trying to collect that debt by pushing hard for the endorsements of black political leaders, an effort that could force Obama onto an explicitly racial terrain that clashes with his national image as a figure of new, post-racial unity.

But while Hillary Clinton continues to lead in polls of African-American voters, Obama's extraordinary potential as a black presidential candidate has a powerful appeal to many black voters and officials.

Jones concluded his speech with a reference to the jobs and appointments Bill Clinton had given blacks, including many people in the room, and asked when they would stop owing the Clintons for that patronage, attendees said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said one person in the room who doesn't currently support either Obama or Clinton. "It was one of those moments when you say, 'I can't believe he just said that.'"

Jones' call was received frostily by Clinton allies, including Minyon Moore, the former White House aide who now heads Hillary Clinton's black outreach, and former Clinton and Gore campaign aide Donna Brazile, according to some attendees.

Moore walked out of the room when Jones stopped speaking, according to two people who were there. Moore said Sunday she'd left because she had somewhere else to be, and that she would "agree to disagree" with Jones.

Neither Moore nor Brazile could be reached for comment. But another Clinton supporter who was who at the meeting said Clinton's camp took Jones' remarks as an affront.

"The feeling was, 'Who is [Jones] to tell us how to be black?' " said the Clinton supporter, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said Jones is "a mentor of the senator" but wouldn't comment on the substance of his speech. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson declined to comment.

But there was no doubt in the Washington Hilton that Jones struck a nerve. Black Democrats were walking around the hotel Saturday repeating - in jest, but not without an edge - Jones' refrain of "How long? How long?"

Good for Mr. Jones!!! Great for the democratic party. It's about time for the African American vote not to be taken so lightly. We Black Americans must vote on the issues and what is in our best interest. Up from the ranks a leader for the democratic has emerged to be reckon with, his name is Sen. Barack Obama....

Well, just what percentage of Americans even have 401K's? Hmm? And how many people of those earn the median yearly salary. The wealthy have lots of money in 401K's and stocks. Not Middle America, and surely not the poor. So don't confuse reality with half-baked statements. The bottomline is that most average people are spending home equity and money that should be going to savings to pay for rising college expenses for their kids, healthcare coverage, and interest on their credit card debt.

by Hardie on 02.04.2007 at 10:49 PM

The mainstream media recently made big news over the fact that personal savings are currently as low as they were during the Great Depression. And now here come the parrots, eager to reguritate what the media have spoon-fed them.

For the record, the government calculates savings as post-tax income minus spending, and investments are counted as spending. You read that right - investments are counted as spending. So, have you been buying stocks, or contributing to an IRA or a 401(k)? Then you are part of the "problem" because you have been spending too much and not saving enough! It's time to plan for the future by avoiding the record-setting market and putting more money into your passbook savings...

RE: drbillybob

"We are in the midst of a robust and growing economy...."

Praising and relying on a market-based economy is like showing-off the pristine exterior of a flashy McMansion while hiding the leaky basement and rotting beams. The economic storm hovering on the horizon is being stoked by a saggy housing market, low personal saving rates, rising healthcare costs, high deficits, high national debt, and the out of control multi-billion dollar costs of an unecessary war. Check Ben Bennake's testimony before Congress. Of course you're welcome to your flash McMansion view of the economy built by the dodgy team of Bush and Co. Afterall there's nothing like a Wall Street paint job to hide the cracks, especially if it is 100% stock market guaranteed. Unfortunately it will soon be clean up time for the Democrats.

by Happydad on 02.04.2007 at 05:01 PM

You left out surging deficit, shrinking Medicare and Social Security funding, the lowest individual savings levels since the Depression, and the largest non-discretionary spending levels in American history. Not to mention rising bankruptcies and home foreclosures, and rising debt levels of senior cisitzens that have to choose between food and prescription drugs.

Why is that?

by drbillybob on 02.04.2007 at 04:38 PM

RE exocet on 02.04.2007 at 04:24 PM

You suggest that our economy needs improvement and that a democrat will save us from our problems "... a the candidate that will deliver healthcare and a better economy."

How can you say this? We are in the midst of a robust and growing economy with low unemployment, record productivity, low inflation, stable interest rates, rising wages, low taxes and surging markets.

Just because the dominant media won't tell you this is no excuse for ignorance.

by exocet on 02.04.2007 at 04:24 PM

The only debt one imagines African-American voters have is to themselves and to the candidate that will deliver healthcare and a better economy. If you think Obama can deliver most of this while battling the Republican party and while enacting his vision go for it. Frankly the fact that Obama would let his surrogates roil the waters between members of the African-American community does not speak well for his "I'm a unifier" vision of things. If I were the Clinton's I'd stay out of this and watch from the sidelines, while courting the Hispanic community. At least the latter have no trouble identifying their interests. The African-American communitly meanwhile is like a circular firing squad.

by yankeejoshua on 02.04.2007 at 02:34 PM

I think the anonymous supporter said it best: "Who is he to tell us how to be black?" You can expand this to include my question: "Who is anyone to tell me how to be a Democrat?" Even if I am a staunch supporter of the Clinton agenda, does that automatically translate into my absolute rejection of all other viable Democratic candidates? It is interesting to hear Obama supporters using the exact divisive political jargon that he has been actively seeking to shut down. If you tear down the Clinton White House to build the Obama Black House, isn't it still all about race? I thought we were "post racial". We're all aware of the social stratification of racial groups and the continuation of institutiional racial discrimination in Corporate America. Yet, am I the only person disturbed by the fact that everyone keeps clapping for Obama because he's made it this far? It's like we EXPECT Blacks people to not aspire to be the president, or senator or representative. How sad is that? I have a question to Jones, or anyone else for that matter, who thinks all Blacks should support Obama. What about Black women? Aren't they choosing between the first Black president and the first woman? What's more important to those voters, being Black or being a woman? Both identities are influential and cannot be summed up by arguing that Hillary is the past because of her husband. She has significant support among Black voters not only because of Bill, but because she, too, has been an advocate for not only Blacks, but many social minority groups. Hillary also represents great change in that a woman will finally lead this country. Many people may feel that she is more electable and will go with her as the surer bet to advance their political goals. We should not underestimate this aspect of the race.

ps This is not a stump speech for Hillary, but to point out that you can't base arguments on race OR gender alone. I am so sick of people saying Hillary cannot be commander-in-chief becau

Maybe it shouldn't matter who is commenting on this article, black or white. The solution seems simple to me as an outsider: vote for the candidate who puts forth the best ideas, and whose life shows she or he puts those ideas into action, regardless of skin color.

by Hardie on 02.04.2007 at 02:19 PM

I never thought the day would come that I defend Bill Clinton, but being angry at him over the fact that, during his administartion, 400,000 more blacks were incarcerated than in the previous two Republican administrations is not only foolish, it smacks more than a little of racism.

America saw crime rates fall during much of the 90's. Why? The smart money - and even half of the dumb - says crime rates fell because more criminals were in prison. And if people assert that racism is the reason that blacks are incarcerated at rates disproportionate to whites, is sexism then the reason why males are imprisoned at higher rates than females? Of course not. Men go to prison far more often than women because men commit far more cromes. And among men, black men are incarcerated at higher rates than white men because black men commit a disproportionate number of crimes.

I'm glad to know that there are still a few of us African Americans who do not drink from the Clinton Kool Aid. It seems that there is pervasive selective amnesia throughout our community. To expound on your well crafted list of failed policies that were devasting to our community, more than 400,000 more African American were incarcerated during the Clinton Administration than the two previous Republican administrations, resulting in 1 in 3 African American men now under criminal justice supervision. He did a terrific job of surrounding himself by African Americans to insulate himself from well deserved criticism. As oxymoronic as it may sound, we suffer from both a White savior and White Boogeyman complex. We need both Whites to lead us and Whites to blame for our lack of progress. And unfortunately that presents a no win situation for Barrack Obama.

I think it is a mistake for the Democratic party to fight over the African-American vote over what blacks might "owe" any candidate. They, nor any other Democratic voter owe Clinton anything for her husband's past administration nor is Obama "owed" their vote because he is black. In fact I think it would be best for no candidate in the Democratic party to haggle over any owed votes because of any origin or legacy. As someone who sits much more to the right of the Democratic party this is one of the public debates regarding the party that turns me off and much of the rest of the country. Blacks do have some issues that the majority of their race may agree on, but blacks are a part of every social and economic class and discussing their vote as if their race should be voting for one candidate as a whole and as a race is patronizing and it doesn't make their "leaders" like Mr. Sharpton or Mr. Jackson look like anything other than demagogic and naive. With all of the issues coming up in the next election the fact is a debate over the "black" vote shouldn't be fought so publicly by the Democratic candidates, there are far more important matters and realistic matters to argue over.

by jth on 02.04.2007 at 12:32 PM

What do the Blacks owe the Clinton's? I'm serious. During the Clinton Administration one million innocent BLACK human beings were slaughtered in Rwanda. The Clinton Administration did nothing, said nothing, looked the other way. Sudan and North Africa arabs had a profitable enterprize with 'chattel slavery of BLACK Africans' and another half a million were murdered. Sierra Leone became a mecca for the child forced labor trade, especially the diamond industry. There is no telling how many children were murdered and maimed. And these were all BLACK children. Liberia was a mess. It wasn't until President Bush sent some marines in that the country became stablized. They were crying out for Clinton to do something but he looked the other way. And we know the tragedies in Congo, Uganda, and religious and tribal conflicts in Nigeria started during those years. However, he (Clinton) did save some white folks in Bosnia. Also, is everybody aware, during the Clinton years, that more young African-American males were incarcerated into our penal system, mostly non-violent drug offenses, then during any other two presidential administrations? So again I asked," what do blacks owe the Clinton's?"

by Phar on 02.04.2007 at 12:12 PM

While I am not a supporter of Hillary Clinton, I am a bit uneasy with the idea of supporting Barak Obama at this time. I think that Mr Obama has a great future and would very likely make an excellent president in the future. However, I think it would be best for both him and the country if he is given some time to mature into a much more significant candidate in the future. I fear that as president he would be another Jimmie Carter; namely, great talent and statesmanship but insufficient political savy for the top job of President. We don't want to see our first black president fail for lack of a little bit of time.

by drbillybob on 02.04.2007 at 11:10 AM

How many Americans really know Obama's positions on economic or social issues? Most of us know he has the luxury of opposing the Iraq war now that it is not going as well as expected - he never had to vote on it!

This public and media fawning over his candidacy is amazing to me. And what do we hear from the press? "Is America ready for a black President?" This is crap. America's number one advertising icon is Tiger Woods. The Cosby Show and now Oprah dominated ratings in the 80s/90s/00s.

If Obama loses, it's because he is damn near a socialist and should be recognized and reported as such! Remember that old notion about "content of character"?

Gore Resists Push For '08 Run (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Former Vice President Al Gore is basking in the global spotlight for nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize and an Oscar, but a growing number of Democrats want him to make another bid for the presidency.

He says he is interested in a "different kind of campaign to try to change enough minds" to solve the global-warming problem, but that doesn't stop people from asking.

Mr. Gore spoke to 1,500 Silicon Valley leaders gathered Friday for the annual "State of the Valley" conference, hosted by Joint Venture: Silicon Valley Network. The audience sent the Democrat questions via text-messaging during the speech. The first on the list, projected on jumbo screens to Mr. Gore's left and right: "Will you run for president?"

He tried to dodge the question, rolling his eyes and inspiring laughter from the crowd, but he couldn't avoid the probing glances in the crowd or the attendee who shouted, "Please?"

"I don't have any plans to run for president, but I appreciate the request," he said, after a pause.

Not everyone is convinced, and "Draft Gore" movements are sprouting across the country.

"A lot of people are very excited, not only about Al Gore's potential candidacy, but about his ideas," said former San Jose Mayor Tom McEnery, a Democrat. "Very seldom in politics do ideas drive candidacy."

The problem is that Mr. Gore doesn't seem to want to renew his political career, and nothing about his lifestyle suggests that he'll mount a bid. His friends and former advisers say privately that he is happy with his life as a somewhat regular -- albeit wealthy -- public figure.

He closes events to the press while other Democrats seek headlines. His Web site, AlGore.com, is far from a campaign site.

DraftGore.com organizers say 2000 Democratic nominee should give it another try, calling him the "conscience of the Democratic Party" for his early opposition to the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0127197

"Given his unmatched experience and leadership on issues of moral imperative, Gore is increasingly seen as Democrats' best bet to win back the White House," the site declares.

Supporters say he wouldn't need to mount a traditional campaign because he is so well-known.

"I'll wait as long as necessary to see if Gore will jump in," wrote Markos Moulitsas, founder of the liberal DailyKos.com. "That's ultimately my guy this cycle. And even though I don't think he'll run, he's really got all the time in the world to make a final decision. It's not as if he'll need the full year to get his name-recognition up or make the case for his candidacy."

Donna Brazile, Mr. Gore's campaign manager in 2000, told voters recently: "Wait till Oscar night. If Al Gore has slimmed down 25 or 30 pounds, Lord knows," the Allentown (Pa.) Morning Call reported.

Mr. Gore on Friday did not appear to have lost any weight. The Academy Award winners will be announced Feb. 25. Mr. Gore's global-warming documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," is contending for two Oscars.

Some other Democrats have suggested that if Mr. Gore is named the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in October, he could easily wait to announce a presidential run until Dec. 10 when the award would be presented.

Also looming is the expected release of his new book, "The Assault on Reason," which will explore the "damage" he says has been done by the Bush administration "to the functioning of our democracy," according to a description on Amazon.com.

Russell Hancock, Joint Venture's chief executive officer, introduced the former vice president as "the one man who has done more than any other American to bring these issues to the forefront of the nation's consciousness."

Mr. Hancock later said Mr. Gore seems to be done with politics.

"He's done that. Now he's going to save the world," he said.

Aart de Geus, CEO of semiconductor software giant Synopsys, agreed.

"I'm thinking that ... looking back 100 years from now that may be a bigger impact than any president of the U.S. would have had," Mr. de Geus said. "In that sense, the platform that he's taken of dealing with global warming may be a more important platform than anything else he could do."

Mr. Gore's talk was held the same day the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) released a summary of a forthcoming report authored by scientists from more than 100 countries predicting the earth's temperature will rise by 2 to 11 degrees by 2100.

He told the leaders that they are on the forefront of innovation and said business will profit from technology's efforts to stop climate change or slow its effects.

He explored the valley's evolution from being the birthplace of electronics and the computer to the Internet and biotechnology.

"It's abundantly obvious that clean tech, green tech ventures ... will be a new pathway that attracts a lot more energy and time and investment," he said.

Mr. Gore, a member of Apple Computer's board of directors and an adviser to Google, seemed comfortable in the valley, which he called his "second home."

He spoke in a calm, patient voice, telling self-deprecating jokes and chatting about laws of thermodynamics in between jabs at the Bush administration.

'08 Hopefuls Hash Out Pressing Issues Of '07 (USAT)

USA Today, February 5, 2007

As the next presidential campaign gets underway, USA TODAY asked two former governors who are planning bids to discuss their positions on the Iraq war, climate change and immigration.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, and former Wisconsin governor Tommy Thompson, a Republican who was secretary of Health and Human Services in President Bush's first term, spoke Friday at the J.D. Power convention in Las Vegas.

The forum was moderated by Susan Page, USA TODAY's Washington Bureau chief. Comments have been edited for space and clarity.

On Iraq

The Senate is going to begin considering a resolution Monday (today) that would express opposition to President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq. If you were in the Senate, would you vote for or against this resolution?

Thompson: I would vote against the resolution. President Bush was asked by the (Iraq) Study Committee, by the American public, by the electorate to try something different in Iraq. He's come up with a program that was really brought to the forefront by Gen. (David) Petraeus, who is the commanding general in Iraq. And Gen. Petraeus sincerely believes that the surge capacity will stabilize Baghdad and will allow the government to work. We should give this opportunity a chance to work.

DOJ_NMG_0127198

Give President Bush and the new deployment and the government of Iraq, which is really now starting to step up, (Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's) government, give it a chance to work. I'm not confident that it's going to, but at least I think we should support the president and the troops in the field at this point in time.

Vilsack: The president's escalation plan is about to make a big mistake even bigger. I was in Iraq last March talking to Gen. (George) Casey, who at the time was in charge. It was his belief that we had about six months to give the Iraqi government the ability to stand up, and at that point it was time for our troops to come home.

The reality is that an escalation is not the answer. I believe Congress actually has to go further than that resolution. I think it is time for us to take our troops out of harm's way. It's time to have the Iraqis assume full responsibility for their security.

We've been there four years, 3,000 lives lost, over 20,000 injuries, and hundreds of billions of dollars spent. I think it's time to ask the Iraqis to assume full responsibility.

If U.S. forces withdraw now, does that mean the United States has not met an obligation it owes to the Iraqis who have worked with us and supported us there?

Vilsack: We have absolutely met our obligation. We created an opportunity. We spent four years, longer than we were in Europe during World War II. We sent many of our brightest and best. We are undermining our military. As commander in chief of the (Iowa) National Guard, I know full well what has happened to our National Guard as a result of this long-standing war. We are not as well equipped as we need to be for the future.

When I was over in Iraq last March, I had an interesting experience. In speaking to an Iraqi security officer — this was a man who was being trained to protect the prime minister and Cabinet officials — he got very agitated when he started talking about the United States.

He said, "Why can't you, America, keep us safe?" This was a man being trained to keep his people safe. It's clear the mind-set needs to change in Iraq. As long as we are there, the mind-set will not change.

We have got to force them to make the tough decisions that only they can make.

Gov. Thompson, you said "terrible mistakes" were made in the execution of this war. Who is responsible for those terrible mistakes?

Thompson: People got lulled into believing that we moved so rapidly in Iraq that the Iraqi people were just going to stand up and embrace us. They didn't do that. We didn't put enough force in there to protect the borders.

No. 1, when you go to war, as Colin Powell has said, go in with the force to win. We didn't do that. We went in with a slimmed-down force because we thought we were so good and so able to defeat the enemy so quick that we didn't need a big army anymore. That was the mistake.

Second thing we should have done is allowed the Iraqi army to stand in and be able to continue to support the borders and prevent other people from coming in from Iran, Syria, and Jordan. We didn't do that. Those were the two big mistakes.

Do you think President Bush is ultimately responsible for these mistakes you've identified?

Thompson: The president is the ultimate determiner. The president is responsible. He's the one that is going to reap the successes but also the failures. Success has a thousand fathers, and failure has but one.

But Congress has a role to play. Congress, you know, needs to step up. The Department of Defense, the generals — I mean, the president, I can assure you, did not set up this war plan. This war plan was set up by the generals in the Department of Defense. He agreed to go ahead and execute on it, but it actually is a plan by the generals. So the generals in the Department of Defense have a big role and a big responsibility for the failures.

On other adversaries

Do you think the administration should be negotiating directly with Iran and Syria?

Thompson: I believe strongly that the United States should take the leadership — not alone, but in conjunction with all the European countries that support our philosophy, our way of government, Japan and our allies. (We should) have a conference, have a summit and develop a unified position. America cannot do it alone.

Vilsack: We have made a mistake over the course of the last several years in not having direct discussions with Syria, Iran, and North Korea. We in all areas have made situations that were quite dangerous be more dangerous.

The reality is that in Iran, you have extremists and moderates. Our position in not engaging has emboldened the extremists and marginalized the moderates. It's important for the United States as a great nation to always be willing to talk. The fact that you talk doesn't mean that you capitulate, it doesn't mean that you don't negotiate hard.

By failing to do so, we clearly exacerbated the situation in Lebanon. We clearly allowed the Iranian government to become more extreme in its rhetoric. We obviously made a very dangerous situation in North Korea much more dangerous.

On climate change

Do you support raising mileage standards for cars?

DOJ_NMG_0127199

Thompson: The president has come up with a plan that's going to reduce the reliance on gasoline and fuel by 20% by 2018. I think that's a step in the right direction. In order to (combat global warming), the standards are going to have to be raised.

Vilsack: I think we need to change the debate about this. I'm not so sure it's about miles per gallon. I think it's about emissions per tailpipes. I think we ought to be taking a look at a different structure and a different system to regulate emissions from tailpipes.

It gets you into a discussion of how you expand renewable fuels and energy production in this country. … We need to see a rather significant expansion in this country of renewable fuels. The reality is so long as we continue to import the level of oil we are importing, we are literally funding both sides of the global insurgency that we are confronting.

On immigration

Do you support providing a way for illegal immigrants to gain legal status while remaining in the USA?

Vilsack: These are people coming across the border seeking to do what? Seeking to do right by their family. It's pretty hard to criticize them for trying to have a better life for their family. I'm not critical of them. I am critical of governments that don't create economies that will allow them to be able to live at home and raise their families.

There are currently between 12 and 13 million people who are here in an unauthorized fashion. If we were to try to deport all of these people based on the current system that we have in place, it would, I'm told, take 238 years to complete that project. That's not feasible.

In this country, when you violate the law, you're held accountable in some way. You're either put in jail, but most often you're required to pay a fine. I think these folks should have to pay a fine. I think they should have to pay back taxes, because that's only fair to the rest of us. I think they should be put at the back of the line, given no preference, and be given the opportunity to earn their way to citizenship.

If they're not interested in doing that, then I think it's at that point in time to ask them to leave. But if they are interested in doing it, I think we ought to give them a pathway to citizenship.

Thompson: There is no question that there has to be a procedure to take care of the 12 million individuals who are unauthorized or illegal in this country.

The truth of the matter is, we have laws on the books, and you should not be able to have amnesty. … I think what they really need to do is, they have to go back to their country and apply. They've got to go to the back of the line and allow those individuals who come into this country legally really to have preference.

To say to the other 12 million that have not obeyed the law that you're automatically going to be (allowed to stay) in this country is wrong. They should have to go back and petition.

On health care

We have 46 million Americans who lack health insurance. What is it that the federal government should be doing differently on this issue?

Vilsack: The federal government and state governments need to cooperate together to provide universal coverage. But every politician is likely to say that. I think one of the things that Secretary Thompson and I will absolutely agree on is that this system needs to be changed from a health care system to a wellness system.

We have to really focus on driving health care costs down. And one way you can do that is by preventing illnesses to begin with. So as we take a look at redesigning the health care system, we have to incorporate significantly wellness components, both in the way we insure, what we incent, what we encourage, and even how we educate parents and children.

Thompson: The government is not doing nearly enough on health care. No. 1, we spend $2 trillion on health care in America. That's 16% of the GDP. In seven years, ladies and gentlemen, that's going to go to $4 trillion, to 21% of GDP, unless we make a change. …

Out of that $2 trillion, 75% of the costs of health care go to chronic illnesses. These are items that you have to personally change, like tobacco smoking, like obesity, like sugar diabetes.

None of us would set up a health care system, in which we wait for people to get sick and then spend thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to get you well. You've got to start preventing. We have to go to a wellness system.

You're going to have to cover the uninsured. …We've got to cover everybody in America on health insurance. It would be cheaper. It would stimulate the economy.

A Massachusetts Conservative (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

MOUNT PLEASANT, S.C.-In his stump speech to supporters gathered among the shrimp boats on the bank of Shem Creek, Mitt Romney makes no mention of hot-button issues like abortion or the role of religion in politics. But when the speech is finished, the Republican presidential hopeful is swarmed by reporters asking only hot-button questions: Will conservative voters believe that the formerly pro-choice ex-governor of Massachusetts is now antiabortion? How did he make the conversion? Will evangelical Christians back a devout Mormon like Romney?

Romney, in a tailored suit and flawlessly coiffed hair, insists that voters are more concerned with other issues, like "How are we going to beat the jihadists? How are we going to be competitive with Asia? How to improve our schools and healthcare."

And yet answering those hotter-button questions may hold the key to whether Romney has a shot at winning the Republican nomination. Romney has so far sold himself as the more conservative alternative to front-runners John McCain, who riled many conservatives by supporting a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and opposing a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, and likely contender Rudolph Giuliani, a supporter of gay rights and abortion rights. In doing so, however, Romney is battling his own past. He admits to being "effectively pro-choice" as recently as two years ago. "Voters can respect a politician who changes parties," says Republican strategist Scott Reed. "But it's more difficult for a politician that changes philosophies."

Competition. While convincing social conservatives that he has become one of them, Romney must also develop broad enough appeal to be seen as truly competitive with McCain and Giuliani. A CNN poll last week had Romney winning support from just 7 percent of Republican-leaning voters, compared with 32 percent for Giuliani and 26 percent for McCain. Still, with Hollywood-style charisma, a résumé that includes a big win in the bluest of states, and a team of marquee activists and aides, Romney is probably the strongest White House hopeful that most Americans have never heard of. "You want to ask some presidential candidates who aren't well known, 'Why did you decide to do this?'" says Whit Ayres, a GOP strategist. "With Romney, you can see a path to go all the way."

Even before leaving office, Romney raised his profile among conservatives by fighting the Massachusetts Supreme Court's 2003 decision to legalize gay marriage. He helped prod the state legislature into voting to put the issue before voters in a referendum. Romney also began trumpeting his new antiabortion stance, tracing his conversion to a 2004 meeting with Harvard scientists. Romney says one scientist told him cloning human embryos was not a moral issue because they were destroyed within two weeks. "It struck me that we had so cheapened the value of human life," Romney tells U.S. News, "that someone would feel that racks of human embryos being created ... was not a moral issue." Now, Romney is drawing parallels between his own antiabortion conversion and that of Ronald Reagan, who as governor of California signed a liberal abortion rights law. Mark DeMoss, an evangelical publicity executive who organized a meeting between Romney and evangelical leaders, says he was won over by Romney's story about the Harvard scientists: "To hear him tell it, it's almost like Paul's road-to-Damascus experience in the New Testament."

A Presidential Also-Ran, Kerry Adjusts To What Passes For A Normal Life In The Senate (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4 — Senator John Kerry keeps to himself around the Capitol. He is always rushing somewhere, head down, disappearing into elevators. A Senate loner for 22 years, Mr. Kerry seems all the more isolated now as he darts past the media hordes around the next set of presidential seekers, colleagues that include Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama.

Even in the best of times, Mr. Kerry's face hung droopy and funereal, one of the most weary in American politics. Today, Mr. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the exit poll president-elect for a few hours in November 2004, endures the peculiar pariah status that his party reserves for its losing nominees.

"America does not tolerate losing, even though it's through losing that we learn the most," said David Thorne, the twin brother of Mr. Kerry's late first wife, Julia Thorne, and his closest friend. "People want fresh faces. Or they think they do."

As the 2008 campaign begins in earnest, Mr. Kerry has been forced to adapt to something resembling a normal Senate life. This has been no small challenge for a man whose identity has long been steeped in becoming president, or trying to.

Last week, days after he announced he would not run again, Mr. Kerry said there was no point to dwelling on what might have been. "You know, that's such a waste of time right now," he said in a Capitol hallway interview. "I came close, but so what? I didn't make it, so move on. Just go forward. There's no sense going backwards."

Mr. Kerry ratified his status as Dead Candidate Walking in an emotional speech on the Senate floor two weeks ago. "We came close, certainly close enough to be tempted to try again," Mr. Kerry said, referring to his 2004 campaign.

Only two colleagues attended his announcement, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a fellow Massachusetts Democrat, and the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada (another, Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, walked in late). "I have concluded this is not the time for me to mount a presidential campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0127201

The grave Kerry face was on stark display that day, his voice breaking at times. When it was over, Mr. Reid hugged him and said he loved him, and then Mr. Kerry left the chamber by himself.

His announcement could have been a dignified valedictory moment. But the enigmatic Mr. Kerry is often misunderstood, and several news reports said he had cried when saying he would not run; in fact, he choked up earlier in his speech when talking about an Army captain he had met in Iraq who had been killed.

No matter, the photo of Mr. Kerry breaking down ran prominently in the Drudge Report and elsewhere. It buttressed the notion of John Kerry as the forlorn loser who had finally bottomed out. It also served as a grim visual to another round of Kerry abuse, conjuring up the caricature of him as a helmet-haired, flip-flopping elitist.

"Who will the windsurfing caucus back now?" a columnist for The Boston Herald wisecracked. A cartoonist for The Times-Picayune of New Orleans mocked Mr. Kerry as saying, "Actually I was for another White House bid before I was against it." A few days earlier in a new book, Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic National Committee chairman, became the latest party bigwig to pan Mr. Kerry's 2004 campaign.

Mr. Kerry says he finds it "freeing" not to be a presidential candidate. "Hopefully, the things I say and do will not be taken in the light of a presidential race anymore," he said. "And I think that's positive."

He will seek re-election in Massachusetts next year and says he is looking forward to immersing himself in Senate life, particularly on issues related to the Iraq war. Mr. Kerry has sought counsel from Mr. Kennedy, who himself returned to the Senate after a bitter primary defeat and went on to have a storied career as a lawmaker.

Yet to many eyes, Mr. Kerry will always be trapped in yesterday's news and lingering disappointment. He is a member of the tiny club that knows what it is like to lose an election to George W. Bush — to blow an election, by some accounts.

At least Al Gore was allowed to slip away, grow a beard and come back when he was ready. Mr. Kerry had to return to his very public job, hear all about how "winnable" his race was, how "unlikable" a candidate he was and how ridiculous it would be for him to consider ever trying again. His name elicited instant eye-rolls among many former supporters.

But Mr. Kerry held out hope. Last year, he campaigned for Democrats, wielding an impressive e-mail list, bankroll and political network. He kept his options open. Until, finally, he shed what had been the guiding aspiration of his career seemingly from its outset.

"Your heart goes out to him," Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, said in a brief interview a few days after Mr. Kerry said he was not running. "It just isn't easy to shift your ambitions away from something that's been his ambition for a long time."

Running for president — or losing — hardly makes Mr. Kerry unique among senators (scores have run, but no sitting senator has been elected since John F. Kennedy in 1960). But Mr. Kerry stands out for coming so close, and people who know him say it has made it all the harder to give up. "He is a stubborn, competitive guy, and it must have been very, very hard to get those words out," said Jim Jordan, a former Kerry campaign manager.

Senate colleagues and staff members say Mr. Kerry struggled to reintegrate himself in the Capitol after losing to Mr. Bush. He was never much a creature of the Senate to begin with, an outcast with few close friends there and a reputation for aloofness and occasional grandstanding. His solemn bearing betrayed a certain joylessness in his job. ("John Kerry walks into a bar," goes the Washington version of the old joke. "Bartender says, 'Hey, Senator Kerry, why the long face?' ")

Shortly after he returned to work, Mr. Reid gave him a stern talking-to and urged him, in so many words, to get off his high horse and rejoin the team, according to a senior Democratic staff member.

But after laying the groundwork for a return engagement, Mr. Kerry stumbled just before November's midterm elections, when he told what he called a "botched joke" that appeared to denigrate the intelligence of American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats distanced themselves from him, Republicans ridiculed him, and Congressional candidates dumped him on the campaign trail.

He was defiant, refusing to apologize at first, offering explanations that he was criticizing Mr. Bush and not the troops. But few people wanted to listen. " 'Please stop it," Don Imus, the radio talk show host and a Kerry friend, urged him on the air. "Stop talking. Go home."

As the 2008 presidential campaign takes shape, friends say it has annoyed Mr. Kerry to keep hearing about how formidable his onetime running mate, John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, might be.

Friends say that Mr. Kerry feels betrayed by Mr. Edwards, whom he defeated easily in the 2004 Democratic primaries and faults for being too quick to second-guess their campaign, distance himself from it and embark on his own 2008 effort.

Mr. Edwards was also spared the flagellation that losing Democratic nominees typically endure. Republicans are kinder to their also-rans. Bob Dole lost to Bill Clinton in 1996, but has remained a gray eminence within the party. Barry Goldwater was slaughtered by President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964 but later became a patron saint of the conservative movement. Richard M. Nixon lost narrowly to John F. Kennedy in 1960 but ran again and won in 1968.

DOJ_NMG_0127202

Mr. Kerry and his surrogates always emphasize how warmly he is still received whenever he ventures out of Washington. “John was treated like a rock star in Switzerland,” said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who traveled to Davos, Switzerland, with Mr. Kerry and other colleagues last month for the World Economic Forum.

Of course, this is precisely the kind of compliment that feeds an impression of Mr. Kerry as a high-society jetsetter who is more at home overseas than among everyday Americans. Sure enough, Mr. Kerry was being pilloried anew by Republicans last week for saying in Davos that the United States had become an “international pariah” under Mr. Bush.

Mr. Kerry genuinely seems not to care about such criticism these days. He still wears his burdens plainly, but the burdens could be shifting.

“You can be more focused when you’re not running,” Mr. Kerry said. “You can actually get something done on the issues instead of running around as fast as you can.”

He is still running plenty fast. Mr. Kerry is hard to catch up to, probably by design. He zooms by, gone before you know it. He was seen dashing through a press-crammed Capitol after President Bush’s State of the Union address.

“Can’t now; got to go,” Mr. Kerry said after a news conference about climate change last week. He was off to the Senate for a vote, then exited by another door 20 minutes later.

“I’m running, I’m running,” Mr. Kerry told a reporter. He boarded an elevator with fellow senators and fixed his gaze straight ahead.

What Are Hillary Clinton's Religious Beliefs? (NSWK)

By Susannah Meadows

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

At 13, she met a Methodist minister who became a lifelong friend.

If Hillary Clinton and George W. Bush have anything in common, it is a deeply rooted wariness of outsiders. Both the president and the woman who hopes to succeed him have always relied on a small, closed circle of friends and advisers who have been with them for years. So it's not surprising that there are so many familiar faces on Clinton's new campaign team. Ad maker Mandy Grunwald, pollster Mark Penn, strategist Ann Lewis and others are loyalists from Bill Clinton's White House.

There is another person on Hillary's shortlist of confidants who goes back farther than any of them, but whom you've probably never heard of. The Rev. Don Jones, a Methodist minister who is now 75, was perhaps Hillary's earliest spiritual and political mentor. She has written of her "lifelong friendship" with him. It was Jones who first awakened young Hillary to the civil-rights movement and counseled her on questions of faith. They continued to be in touch as Hillary became a national figure. Years later, he helped her through the darkest period in her life, the aftermath of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

Precocious and confident, 13-year-old Hillary was an active member of her Methodist church in Park Ridge, Ill., when Jones arrived in 1961 to lead the youth group. Fresh from the seminary, he was anything but stuffy in his red Chevy Impala convertible. He carried the Bible, but also the collected poems of E. E. Cummings. Hillary, politically aware even then, was a budding Republican who took after her staunchly conservative father. In long discussions at the church, Jones introduced Hillary to the left. The young minister was determined to show his white, privileged parishioners the world beyond their suburban town. He took them to the South Side of Chicago to hear Martin Luther King Jr. speak. Jones introduced each of them to the civil-rights leader.

But the conversation wasn't all politics. "Hillary would come up to talk to me after I preached and make comments about the sermon, how the hymns, prayers and Biblical passages were coordinated with the message," Jones tells NEWSWEEK. Jones hewed closely to the social-justice tradition of the Methodist Church, preaching that helping those in need was a means of practicing their faith. "I think she responded to my ministry in part for its intellectual content," Jones says. "Her heart responded to the social-responsibility aspects."

Not everyone appreciated the minister's lessons. Within two years, the conservative members of the congregation asked him to leave. Jones landed at Drew University in Madison, N.J., where he spent his career teaching theology. They were in communication while Hillary was in high school and later at Wellesley. During her time as First Lady, he visited the White House nine times. After Bill Clinton admitted his affair with Lewinsky, Jones gave Hillary a Paul Tillich sermon about grace, and how it comes to you when you feel great pain. Jones says he hoped Hillary would pass the words on to her husband. "It was my secret agenda," he says. Sure enough, five days later, Jones received a thank-you note from the president. Last year he saw the Clintons at their home in Chappaqua, N.Y. The senator had called him to invite her old friend to her mother's birthday party.

Though she's been accused of adopting a religious patina for political gain, her relationship with Jones shows that from the time she was young, Hillary was thinking seriously about her faith. She clearly talks more about religion these days, as many politicians do—but her connection to Jones reveals that her Christianity has always been at the center of her identity. "She's not using the language of prayer and God for the first time," says Jones. "While there may be a political dimension, it's authentic."

Jones describes Hillary's beliefs as falling, like her politics, somewhere in the middle of the spectrum. Unlike the extreme left, she understands the limitations of human beings, he says. And unlike the extreme right, he argues, she believes in humanity's potential. She does take seriously the doctrine of original sin. And after a lifetime in politics, she's seen plenty of it.

The Mommy Factor (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

It was striking. On her first foray into Iowa as a presidential candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton was clearly trying to soften up her image. "I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience," she said. "The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom is part of who I am." Wow. Could this be the same Hillary Clinton who told voters way back in her husband's first run for the White House that she wasn't just going to stay home and bake cookies? Or the first lady who tried to redo the nation's healthcare system? Or began collecting national security cred on Day 1 in the Senate by landing a seat on the Armed Services Committee?

The Clintons are a great reflection of the national zeitgeist. So don't take Hillary's appearance in Iowa in pastels lightly: It may mean we've come full circle, baby. After all these years of trying to be one of the guys-talking tough, playing backroom politics with the bad boys (more on those later)-do we now have to tone it down so people will like us again? Have we overcorrected the initial problem? "We can't decide if we want to wear iron britches or if we're sweet," says former Colorado Rep. Pat Schroeder. Remember her moment of fame? She cried when announcing that she would not run for president. "We got a lot of 'We don't want people who cry with their finger on the button,'" Schroeder told me. That happened 20 years ago, and we've tried not to cry ever since (although we love it when men do).

So here's my question: Is this a problem for all women at a certain stage, or is it mostly about Hillary? After all, when Speaker Nancy Pelosi gaveled her first session of the House of Representatives to order a few weeks back, she seemed to present pretty much the perfect, balanced portrait: a tough grandmother. When all the kiddies were invited to the podium, it seemed to be an entirely authentic moment-and a signal that Pelosi is, well, fully evolved. We accept it; in fact, we applaud it. "It was wonderful to watch her with the grandchildren," former vice presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro told me. "If I had done that, I would have been judged as too soft, a mommy, not able to handle the issues." To be fair, Pelosi has an advantage that Clinton doesn't: We haven't tracked her every move, as we've watched Hillary morph from the wife bristling behind the podium to the candidate finally in front of it. Since we seem to have spent more than a decade observing her, maybe she just becomes someone with too many identities for us to sort out-or to decide which is real.

Sure, there's a natural affinity among women for Hillary Clinton when she tells voters that "I expect there will probably be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me." You bet. And there will also be different kinds of girl questions, like the one from the man in Davenport, Iowa, who asked how she would handle the world's "evil and bad men." It was hard not to read something (aka Bill) into her playfully ambiguous response: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" With perfect comedic timing, she let the answer play as the audience erupted into laughter. And although she later denied she was even thinking about Bill Clinton, how could we think anything else? Can this possibly be the new, real, authentic, believable Hillary Clinton?

The $1 Million Bundler (WP)

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

THE NUMBER alone is breathtaking. As she launches her presidential fundraising juggernaut, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is tasking her biggest financial backers to bring in $1 million or more for her campaign, the New York Times reported. Truth be told, for a fundraiser with a fat Rolodex of rich friends, this isn't quite as daunting as it sounds. Having decided to opt out of the public financing system, not just for the primary campaign but for the general election as well, Ms. Clinton can bring in, or ask her fundraisers to bring in, two checks for the hassle of one: Donors can give the maximum $2,300 for the primary and another $2,300 for the general election. Add in a spouse, and you're at $9,200 a pop. A mere 109 of those, and, voila, the $1 million bundle.

While the senator's not to blame for this state of affairs, the audacity of the $1 million target does evoke distasteful memories of the Lincoln Bedroom rake-it-all-in mentality of the Clinton presidential years. And the unwillingness of her campaign to commit to listing its big bundlers -- as President Bush did during both of his campaigns -- is appalling. A Clinton spokesman couldn't say what the campaign plans to do about disclosure. A campaign organized enough to task fundraisers with bringing in $1 million ought to be organized enough to think in advance about revealing the identities of these, and lesser, financiers.

All this underscores how outmoded and inadequate the system of disclosure has become. Under current reporting rules, there is no way of determining that a bundler has brought in big bucks for a candidate; all that would show up on campaign filings would be the bundler's own contributions. Yet candidates are as indebted to the $1 million bundler as they are to the $1 million check writer.

President Bush, who perfected the system of organizing big bundlers during his two campaigns, with his $100,000 Pioneers and $200,000 Rangers, made it a practice to disclose the individuals on his Web site; most Democratic contenders during the 2004 campaign did likewise. That is an important standard for all candidates to meet during the 2008 campaign. The public is entitled to know the names of the bundlers and, at least within some range, the size of their bundles.

Among some of the leading Democratic and Republican candidates, the plans for disclosure are still unformed even as the bundlers are being recruited. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will provide that information on his campaign Web site; he's also not taking checks, or bundles, from lobbyists. Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) balked at giving out these details last time around; his campaign said that at this point it was committing only to disclose what's legally required. The campaign of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) hasn't yet decided what to do; this should be a no-brainer for a man who's been at the forefront of campaign finance reform.

Reporting this sort of critical information should not be left to the kindness of campaigns -- it should be required. The Federal Election Commission has it within its power to write regulations mandating such disclosure; Congress could also write the requirement into law. In the age of the $1 million bundler, the status quo is intolerable.

OFF THE CUFF, GOV. GETS IN SOME JABS (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

SACRAMENTO — He has staked his governorship on bipartisan agreements, but recordings of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger bantering with aides in closed-door meetings reveal him complaining about lawmakers from both parties, casting some as obstructionist and two-faced.

The recordings, newly obtained by The Times, also feature him chatting about American resentment of illegal immigrants, about his taste for gas-hungry Hummers and about his wife's habit of tinkering with his speeches.

Made by Schwarzenegger's staff last year, the recordings offer a rare window onto the governor's operation and a more complex portrait of Schwarzenegger than typically emerges in public, where his appearances are carefully stage-managed.

In the latest recordings, the Republican governor describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) as a "very sick man" and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) as "a political operator coming from the union background" who evinces no real "passion" about issues. And he worries that a federal plan to build a fence along the Mexican border will send a troubling message.

"Are we looking at Mexico now as the enemy?" he says in the recording. "No, it's not. This is our trading partner."

Married for two decades, Schwarzenegger still seems amused by some of his wife's habits. When Maria Shriver reviews one of his speeches, he says, "she is relentless. I can only talk about things for so many times because then I like to lock it in, even if it's not perfect…. But she goes until the last day…. I said, 'Maria, it's over. It's in the teleprompter.' "

The recordings were made in the first half of 2006. The Times first published about a 6-minute excerpt from similar recordings in September and recently obtained about 3 1/2 hours more. In the excerpts published in September, Schwarzenegger referred to Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) as "hot," a reference to her ethnicity. He later apologized.

After The Times on Sunday asked the Schwarzenegger administration for comment about the latest recordings, communications director Adam Mendelsohn said he was going to release the tapes to other news media. The Schwarzenegger administration had previously turned down public records requests for the tapes.

In a prepared statement, Mendelsohn said the recordings show the governor to be "thoughtful, concerned and focused on solving some of California's most serious problems."

Gary Delsohn, a speechwriter working for the governor, made the recordings in an effort to produce better speeches by capturing the governor's thoughts and speech patterns. Attendees at the four recorded meetings include Delsohn, Mendelsohn, Chief of Staff Susan Kennedy and former aide Bonnie Reiss.

Aides to former Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides copied the audio files from the governor's website last year, something they were able to do because of lax security on the site, state investigators concluded.

Proud of his legislative achievements, Schwarzenegger plans to deliver speeches around the country this year, touting California as a model of bipartisan cooperation. But the recordings suggest that he and his most trusted aides have sometimes viewed his legislative partners with disdain.

Throughout the conversations, however, the tone is generally friendly, informal. Schwarzenegger sometimes sounds as if he has a cigar in his mouth.

DOJ_NMG_0127205

In one exchange, Delsohn thanks the governor for cigars and schnapps.

Schwarzenegger's comments about Perata came early last year, amid negotiations over a proposed multibillion-dollar public works package. A deal ultimately came together, but Schwarzenegger aides at the time viewed Perata as a barrier.

In one recorded conversation, the governor says Perata "is trying to derail everything."

Delsohn asks: "In your past life, did you ever deal with people that could be so petty and so childish?"

"Yeah, in the movie business," the governor replies. "It's the same thing."

He adds: "It is a different level, but, I mean, yes, the movie business has been held up with a hundred-million-dollar movie just because someone doesn't like one scene."

At one point, Delsohn asks the governor how Perata acts in his presence after repeatedly "jamming" him in the press.

Schwarzenegger said: "Believe me when I tell you that it is shocking, and it took me a while to understand it because I am still naïve a little bit about it. Because when he comes in here, he's nice. And I want to work with him. But those guys, as soon as they step out of here or before they come in here, they are absolutely different personalities. They change like this."

Schwarzenegger was even more caustic about Perata in a discussion at a separate meeting about negotiations on the public works bond. He says Perata is "a very sick man." An aide says, "Really?" Schwarzenegger replies: "Yeah, absolutely."

Schwarzenegger's chief of staff, Kennedy, comes in later and reads aloud a memo from Perata to fellow Democrats laying out concerns about the infrastructure package. The governor listens and says: "He's lying. Unbelievable, this guy."

"So while those girls are sitting around pulling their hair …" Kennedy says, and trails off.

Kennedy at one point urges her boss to needle a Republican lawmaker who had said something objectionable in a news story.

"So when you see [Assemblyman] Guy Houston" (R-Livermore), she says on the recording, "just say to him, 'Nice quote.' "

The assemblyman, she predicts, will "pee his pants" at such sarcasm, she suggests.

Perhaps no lawmaker was more important to Schwarzenegger's legislative successes last year than Nuñez. The speaker helped Schwarzenegger pass bills raising the minimum wage, curbing greenhouse gas emissions and offering a program for cheaper prescription drugs.

In one exchange, though, the governor describes Nuñez as an unrelieved partisan.

"So for him," the governor says, "it's all politics. And because of that, everything that happens he sees through those glasses, through the political glasses."

In some ways, Schwarzenegger is equally tough on his fellow Republicans. He suggests the Republicans were unrealistic in having their own expectations for the public works package.

The governor characterizes his message to them: "You are not the majority! I said, When does it get in your mind? You are not the majority."

Invoking his wife's famous family, Schwarzenegger likens his ambitious effort to rebuild California's roads and ports to President John F. Kennedy's call for landing an American on the moon.

He mentions speaking to his mother-in-law, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, who told him "the most frustrating thing for Jack was to sit there and always kind of deal with that. You know, when there was a big idea and he had to go and ask all of those legislators, all of the Congress: 'Think like me.' "

He imagines the resistance Kennedy must have faced: "We still have such high unemployment. The economy has to be stimulated — and here you are worrying about going to the moon?"

At times Schwarzenegger seems to be working out answers, using the conversation with aides to clarify his thinking.

He talks with Delsohn about the wisdom of building a 700-mile fence between Mexico and the U.S. Delsohn asks him if the idea sounds "ridiculous."

"It sounds ridiculous to me simply because the border with Mexico is longer than 700 miles," Schwarzenegger says. "So now we need to know specifics."

Conceding that it would be difficult for him to say so publicly, Schwarzenegger said that Latinos — because they are so close to their homeland — have more trouble assimilating than, say, Poles, Germans and French. Still, as an Austrian immigrant, he said, "I made an effort. But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

He later made similar remarks at a campaign appearance in Los Angeles. Mexican protesters marching here should not "wave the Mexican flag," he says. "America loves America."

Schwarzenegger also talks eloquently in the recordings about the importance of racial and religious tolerance. He recalls that his mother told him she saw Jews being hanged in public parks in Austria.

He mentions his regard for Nelson Mandela, who was imprisoned for decades for his opposition to apartheid in South Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0127206

"Say to yourself every week, 'Now I'm going to reach out to someone that I really didn't care for,' " the governor says. "Or a race or a religion that you didn't care for … Make a point to go and take them to lunch, you know, somebody that is totally different than you."

In an exchange on another day, Schwarzenegger worries about appearances. Working on a speech about the environment, he wonders aloud if his past might leave him open to charges of hypocrisy.

"Before I was a governor, I was both a businessman and an environmentalist because here I was driving Hummers," he says. "I don't know if I want to leave myself open here by calling myself an environmentalist."

Happily recalling a visit to a local Hummer dealership, he describes the inventory and rattles off nationwide Hummer production numbers.

Then Schwarzenegger says California needs environmental protections.

"We have to take care of our state and our state's population growth," he says.

Kennedy responds: "You're such a flaming liberal."

Analysis: Bush's Iran Stance Echoes Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 5, 2007

President Bush's tough new stance on Iran and his military buildup in the Persian Gulf recall some of the drumbeats that preceded the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

As then, the Bush administration is making allegations about Iran without providing proof.

It is suggesting Iran is sending weapons to Iraq, yet offering no evidence the supplies can be traced to Tehran. There are whispers, too, that Iranian intelligence agents were behind the recent abduction and execution of five U.S. soldiers.

Iran is the "axis of evil" country whose nuclear ambitions must be stopped. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is now Bush's primary Mideast nemesis, replacing the late Saddam Hussein.

Bush's efforts to rally public support behind his harder line on Iran have many lawmakers and some from the intelligence and defense world wondering if it is a prelude to military activity.

"We are not responsibly in the region if we don't deal with them," said Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va. "And the situation that we have right now where we continue to talk only about the military side — again, it's half a strategy," he told "Fox News Sunday."

Bush insists he has no plans to invade Iran, only to protect U.S. troops in Iraq.

But in recent days:

_Bush raised the U.S. naval presence in the Persian Gulf to its highest level since 2003 by ordering a second aircraft carrier strike group to the region.

_The administration confirmed that Bush has authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian agents who are plotting attacks on U.S. forces.

_The administration has armed Iran's Arab neighbors with Patriot missiles. The Pentagon halted sales of spare parts from the its recently retired F-14 fighter jet fleet because of concerns they could be transferred to Iran.

Administration critics suggest the White House is exaggerating Tehran's ties to attacks inside Iraq to justify a possible future military assault — just as it manipulated prewar intelligence to build its case for its 2003 invasion of Iraq, they claim.

"He again is convinced that he's on the side of right, fighting against the forces of evil, expressing this somewhat oversimplified view of the world he has," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy analyst for the Brookings Institution and an adviser to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "He's doing what he thinks is right to show resoluteness."

Bush's saber-rattling — rather than reaching out to Iran and Syria diplomatically as recommended by the Iraq Study group and many in Congress — is a risky strategy. Many national security professionals suggest this approach could lead to wider conflict.

If conditions continue to deteriorate in Iraq, "the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and with much of the world of Islam at large," Zbigniew Brezinski, President Carter's national security adviser, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Bush is betting he can help prop up the shaky government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and stop a supply line of weapons and fighters into Iraq.

It's a big bet.

Iran has denied accusations it is supplying weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq. But an official assessment of Iraq by U.S. intelligence agencies said Iran was providing lethal support to select Shiite groups.

Still, the National Intelligence Estimate released Friday said "outside actors" such as Iran and Syria are "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability" in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0127207

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, said the declassified public document "does not adequately reflect" the degree of concern in nearby Sunni nations about Shiite-run Iran's meddling in Iraq. He disputed suggestions that Bush has overemphasized Iran's role.

In his Iraq speech to the nation last month, Bush said the U.S. would "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced training and weaponry to our enemies in Iraq," citing Iran and Syria.

Critics of Bush's harder line on Iran fall into two camps: those who worry his recent strong talk might lead to a military conflict and those who claim he should have gotten tough earlier.

Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards, for instance, has criticized what he suggests is previous indifference to the Iranian threat.

"In order to ensure Iran never gets nuclear weapons, all options must remain on the table," Edwards says in a hint at possible military action. The vice presidential nominee in 2004 has called for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

For now, time appears to favor Iran, says Anthony Cordesman, an analyst with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Even if the United States and Iraq's Shiite-led government can bring stability, "Iran must now feel it can outwait the U.S., exploit U.S. unpopularity in many Shiite areas, and has every reason to be opportunistic.

"Iran wins to some degree even if it does not exploit the situation. A Shiite-dominated Iraq is going to need Iranian help and support for years to come."

Report Spells Out Dangers Of Attack On Iran (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Military action in response to Iran's atomic programme would be "highly dangerous" with diplomacy still an option, according to a report published today by a group of British non-governmental organisations, think-tanks and trade unions.

"It cannot be said that the potential for diplomacy has been fully explored while direct talks between Iran and the US have not taken place," says "Time to Talk: the Case for Diplomatic Solutions on Iran", from -Crisis Action.

The report warns that US or Israeli attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could lead to civilian deaths, radioactive contamination, heightened conflict in neighbouring Iraq and Afghanistan, al-Qaeda attacks stemming from intensified anti-western feeling, higher oil prices and an acceleration of Tehran's nuclear programme.

Among those endorsing the report is Sir Richard -Dalton, UK ambassador to Iran from 2003 to 2006. He said the report was "wagging a finger" to remind the British government that military action should be "a last resort in self-defence or to prevent an imminent threat".

Sir Richard defended the US and European Union's refusal to negotiate with Iran while Tehran refused to implement December's United Nations Security Council resolution that it suspend almost all its nuclear activities.

However, he argued London should "not just sit back on our heels". It should work "behind the scenes" to ensure the US was ready to supplement international negotiations "when re-quired".

The report appears sceptical that the Bush administration will engage Tehran, arguing "the sidelining" of the Baker-Hamilton report, which last month advocated talks with Iran, "illustrates further the rejection of direct negotiation".

Paul Rogers, professor of peace studies at Bradford university, said "an attack designed to diminish Iran's nuclear capacity would involve trying to kill as many technicians and scientists as possible".

Mr Rogers told the Financial Times that Iran would have "a huge range of retaliatory options", including attacks on the oil facilities of the Arab countries across the Persian Gulf.

At Iran's Isfahan nuclear site on Saturday, Ali-Asghar Soltanieh, the country's representative at the International Atomic Energy Agency, said the nuclear programme was "fully transparent".

Mr Soltanieh was welcoming reporters and IAEA representatives from developing countries on a trip around the facility, which processes uranium ore into uranium hexafluoride, the feeder fuel for the enrichment plant further north at Natanz.

He refused to say whether Iran would install anti-aircraft missiles being delivered from Russia at Isfahan Tor. The site is currently ringed by less sophisticated anti-aircraft guns.

Iran's Role In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

To the Editor:

Re "Bullying Iran (editorial, Feb. 1):

DOJ_NMG_0127208

The United States has now resorted to the soft power of disinformation about Iran by leveling false charges regarding Iran's behavior toward Iraq. While Iran has fully supported the new government in Iraq and has signed various trade and energy agreements with Baghdad, the United States government continues to demonize Iran and blame it for America's own failures.

Contrary to your assertion that Iran is sowing chaos in Iraq, Iran is concerned about the growing chaos and the unwanted consequences of spill-over conflict and masses of refugees.

Iran favors a strong, unified Iraq whose sovereignty is not constantly trampled upon by the intrusive Western powers. To this effect, Iran has responded favorably to Iraq's call for a regional forum to discuss the country's dangerous crisis.

Congress Must Stop An Attack On Iran (LAT)

By Leonard Weiss And Larry Diamond
The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

DESPITE ANGUISH and anger over the Bush administration's decision to escalate its failing war in Iraq, Congress is unlikely to cut off funding. Even most opponents of the war fear that they could be blamed for not supporting the troops in the field and for a possible descent into even greater catastrophe in the face of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

But nothing prevents Congress from using its power of the purse to prevent an American attack on Iran. President Bush's neoconservative advisors and pundit supporters have been beating the drums of war with Iran since 2003, when the president declared Iran to be part of an "axis of evil." Recall that a senior administration official told The Times that Iran should "take a number" in the wake of the invasion of Iraq. In his recent address to the nation on the troop surge in Iraq, Bush issued more threats to Iran. Now the president has named a Navy admiral to head the U.S. Central Command and dispatched a second aircraft carrier and minesweepers to the Persian Gulf, presumably to prevent Iran from closing the Strait of Hormuz in the event of conflict.

These developments and other administration moves could presage an air attack on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Iran is not innocent of dangerous and provocative behavior. Tehran has supported insurgent groups in Iraq, including helping to provide sophisticated explosives that have killed U.S. soldiers. And Iran's continued development of a nuclear enrichment facility is in defiance of the international community's demand to halt those actions. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repulsive statements about the Holocaust and Israel add to the nervousness about Iran's future actions.

But war is not yet justified, except in the minds of those who have been lobbying for it for years. Iran is still years away from being a nuclear threat, and our experience with "preventive war" in Iraq should teach us a thing or two. Launching another such war without international approval would leave us even more politically isolated and militarily overstretched. Attacking a Middle Eastern country — one much stronger than Iraq and with the ability to cut off oil supplies from the Strait of Hormuz — could inflame the region, intensify Shiite militia attacks on our soldiers in Iraq and stimulate terrorist attacks on Americans and U.S. interests worldwide.

But recklessness, not prudence, has been the hallmark of this administration's foreign policy. Beyond this, the president and vice president subscribe to what some call the "unitary executive," which is a fancy way of saying they believe that Congress cannot prevent the president from doing almost anything he wants. The 1973 War Powers Act, passed in the wake of our disastrous war in Vietnam, allows the president to put U.S. troops in a combat situation under certain conditions before obtaining any congressional authorization to do so. When Bush signed the Iraq war resolution, he issued a statement challenging the constitutionality of the War Powers Act, indicating that he could take the nation to war without obeying its restrictions. Unfortunately, even if the president were to agree to the act's restrictions, he could still attack Iran and have up to 90 days before being required to get congressional authorization for the attack.

What to do? Congress should not wait. It should hold hearings on Iran before the president orders a bombing attack on its nuclear facilities, or orders or supports a provocative act by the U.S. or an ally designed to get Iran to retaliate, and thus further raise war fever.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has warned the administration that it had better seek congressional authorization for any attack on Iran. But we need Senate and House hearings now to put the Bush administration on notice that, in the absence of an imminent military attack or a verified terrorist attack on the United States by Iran, Congress will not support a U.S. military strike on that country. Those hearings should aim toward passage of a law preventing the expenditure of any funds for a military attack on Iran unless Congress has either declared war with that country or has otherwise authorized military action under the War Powers Act.

The law should be attached to an appropriations bill, making it difficult for the president to veto. If he simply claims that he is not bound by the restriction even if he signs it into law, and then orders an attack on Iran without congressional authorization for it, Congress should file a lawsuit and begin impeachment proceedings.

It is, of course, possible that the president's truculent language and actions toward Iran are a bluff, an attempt to rein in its irresponsible behavior.

But the administration's mendacious and incompetent course of action in taking the nation to war with Iraq gives us no reason to provide the president with the benefit of any doubt. And stiffening economic sanctions — at a time when Iran's economy is ailing and the regime is losing popular support — offers a better and safer prospect of exerting leverage.

Another war of choice would only pour fuel on the fires of the Middle East. And the history of this administration shows that if Congress does not constrain this president, he could well act recklessly again, in ways that would profoundly damage our national interest.

India Faces Delicate Diplomacy In US, Iran Talks (AFP)

AFP, February 5, 2007

India will engage in delicate diplomacy this week during talks with Washington on a crucial civilian nuclear deal and with nuclear renegade Iran over energy and regional issues, analysts said.

"India will have to maintain a very fine balance," said C.U. Bhaskar, an analyst with the Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, to avoid raising the ire of, and damaging its economic ties with, both nations.

Energy cooperation will be high on Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee's agenda when he visits Tehran, his first official trip outside South Asia since taking office in May.

His talks on Tuesday and Wednesday come amid growing US pressure on countries for tougher sanctions against the Islamic regime for defying demands to rein in its nuclear programme.

India and Iran are expected to discuss two multi-billion dollar gas deals including a pipeline that would cross Pakistan to help meet demand in energy-hungry India.

Mukherjee is also almost "certain to discuss the situation in the region," an Indian official said, as tension mounts over Tehran's nuclear ambitions and the US military build-up in the Gulf and Iraq.

In Washington, India's special envoy on the US nuclear deal, Shyam Saran, is expected to conclude a deal that lifts three decades of US sanctions barring the transfer of civilian nuclear technology and equipment to India.

The US Congress in December gave the go-ahead to Washington to begin the negotiations with New Delhi, seen as the high watermark of the rapidly warming ties between the two nations.

But the ties did not stop US ambassador to New Delhi, David C. Mulford, last week warning that Washington would be following Mukherjee's Iran visit.

Mulford also told reporters Washington "discouraged" any commercial dealings with Iran. The US has placed economic sanctions on Tehran that include halting cooperation with governments and companies abroad that invest in Iran.

Bharat Karnad, of the New Delhi-based Centre for Policy Studies, said New Delhi had to watch its step carefully or endanger the growing US relationship.

It "is a cross that India has to bear as, to an extent, the successful conclusion of the India-US accord depends on satisfying the US on certain issues," the analyst said.

Analyst Bhaskar and India's former envoy to the UN Conference on Disarmament, Arundhati Ghosh, agreed Mukherjee's visit to Iran was "very important" and the talks with the United States were "delicate."

"In diplomacy, there are always grey areas. The foreign minister's visit is key as it is important not to make Iran feel isolated at this point," Bhaskar said.

"India could play a valuable role as facilitator depending on the situation," he added.

Indian officials, however, dismissed suggestions New Delhi has a "high-wire balancing act" on its hands.

"Not at all," said a senior official who describes New Delhi's engagements with "strategic partner" Tehran on energy and other issues as pursuing the "national interest."

"India, as the prime minister (Manmohan Singh) has stated in parliament and at other times, follows an independent foreign policy. There is no question of any pressure from any quarter. But New Delhi in not in favour of another nuclear weapon state in the region," the official said.

India voted for a resolution last year that threatened Iran with possible UN-sponsored sanctions if it failed to stop uranium enrichment work that could create material used in nuclear weapons, the official noted.

But he added "India is also against the use of force to make Iran stop its nuclear program."

The Indian Giver (WSJ)

By William S. Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

NEW DELHI -- The U.S.-India relationship emanates from shared values, interests and objectives. Our two nations are multiethnic and secular democracies. Our commonalities and the potential for mutual benefit provide solid reasons for strengthening the relationship into a true bond of friendship and partnership.

India's military is the second largest in the world by number of members. As in the U.S., India's military is controlled by a civilian, democratically elected leadership. India has a transparent judicial system and insists upon a vibrant and free press, just as we do. India enrolls more than 100,000 students each year in U.S. colleges and universities -- and an effort is underway to grant more visas to provide even greater access in the future. Each day we see our economies working more closely together than ever before. Consistent with this convergence, the 2.2 million Americans of Indian origin are becoming increasingly influential in shaping the dynamics of the U.S. political stage.

These shared characteristics demonstrate that India and the U.S. are ideal partners in exerting a positive influence in the 21st century. The healthy relationship between the two serves as a working example of cooperation between countries of divergent history and composition. Not only does this allow both to display flexibility and candor in dealing with other nations, but it also furthers the common objective of promoting stability in the world. As a co-founder of the Global Democracy Initiative, India has already demonstrated global leadership as a committed democracy. India and the U.S. are working as partners to secure democracy and to defeat extremism in South Asia and around the world.

The recent U.S.-India civilian nuclear initiative has the potential to engender goodwill and partnership. This initiative finally removes the cinder from the eye, ending decades of misunderstanding and distrust about India's nuclear intent and capabilities. The increasing strategic connections between the U.S. and India should progress to closer military coordination -- and cooperation. Exchanges of technology, strategy and troops advance the capabilities and strategic capacities of both democracies. Such exchanges enable the U.S. and India to engage in coordinated action and to function independently at higher levels of proficiency.

U.S.-India military cooperation has already begun. Cooperative efforts in providing relief following the Indonesian tsunami in December 2004 are emblematic of the new relationship. The armed forces of the two nations have intensified collaboration on bioterrorism, homeland security and cyber security, resulting in further understanding and system interoperability. In June 2005, India and the U.S. signed a "New Defense Framework," including coproduction of military hardware. This will have a profound influence, enabling coproduction of U.S. technology on Indian soil, creating countless jobs and providing India with access to critical spares for its new, high-tech armed forces.

The effects of economic cooperation will shape the destiny of the 21st century. The U.S. and India both share an appreciation for free enterprise and market-driven economic progress to benefit citizens at all levels of society. India has been progressively dismantling its commercial barriers while strengthening intellectual property rights. Opening its infrastructure, insurance, banking, pension and retail markets to foreign competition will go a step further in creating the potential of more than $1 trillion in new investment in India's infrastructure sector where it is needed most.

India can be proud of its economic rise, which places it as the fourth-largest economy, with GDP galloping at a rate exceeding 8% annually. Some economic forecasts predict that India's economy measured in absolute dollar terms will overtake Italy, France and Britain in the next decade.

That said, there is still far to go in terms of India developing first-world infrastructure and delivering world-class education and health care to all its citizens. These challenges can best be met by true partnership and U.S.-India cooperation. U.S. industry stands ready to commit massive investment in the form of public-private partnerships, converting these challenges into opportunity. Already, U.S. defense industry leaders such as Pratt & Whitney, Sikorsky, Honeywell, Lockheed Martin and General Dynamics have committed to significant coproduction with Indian partners, recognizing India's engineering prowess. Likewise, U.S. companies have demonstrated a commitment to work with Indian partners to help India achieve a second Green Revolution. The public-private approach that has worked so well in the U.S., which has brought high technology to all aspects of the economy, can serve as a model for India as its farmers work towards achieving greater agricultural productivity.

Thus, the logic of U.S.-India partnership is clear. Strategically, militarily and economically the U.S.-India partnership makes perfect sense. With closer cooperation, India and the U.S. -- and all citizens of both countries -- will reap the rewards of mutual respect and trust working as equal partners in the 21st century.

In Europe, Pushback Against US 'War On Terror' (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0127211

By Robert Marquand
The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007
PARIS

Reaction in Germany was hardly neutral when a prosecutor in Munich indicted 13 CIA officials last week for kidnapping a German of Lebanese descent and interrogating him in Afghanistan before apparently realizing they had the wrong man. Germans solidly backed the prosecutor.

Since Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld took the unprecedented step, both the right and left in Germany have supported the "rule of law" principles he articulated.

The media have been unified as well. Typical is the centrist Süddeutsche Zeitung: "The justice system has stood up for the rule of law. Whether the government will do so is a different matter. Berlin must push for the kidnappers to be extradited, or ... tried in the USA. But it is unlikely to have that much courage."

The solidarity underscores a shifting tone in Europe. As changes of leadership loom in Britain and France, and capitals contemplate relations with a post-Bush US, Uncle Sam may expect stronger "pushbacks" from Europe, experts here say. Public disapproval of the US-led "war on terror" is also growing, spurring the change.

"There is a deep gap between government policy and public opinion in Europe, and that opinion may be shaping the direction here right now," says Frederic Bozo, professor of European Studies at the Sorbonne in Paris. "Europe doesn't want to upset the careful balance with the US. I don't think there is a united opposition against the US at all. But Europe is setting the groundwork for its own identity."

Gordon Brown, who is shortly expected to take over as prime minister in Great Britain, opposed the Iraq war from the start, and has made no secret that he plans to carve out an independent line on the venerable "special relationship" with the US. Many anticipate that British troops will leave Iraq by the end of the year.

In France, even the avidly pro- American Nicolas Sarkozy, current front-runner in the French elections this spring, stated in an interview taped in New York last week that Americans need to "get interested in the world, and the world will learn to love you."

To be sure, European cooperation with the US on a wide range of areas, including counterterrorism, is extremely strong, even in France, where the Chirac government has steadily gone it alone in Europe in opposition to the Iraq campaign.Yet Europeans have steadily refused to accept the concept and phrase, "war on terror," a sentiment that extends to its application to Iraq.

Last week, European Union officials in Brussels sought to reduce the amount of information given to US agencies on air passengers leaving Europe. An official in charge of data protection for the European Central Bank similarly advised that millions of pieces of financial information being sent regularly to the US after Sept. 11 were in violation of EU privacy codes.

The "secret, routine, and massive access" by US agencies to banking SWIFT codes – needed to transfer in and out of European financial institutions – is "unacceptable," stated Peter Hustinx, the Brussels official responsible for EU data oversight.

Boosting this sentiment is Europeans' recognition that the US is also in flux with an election season starting up, and that President Bush's term appears to be winding down with the United States in a vulnerable position overseas.

The US legal basis for conducting interrogation centers at Guantánamo Bay, for example, has long rankled in Europe.

"Most of the French opinion, many of the German people, a large share of the Labor constituency in the UK, the Spanish, and now Italy, don't just oppose the policy, but the basis of US policy," says Georges Le Guelte, of the Institute for International and Strategic Relations in Paris. "You can't have renditions and Guantánamo and talk human rights at the same time. That is more clear to many of us."

In Italy, prosecutors put out warrants several months ago for 25 members of a CIA team that abducted a Muslim cleric in Milan.

Nor is Europe alone in its willingness to speak more pointedly to the White House about its foreign affairs. On page 1 of last Thursday's People's Daily, a newspaper of record in China, a Chinese official criticized Mr. Bush for inflammatory rhetoric that turned the war in Iraq into a "religious war."

The comment was unprecedented in a state where official decorum is rigidly maintained. (For nearly a decade, China has conducted a brutal campaign of summary executions of Muslims in its far-west Xinjiang region, as documented in human rights reports.)

In the case of the Munich renditions, announced Jan. 31, 13 American CIA operatives allegedly apprehended German citizen Khaled el-Masri in Macedonia in 2004 and whisked him to an Afghan prison called "the Salt Pit." Realizing he was the wrong man, they left him on a hillside in Albania five months later, warning him never to talk of his experience. Mr. el-Masri instead filed suit in a Virginia court. Masri's case was dropped in Virginia after arguments that a trial would jeopardize US security operations.

But with help from Spanish police, the Munich prosecutors discovered the identity of the operatives through flight and hotel records in Palma de Mallorca, where they stopped to relax.

On Friday, in Washington, German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that the Munich warrants were only valid in Germany at present, but that Berlin felt the local court might issue an international warrant, according to German papers.

Ms. Rice said the warrants would not harm US-German relations. Justice Department officials have not responded to approaches by the German prosecutors.

Germany's Rising Political Star (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

BERLIN — She is at her most convincing beyond the camera's flash, but German Chancellor Angela Merkel can work a room, turning pragmatism into an erudite, diplomatic charm that has made her Europe's most commanding leader.

She is neither brash nor rash; as a student she deliberated 45 minutes before jumping off a diving board. But despite her quiet manner, Merkel is rising in stature as British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac are set to leave office. She is not as telegenic as Blair, or as suave as Chirac, but her sober intellectual confidence is increasingly influential.

Berlin has improved ties with the Bush administration even though Merkel has refused to send troops to Iraq and has criticized the treatment of terrorism suspects in U.S. custody. Her government is attempting to revive Middle East peace talks, negotiate an end to the crisis over Iran's uranium enrichment program, improve links with China and build a unified Europe less driven by the traditional German-French axis.

"She does not like grand visions. She's a pragmatic politician," said Gerd Langguth, who wrote a biography on Merkel in 2005. "The atmosphere of how Germany is talking to world leaders has changed. Blair is a political lame duck, so is Chirac. Italy and Spain are not very stable. So for the moment, the German chancellor is more important."

Merkel is using this clout to urge the continent's governments to be aggressive about reform and globalization, pushing especially for the loosening of regulations on business and the strengthening of transatlantic economic bonds to compete with India and other rising trading powers. She has cautioned Europe not to retract into a shell of protectionism.

The warning comes as the German economy is emerging from years of slow growth and high unemployment. Consumer confidence is up, and Germany, the world's third-largest economy, is benefiting from cuts to labor protection and social programs — safety net elements that had been championed by Merkel's predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder. But Merkel, who has been in office 14 months, fears the momentum will slip if more reforms aren't passed to keep Germany competitive in global markets.

The chancellor leads a contentious coalition government whose liberals and conservatives have produced no significant domestic reforms. Such deadlock perhaps makes it politically safer for Merkel to dabble in the world's problems, such as meeting with rock star Bono at the recent World Economic Forum in Switzerland, than to try to calm angry pensioners or thousands of German doctors striking for higher salaries.

Merkel's prominence on the international stage follows Schroeder's insistence that the generation of Germany's politicians that came of age after World War II should reassert the nation's voice in world affairs. The two leaders' styles, however, are different; the current chancellor prefers backroom deliberations to public schmoozing, and bar graphs to catchy one-liners.

"I think Mrs. Merkel is more academic, looking at dossiers and acting only after she understands a problem," said Andreas Maurer, an analyst with the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "Schroeder was much more oriented to media exercises ... and acted much more on emotions."

One of Merkel's foreign policy goals is a European Union that gives a more influential role to the newer, weaker members of the alliance. Once dominated by Paris and Berlin, the EU, which has grown to 27 countries, these days represents a continent of looser borders and more diverse voices.

Germany holds the EU's rotating presidency until July, and Merkel has been traveling to Western capitals, such as Brussels, and to former communist capitals, such as Prague, to find consensus on ratifying a European Constitution to fit everyone.

"The exclusivity of the Franco-German relationship is over," Maurer said. "Merkel is much more inclusive of other countries."

Berlin's strategy also has shifted toward Washington. Schroeder was a fierce critic of the Iraq war and other U.S. policies, but Merkel, who has met President Bush six times since 2005, has appeared more sensitive to European-American relations. The change indicates that the continent's ties to the United States, which were strong during the Cold War, are just as strategic in a new era of terrorism and globalization.

DOJ_NMG_0127213

"The U.S. is still the European Union's most important trade partner," Merkel said in Switzerland. "We are also the most important investment partners for each other."

Security concerns have led the chancellor to be active in the Middle East. Her foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, is a key negotiator, along with counterparts on the U.N. Security Council, in the effort to defuse tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions. He also has been working with Washington, the United Nations, Russia and the EU to push for peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

"We know that resolving this conflict or at least making progress would also have an effect on all the other regional conflict," Merkel said last month after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Unlike Schroeder, who was a friend of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin — a circumstance that many analysts say muted German criticism of Moscow's war in Chechnya and human rights record — Merkel is skeptical of Russia. Last year, Merkel, who is a physicist and the daughter of a Protestant minister, irritated the Kremlin when she met with rights groups and opposition figures during a visit to Moscow.

"Merkel is fluent in Russian and she was raised in the former communist" East Germany, Maurer said. "She is using her biography to speak to Europe about Russia."

The chancellor refers to Russia as a strategic partner, but she is unlikely to speak of Putin as a "flawless democrat" the way Schroeder did. She publicly rebuked Moscow several weeks ago when she questioned its reliability as an energy partner after a pipeline dispute between Russia and Belarus temporarily cut oil supplies to Germany.

Germany's largest newspaper, Bild, credited Merkel with bringing "soberness" to Berlin's relations with Moscow. "We depend on oil and gas from Russia, and Russia needs us as buyers.... Germany's interests are in good hands with Merkel. She banks less on feeling than on clear reason," Bild said.

Hamas Attacks Fatah Bases (WT/AP)

By Karin Laub

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip - Hamas gunmen attacked bases of Fatah-allied troops with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades early yesterday, part of a four-day campaign by the Islamic militants to weaken the security forces loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

As night fell, efforts were underway to restore a truce. Gunmen pulled back from their positions, to be replaced by police officers. Both sides began to exchange hostages and joint Hamas-Fatah patrols took to the streets to monitor the cease-fire. Previous truces have broken down quickly.

In the West Bank, a strategy session by Fatah leaders ended in a shouting match, with some participants demanding that Mr. Abbas' party take a tougher stand against Hamas in the struggle for control of the Palestinian government, and others pushing to give a mediation effort by Saudi Arabia a chance. In one particularly angry exchange, participants threw an empty cup and a shoe at each other, witnesses said.

"We all agreed that Hamas has been trying for a long time to impose its control on the Gaza Strip, and Fatah needs to stand up to this policy of Hamas," said Amin Makboul, one of the group's members. Under fierce debate, though, is how to do so.

The infighting among Palestinians has overshadowed new efforts to restart the peace process with Israel. Hamas refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist and its hard-line approach has drawn international sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy. Mr. Abbas has sought negotiations in the past, but lately has been distracted by the power struggle within his own government.

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said yesterday that Israel must not intervene in the internal Palestinian fighting.

"We need to leave Gaza to the Gazans," Mr. Peres told Israel Army Radio. "Our intervention will not help; on the contrary, it will draw all the fire toward Israel. We need to leave the Gazans to deal with it and hope that it settles itself."

Mr. Abbas, Hamas' exiled leader Khalid Mashaal and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas are to meet in Islam's holy city of Mecca tomorrow for reconciliation talks hosted by Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, the highest-profile mediation effort in several weeks of fighting.

The Palestinian ambassador to Saudi Arabia, Jamal Shobaki, said the meeting will be open-ended and will focus on negotiating a platform for a national unity government and distributing Cabinet positions.

More than 130 Palestinians have been killed in the factional fighting since May. The bloodiest round began Thursday, killing 28 persons and wounding more than 230 in four days.

Since Thursday, Hamas gunmen have attacked more than a dozen security installations in what appeared to be a systematic campaign to weaken Mr. Abbas' control of Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0127214

Late Saturday and early yesterday, Hamas fired mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades at a training camp of the Presidential Guard and Mr. Abbas' nearby office compound in Gaza City. Mr. Abbas was not in Gaza during the current round of fighting.

Palestinians Say Clashes Hurt Their Cause (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 4 — The fierce internal clashes between Palestinian factions have shocked many Palestinians and Arab governments, who fear that the continuing bloodshed is damaging the Palestinian image before the world, Palestinians say.

"This fighting affects everyone's morale," said Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian analyst who teaches at Al Quds University here. "We always felt we had this one big asset, our social unity as Palestinians, but to see it shredding, with lives being shed without much concern, is horrible. We've lost a lot of sensitivity to these deaths, to those killed by the Israelis and ourselves."

Even as the Bush administration has moved in its second term to try for significant progress toward peace, Palestinians say their own infighting is making it too easy for Israel to argue that the time is not right to promote a Palestinian state.

Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia have intensified efforts to stop the fighting, some of the worst internal Palestinian violence in years, and to push the warring Fatah and Hamas factions into a unity government of some type, no matter how fragile.

King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia has called a meeting in the holy city of Mecca on Tuesday between the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and senior Hamas figures in the hope of restoring at least a facade of Palestinian unity. "What is happening now is damaging our reputation and our standing with Arab public opinion and with Arab officials," said Mkhaimar Abusada, a political scientist at Al Azhar University in Gaza. "My feeling is that Arab support for the Palestinians is beginning to evaporate. Arabs are looking at us as fighting ourselves now, not the Israeli occupation, and Arab officials are saying that we're not very serious about establishing a state."

Ahmed Abdel Rahman, a former adviser to Yasir Arafat and a member of Fatah's Central Committee, said that "the Palestinian national enterprise is in danger now."

Mr. Kuttab, of Al Quds University, said that since the Israelis pulled out of Gaza in the autumn of 2005, "there has been a lot of hopelessness and frustration and disappointment, with people thinking they can solve everything with a rifle." The political and diplomatic impasse, he said, has fostered violence, and many people believe that Fatah and Hamas are not even sure why they are fighting each other.

"Unfortunately power and violence do produce results in this part of the world," Mr. Kuttab said. "Talk of peace and nonviolence doesn't get us very far, unfortunately."

On Saturday evening in Ramallah, on the West Bank, a fierce argument broke out during a meeting of the Revolutionary Council of Fatah over how to deal with Hamas and the fighting in Gaza, participants said.

The West Bank intelligence chief, Tawfiq Tarawi, criticized some Fatah officials for trying to play "Red Cross" and mediate between Hamas and Fatah, said a security official who was there but did not want to be identified if he mentioned the names of the officials involved.

Mr. Tarawi criticized the former West Bank security chief, Jibril Rajoub, in particular, for blaming Fatah as well as Hamas for the infighting.

During the argument, heated words were exchanged and shoes were thrown, a severe insult in the Arab world. "I have a message from the three Balousha kids," Mr. Tarawi said, referring to three children killed in December on their way to school. Their father, Baha, is a prominent Fatah intelligence official in Gaza. Then he threw his shoes at Mr. Rajoub. The December attack is thought to have been carried out by Hamas supporters.

A consensus emerged from the meeting that Fatah must not bend to Hamas in the Gaza Strip, the unidentified Fatah official said.

Another participant, Amin Makboul, told The Associated Press, "We all agreed that Hamas has been trying for some time to impose its control on the Gaza Strip, and Fatah needs to stand up to this policy of Hamas." But he said there was disagreement over tactics.

The streets were calmer in Gaza on Sunday, as another effort at a cease-fire appeared to be taking hold, and some people ventured out in the morning to buy provisions. But there were clashes during the day, and gunmen from both sides remained on the streets.

Two members of Mr. Abbas's presidential guard died of wounds suffered Friday, and the total of dead since Thursday rose to 28, including 4 children. More ominously, the nephew of Fatah's most powerful figure in Gaza, Muhammad Dahlan, was kidnapped by Hamas on Saturday. Hamas considers Mr. Dahlan its main enemy in Gaza, and Mr. Dahlan is thought to be the unofficial commander of Fatah forces there.

DOJ_NMG_0127215

His nephew, Sharaf Dahlan, 21, works for the Civil Affairs Ministry of the Palestinian Authority but helps out in his uncle's office. On his way to Gaza City on Saturday, his taxi was stopped at a Hamas checkpoint. He handed over his ID and was then taken away.

The news emerged Sunday when Hamas officials said he was providing them with "secrets" about Muhammad Dahlan, though aides to Mr. Dahlan say the young man knows very little.

In the fighting that began on Thursday, Hamas forces have taken most of northern Gaza and large areas of Gaza City. Hamas has destroyed or damaged Fatah security headquarters in the north and taken equipment, weapons and files. But Fatah has defended three of its major compounds in Gaza City: the main security headquarters, the Saraya; the headquarters of the preventive security force; and the presidential compound.

Palestinians are deeply upset that each side has gone after symbolic institutions that belong to the other, including the main Gaza universities and their libraries, which have been attacked by rockets and firebombs.

"Everything the Palestinians fought for in the 1980s and '90s is being undermined in a second," said Diana Buttu, a Palestinian and former aide to Mr. Dahlan and Mr. Abbas. "People were shot and killed to ensure universities stayed open. Now we're blowing up our own universities, and UNRWA is threatening to pull out, and no one cares." UNRWA is the agency that cares for and educates Palestinian refugees and their families.

What is more frustrating, Ms. Buttu said, was that "all the infighting diverts attention from the real issues, like the Israeli occupation and Jerusalem, and instead people are focusing on whether a national unity government emerges based on a political document no one cares about."

In Israel on Sunday, the cabinet approved the appointment of Gabi Ashkenazi as the new military chief of staff, replacing Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who resigned over the war with Hezbollah.

Mr. Ashkenazi, 52, an infantryman and former deputy chief of staff, will be promoted to lieutenant general and will command in about 10 days. Some in the Israeli military argue that Israel should consider a major operation into the Gaza Strip to attack Hamas and seize weaponry, but such a move is considered unlikely now. The Israeli Shin Bet intelligence agency told the cabinet on Sunday that intra-Palestinian fighting was not likely to end soon.

Palestinian Factional Fighting May Spread (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 5, 2007

NABLUS, WEST BANK

Violence between rival Palestinian factions Fatah and Hamas surged in the Gaza Strip for a second consecutive weekend, as at least 25 Palestinians died in three days of Hamas-Fatah fighting. The violence spurred Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Meshal to arrange an emergency summit in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, Tuesday.

Despite the mounting casualties and failed cease-fires in Gaza, internecine strife in the West Bank has been limited and mostly nonlethal. But now the violence is threatening to spill over, as Fatah militants in cities such as Nablus embark on a series of kidnappings as a counterpunch to Hamas gains in Gaza.

"Every day they are killing somebody in Gaza," says Da'as Kanna, a Fatah militant who kidnapped and later released five Hamas men from downtown Nablus. "The Al Aqsa Brigades [Fatah's military wing] in the West Bank can't sit by and watch. We are one Fatah."

A new West Bank battle front would expose nearly twice as many Palestinians to the daily skirmishes that have kept Gazans shuttered indoors, and threaten to drag Israeli forces into the fray.

Over the weekend, Hamas militants landed several blows to Fatah's power base in Gaza, capturing facilities throughout the north belonging to the Fatah-controlled security services of the Palestinian Authority. Hamas fighters abducted on Saturday the nephew of former Gaza security chief Mohammed Dahlan, one of dozens to be kidnapped in the violence, and on Thursday intercepted trucks believed to be carrying arms to forces loyal to Abbas.

Meanwhile, Fatah fighters destroyed laboratories, lecture halls, and a library at Hamas-run Islamic University. They also attacked Gaza's A-Shifa Hospital, thought to be controlled by Hamas.

Hamas starts new West Bank force?

Unlike Gaza, where the sides are thought to be evenly matched, Fatah's superiority in men and arms is undisputed in the West Bank. And yet, Fatah militants are spooked by rumors that Hamas is quietly moving to replicate its Gaza Executive Force, or tanfideyeh, in West Bank.

Bassem Ezbeidi, a Bir Zeit University political science professor, expects the Hamas-Fatah conflict to remain confined to Gaza, but cautions that a West Bank flare-up can't be ruled out.

"Fatah has been very provocative by kidnapping," says Mr. Ezbeidi. "Fatah is sending a message that, 'We are strong here and we are reacting to what Hamas is doing in Gaza.' It's a war of messages"

Militants like Mr. Kanna have spent most of the past six years bracing for Israeli incursions into Nablus. Last week, however, he and as many as 30 Al Aqsa Brigades gunmen ambushed the local Education Ministry building to kidnap five men accused of membership in the Hamas tanfidiyeh.

Brandishing an M-16, Kanna tells how he got word that a group of masked Hamas gunmen had unleashed a round of bullets near the Nablus municipality a week ago, and fled to the Education Ministry, which is controlled by Hamas. Kanna says the Fatah gunmen attacked the ministry building because it allegedly serves as a training base for the tanfidiyeh.

"The Ministry of Education has been used by Hamas as a military camp," he says. "The objective was to tell them we do not recognize the illegal Executive Force."

A stairwell gun battle between Hamas and Fatah sent employees throughout the building ducking for cover behind closed doors.

Kanna claims to have extracted confessions from the five abductees, but they were released several hours later as a quid pro quo for Hamas's decision to release abductees of their own in Gaza. The militant says he planned to continue the tactic of kidnapping Hamas members to use as bargaining chips.

On the same day, Nablus council member Fayad al Aghbar – a Hamas politician – was kidnapped at gunpoint live on camera at a branch of the Arab Islamic Bank. Mr. Aghbar was hooded, taken to a refugee camp, and interrogated about his alleged involvement in the Hamas executive force. He was released after being held for 10 hours.

"It was a violent, uncivilized affair," he says, denying the existence of a new Hamas force. And yet, at an anniversary celebration of Hamas's founding several weeks ago, members of its military wing made a rare public appearance. "Hamas is capable of responding to Fatah's aggressiveness in Nablus, but Hamas leadership is not keen to transfer the chaos in Gaza to the West Bank," says Aghbar .

The fighting could draw in Israel

A Hamas activist was kidnapped in the West Bank city of Jenin on Friday, and on Sunday, Hamas offices in Bethlehem were torched, according to the Palestinian Ma'an News service. On Saturday in Nablus, two more Hamas activists were abducted.

A spike in West Bank violence threatens to draw the Israeli army into the fighting because it controls access to Palestinian towns to block suicide bombers and attacks on Jewish settlers in the region.

"If a confrontation is to take place around Ramallah and Nablus," says Ezbeidi, it's likely that the Israeli army will be forced to become involved. "They will find many ways to intervene and that would have destructive consequences for all sides."

To be sure, among the West Bank's major cities, Nablus is perhaps the most notorious as a den of crime where young Fatah militants have been making their own laws long before the outbreak of widespread clashes with Hamas. Prominent Nablus families are reported to be hoarding weapons in case of an escalation of internecine violence in the West Bank.

The recent Nablus kidnappings were condemned as unproductive by Nasser Juma'a, a Fatah legislator from Nablus who used to lead a division of Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades. He accused Hamas of recruiting members in Nablus for its own security force and of "poking the bees' nest" of Fatah armed groups.

If Hamas unveils a new security force in the West Bank, "we will get to a stage like Gaza. It will escalate matters."

Mr. Juma'a says he's hopeful that Mr. Abbas, Mr. Meshal, and Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh will reach an agreement on a unity government this week at talks hosted by Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Shiites Fear Gains Could Be Lost (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah And Rasheed Abou Al-Samh

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

QATIF, Saudi Arabia, Jan. 30 — As young men beat their chests in street processions marking the Shiite Muslim holiday of Ashura in this Shiite stronghold in eastern Saudi Arabia, Ibrahim al-Mugaiteeb looked on nervously, bracing for the region's political conflicts to close in on this downtrodden community.

With sectarian tensions rising between Sunnis and Shiites throughout the Middle East, and pressure growing on the Saudi government by the country's Sunni leadership, Saudi Shiites, who have made great strides in recent years, are worried that those gains will be rolled back.

"Things are dim and dark, and the worst is still to come," said Mr. Mugaiteeb, a human rights campaigner who runs an unlicensed Saudi human rights monitor here in the Eastern Province. "As always the minorities will be most affected when this is done. But it will affect everyone else too."

DOJ_NMG_0127217

There are still no Shiites in positions of authority, and Shiites are rarely promoted to managerial positions in government and private companies, Shiite leaders here say. There are also virtually no Shiite headmasters in public schools.

More important, the government has stopped short of actually recognizing the minority, they say. Their hard-won rights have yet to be enshrined into law, meaning they could be rescinded at short notice.

Last week, the Sunni governor of Al Hasa, a mixed Sunni-Shiite town in the Eastern Province, banned all blood drives organized by Shiites. Sunni clerics have stepped up their preaching against Shiites recently, declaring them again to be infidels. And earlier this week King Abdullah, speaking of rumors that Shiites are seeking to convert Sunnis, said that such attempts would fail, and that Sunnis would always make up a majority of the world's Muslims.

In recent times, life had been growing better for Saudi Arabia's two million Shiites, who have long suffered religious and economic discrimination. Yet things are growing tenuous again.

After Iran's Islamic revolution in 1979 energized Shiites throughout the region, the allegiance of Saudi Shiites to the state became suspect as the country's Sunni religious leaders began viewing them as a potential fifth column that could bring down the government. When violent riots erupted during Ashura in the early 1980s, the government killed dozens of protesters and arrested thousands, sending many into exile and setting off a decade of repression.

In 1993, King Fahd tried to settle the differences and in 2003 met with a group of Shiite elders who presented him with a petition calling for equal rights. Suddenly, Shiite fortunes turned.

"There were problems before, but with the passing of time and with the insistence of the people for their rights, things have changed," said Sheik Hassan al-Saffar, a longtime opposition leader who has become a primary advocate for engaging with the government. "Saudi politics is much more focused now on delivering rights than ever before."

Sheik Saffar proudly read off a list of some of the important gains the Shiites have made since then: political prisoners have been released and exiles have returned; rituals have been allowed relatively unfettered; Shiites have been allowed to establish meeting halls and build mosques, and they have begun publishing their own religious books and importing some.

Ashura, the holiest period for Shiites, has become something of a litmus test for the change. Just a few years ago the 10-day commemoration of the seventh-century martyrdom of the Imam Hussein, the most defining event for Shiite Muslims, was largely hidden from public view, held in illegal community centers. This week Saudi Shiites burst into the open in the streets of the oil-rich Eastern Province, holding carnivals and re-enactments of the killing.

In Saudi Arabia, the commemorations have grown larger and more colorful. This year, about 500,000 people attended nightly lectures espousing Imam Hussein's virtues and applying the lessons of his life to modern times. Worshipers marched under large posters of Shiite figures as well as posters of the Lebanese Shiite Muslim leader Hassan Nasrallah, and they shared food and gifts, all emphasizing the human battle between good and evil.

Shiites have begun calling for the Saudi government to enshrine their rights, while encouraging residents here to focus their sights on local Saudi issues, not regional or international ones. They say all that they have achieved has been fought for.

"Things have changed here not because the government wanted the change, but because the world itself has changed," said Sheik Nimr al-Nimr, who advocates a more confrontational stance with the government. "We see better conditions not because of government support but because of our demands for change. The government will not give us anything unless we demand it."

Some Shiite leaders read much in the lack of coverage of Ashura in the Saudi news media. "This is one of the most important cultural events for us," said Sheik Fawzi al-Seif, a local Shiite cleric, who notes that the Saudi news media normally cover religious events in faraway places but rarely ever here. "But no one outside of here knows about it."

Sheik Seif said the government had passed up an opportunity to encourage unity and send a signal to the conservative Sunni leaders. But more significantly, he said, the government lends tacit acceptance to those who attack the Shiites by not responding to their actions.

"The big danger we face now is the growing sectarian division in the region and its slow move into the Persian Gulf, which can have explosive conditions," he said. "The fire could reach us very quickly here."

Shiite clerics here insist they are unwilling to have the Shiites used as a political card, either by the United States or Iran. They warn that any confrontation with Iran would put significant strains on the Shiite population, and fear that ultimately it could be split between those supporting Iran and those supporting the government.

"Things were just like this in the 1970s," said Jaffar al-Shayeb, a longtime Shiite campaigner who in 2005 was elected to Qatif's municipal council. He argues that the Shiites have become more politically astute and focused on their internal interests. But still, he worries that could change someday, too.

"Everything seems normal, then an event can come along and turn everything upside down," he said.

Many fear that the dormant militant groups that once existed here could make a comeback as a result. Mr. Mugaiteeb noted, for instance, that cells of Hezbollah in the Hijaz, the Saudi version of the group, could still be put into action.

DOJ_NMG_0127218

"If the U.S. attacks Iran, a lot of people will be violent against the Americans, including Sunnis," he said. "What I want to tell the Americans is that this will not be a picnic."

Doubt Persists On Al-Qaeda Casualties In Somalia Strike (FT)

By William Wallis

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

Ethiopia is working closely with the US to identify Islamist combatants killed in neighbouring Somalia, but there has been no confirmation yet of the death of targeted al-Qaeda suspects, according to Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister.

Mr Meles said the US had been assisting with DNA testing on suspects killed in recent fighting, including a US air strike on Somalia last month.

Bloodied papers had been found belonging to Aden Hashi Ayro, the leader of the militant Somali al-Shabaab militia who Washington believes protected leaders of an east African al-Qaeda cell that bombed US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. But reported sightings suggested he may have survived, Mr Meles said.

Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys and Hassan Turki, two hardline leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, whose expanding rule over southern Somalia prompted Ethiopia's invasion in December, were "alive and moving in and out of Kenya on the border", Mr Meles said. "We do not have definite information on a number of the key al-Qaeda targets. There are reports that one or two of them might have died but we have no confirmation."

During its six-month rule last year, the ICU coalition of Islamists provided the first semblance of law and order in southern Somalia since the 1991 overthrow of dictator Mohammed Siad Barre. Ethiopia invaded Somalia after leaders with alleged links to al-Qaeda threatened a regional jihad.

At the time, critics feared Ethiopian involvement in installing the weak UN-backed Transitional Federal Government would enflame religious tensions and provide a rallying cry for international jihadists.

Some of the defeated Islamists have threatened an insurgency and there has been a series of attacks on Ethiopian and allied troops in Mogadishu in recent days.

Mr Meles played down the risk of escalation. "If the TFG manages to pull off the plans it has for national reconciliation . . then the remnants of the Islamic Courts and international jihadists will be politically marginalised."

Looking For A Deal This Time? (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, February 5, 2007

Like any good diplomat, Christopher Hill knows how to dampen expectations before sitting down to hash out a deal. But more than most envoys, Hill, the top U.S. negotiator in talks resuming in Beijing this week over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs, has ample reason to let some skepticism show.

Fifty-two frustrating months into a confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear weapons programs, the six-nation talks established to rein in Pyongyang's atomic breakout have, so far, netted nothing. Nothing, that is, except neglected promises on paper. In that time, North Korea has tested ballistic missiles and an atomic bomb, declared itself a nuclear power, and multiplied its supply of plutonium from enough for one or two bombs to as many as 13-with most estimates now suggesting six to eight.

Even advocates for negotiations increasingly suspect that, despite its decision to rejoin talks, the North has made a strategic choice to stick with nuclear weapons as the ultimate deterrent to any effort to dislodge Asia's most secretive and anti-American regime. Time, it seems, has been working against Hill and others seeking a deal: With Pyongyang's nuclear buildup and its seeming judgment that the administration is tied down by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may believe that he can wait out President Bush and gain global acquiescence to the North's nuclear status. The U.S. bargaining position, says Gary Samore, director of studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, is "really much weaker."

But it is not just the North's prickly intransigence that has made Hill's task look titanic. Policy struggles within the administration have led to fits of incoherence-or simply straitjacketed U.S. officials assigned to bargain with the North. The lines of battle have pitted hawks, who publicly back the negotiations with the communist North but privately see them as a dead end, against those who favor engagement. "We had warfare going on the entire time I was there," recalls David Straub, a former Korea policy aide who resigned from the State Department last year.

A window on these debates opened last month after the resignation of John Bolton, a key hard-liner who served as the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "Six-party talks have not worked," Bolton said in Tokyo. "Over time," he declared, "the only answer to the North Korean nuclear weapons program is the collapse of the regime." Despite repeated professions of support for a diplomatic approach, Bush himself has shown ambivalence at times about dickering with a dictatorship. He jettisoned the Clinton-era outreach to the North and did not conceal his personal antipathy toward Kim.

As the diplomatic stalemate wore on, hawks found a tool with unexpected capacity to reach out and hurt Kim's regime: a crackdown on money laundering, counterfeiting of U.S. dollars, and other illicit, money-making trade. The administration announced sanctions on a Macao bank alleged to be laundering money for North Korea. That happened just before Hill and envoys from South Korea, Japan, China, Russia-and North Korea-inked a joint statement on principles for nuclear disarmament in return for security assurances, normalization of relations, and economic and energy aid.

North Korea must live up to its pledge to fully dismantle its nuclear program, the main U.S. envoy to disarmament talks said Sunday, as news reports suggested Pyongyang may be willing to shut down a key reactor.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill made the comments in Seoul, where he met South Korean officials to discuss negotiating strategies before the six-nation talks resume in Beijing on Thursday.

North Korea agreed in September 2005 to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"Frankly, we cannot accept anything less than 100 percent implementation of the September statement," said Hill, who declined to comment on the Japanese news reports Sunday. "The ultimate task for us is to complete denuclearization."

He spoke before a meeting with his South Korean counterpart, Chun Yung-woo.

Afterward, Chun said the two sides had "complete consensus" on their strategy for the upcoming talks.

Japan's Asahi Shimbun newspaper reported on Sunday that North Korea was prepared to close the reactor in its main nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency — though the reactor itself would remain off-limits.

Asahi quoted Joel Wit, a former State Department official who was in Beijing following meetings with chief North Korean arms negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other senior officials in Pyongyang.

The North, however, does not intend to close the site used for its October nuclear weapons test, will not allow inspections there, and is not prepared to reveal details of its nuclear weapons program, the report cited Wit as saying. Wit was accompanied by U.S. nuclear expert David Albright and traveled to Pyongyang on an official invitation, the report said.

At the upcoming disarmament talks, North Korea will also demand to be taken off Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism, the report said. It also plans to demand more than 500,000 tons of crude oil a year to compensate for an aborted project to build two light-water reactors in the country, according to Asahi.

Public broadcaster NHK and Kyodo News agency later carried similar reports.

The North will also insist that Washington take steps to lift financial sanctions against North Korean assets held in Macau, imposed over the communist regime's alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency and money laundering, the reports said.

U.S. treasury and North Korean officials last week failed to reach agreement over the financial sanctions. But U.S. officials have since expressed optimism that the financial dispute would not disrupt the main nuclear talks.

The United States had supplied 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil annually to the North until Pyongyang received the two light-water reactors as a reward under a 1994 deal to freeze its nuclear program.

The deal was scrapped in 2002, however, when the nuclear crisis re-emerged and North Korea kicked out IAEA inspectors.

The international arms talks, which involve the U.S., the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia, have made little headway since the 2005 accord — the only agreement reached in the process.

Kim Jr. In Macau (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

It's illegal for North Koreans to leave their country without permission -- a crime for which some of those caught and repatriated by China have paid with their lives. There's one North Korean, however, for whom Beijing rolls out the welcome mat: Kim Jong-nam, the eldest son of dictator Kim Jong Il.

According to a report in Hong Kong's South China Morning Post, Kim Jr. has been residing for the past three years in the Chinese-affiliated territory of Macau, where he's been living the high life at five-star hotels, gambling at Macau's famous casinos and relaxing with friends and family.

The paper reports that the North Korean scion makes occasional pleasure trips to Thailand and Hong Kong on Portuguese and Dominican Republic passports. Lisbon denies it, but the Dominican Republic, Macau and Beijing have kept mum. This isn't the first time the younger Kim has turned up outside his homeland. The Japanese caught him and his young son trying to enter Tokyo on a fake DR passport in 2001, apparently trying to visit Disneyland.

While the 35-year-old enjoys himself in Macau, his 23 million countrymen suffer in the world's most isolated regime. Thanks to malnutrition, most North Koreans are a good foot shorter, on average, than South Koreans. Mr. Kim is well fed and reportedly enjoys late-night whiskey and cognac. His life of luxury is a reminder of how North Korean elites profit from the exploitation of the country's workers.

It's also a reminder of another Macau-North Korea connection that Beijing would like to forget -- the laundering of ill-gotten North Korean money at Macau's Banco Delta Asia. After the U.S. Treasury put the bank on a watchlist in 2005, the Macau government froze $24 million in North Korean accounts and other banks refused to do business with Kim's regime for fear of also being cited.

The six-party talks resume Thursday in Beijing, and Pyongyang is demanding that the U.S. lift sanctions on Banco Delta Asia and hand over the $24 million. Doing so would only encourage Kim Jong Il in the pursuit of the illicit activities that make it possible for him to pay off the generals who sustain his regime -- and keep his son living it up in Macau.

To Reach For The Moon (NSWK)

By Melinda Liu And Mary Carmichael

Newsweek, February 4, 2007

Western analysts still can't say what Beijing was thinking when it shot down one of its aging weather satellites. True, the recent test was a fine show of marksmanship, destroying a refrigerator-size target sailing at orbital speed 500 miles up (as high as U.S. spy satellites). But was it worth risking a new arms race? Was it even worth the mess it caused? The Union of Concerned Scientists says the test left some 2 million pieces of shrapnel in orbit, each one a threat to any country's passing spacecraft. That's why Washington and Moscow gave up such tests decades ago: the space lanes are already littered with too much potentially lethal debris.

The drifting wreckage is a danger not only to other countries' spacecraft but to China's own ambitions for the heavens—which go far beyond blinding the U.S. military. Beijing put its first man into orbit less than four years ago. Today the Chinese are reaching for the moon. The first step, the launching of an unmanned lunar orbiter, is tentatively scheduled for April 17. A three-man mission will orbit the Earth later this year, and a spacewalk is planned for next year. Two years after that, the plan is to put down a lunar rover, followed in 2020 by a craft that will collect lunar samples and bring them home. Eventually Beijing wants to put people on the moon, although the target date remains undisclosed. "Their timetable is absolutely realistic," says Jim Benson, president of SpaceDev, a private space-exploration company in Poway, Calif. "Some of it actually seems a little conservative."

National pride is a big force behind China's moon program, but not the only one. The Chinese are aiming to do more than "just set up a flag or pick up a piece of rock," says Ye Zili of China's Space Science Society. What are they after? A limitless source of clean, safe energy to feed their voracious economy. The stable isotope helium 3 (3He), a potential fuel for nuclear fusion, was first found in moon rocks brought back by the Apollo missions. It is one constituent of the "solar wind" constantly given off by the Sun. The stuff bounces off Earth's magnetic field, but the moon has no magnetic field, and its surface has been soaking up 3He for billions of years. If you could dig it up and put it into a fusion reactor you would get ordinary helium 4 (as in balloons), ordinary hydrogen (as in H2O) and an abundance of radioactivity-free energy. According to Gerald Kulcinski, director of the Fusion Technology Institute at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, a mere 40 tons would be roughly enough to serve America's electrical needs for a year.

Or so the theory goes. The April mission is supposed to learn more about the distribution of 3He on the lunar surface. If significant deposits are found, China's engineers still need to design the world's first lunar mining machines and send them up—while the rest of us shrink in horror at the thought of strip mines on the moon. And meanwhile someone will have to develop a practical reactor. Kulcinski operates what he believes to be the only working model ever built, a device about the size of a basketball that sucks up far more energy than it produces. "We're not even close to breaking even," he says. What would that require? "It couldn't happen for less than tens of millions of dollars and at least 10 to 20 years," he says.

But don't count the Chinese out. "When you have a communist regime in a capitalist network, you have huge amounts of cash and the ability to direct it," says Lawrence Taylor, a director of the University of Tennessee's Planetary Geosciences Institute in Knoxville. "They could run away with this." And if they fail? At least they will have walked on the moon.

Ban Rankles U.N. With Early Moves (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- Ban Ki-moon is off to a rocky start after one month as U.N. secretary-general, with diplomats complaining that his transition is progressing far too slowly and member states resisting his early proposals for restructuring.

DOJ_NMG_0127221

U.N. insiders have questioned his early appointments, saying he is not striking out boldly with his own team, but relying too much on insiders from predecessor Kofi Annan's tenure.

The criticisms, which threaten to overshadow a well-received speech at the African Union summit last week in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, have frustrated members of the transition team and worried Mr. Ban's early supporters.

"He has had a long transition period, and we are a little concerned that we still don't know what he is thinking," said one Western diplomat of Mr. Ban's first month in office. "They haven't briefed us on appointments or priorities. Everything is still a priority."

Some diplomats, U.N. elder statesmen and pundits say that Mr. Ban's team of handpicked aides -- many who came with him from the South Korean Foreign Ministry -- has been slow to reach out for advice from seasoned hands.

Permanent U.N. staff members acknowledge that they should have done a better job of explaining the first two planks of Mr. Ban's restructuring plan, which called for folding the U.N. disarmament department into the political-affairs department and splitting the peacekeeping department in two.

Both proposals received a chilly reception from member states last week. And until the structure of those departments is sorted out, officials say, it will be impossible to choose people to lead them.

A coalition of developing nations and Japan already has forced Mr. Ban to back away from his plan to merge the U.N. disarmament department with political affairs and is resisting a plan cut the disarmament agency's staff and have it report directly to Mr. Ban.

In a letter circulated last week, Mr. Ban said there is a "need for a greater role and personal involvement of the secretary-general in the field of disarmament and nonproliferation."

The letter noted that the existing department has produced little of significance.

"The department needs energizing," one senior U.N. official told The Washington Times, noting that a recent conference to review the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty collapsed because no one could agree on substantive steps.

But that is not the way U.N. delegations are hearing the message.

Developing countries resent Mr. Ban's insistence on acting immediately on the proposal, and in a letter to the president of the General Assembly last week, they insisted that changes be discussed in the assembly's budgetary and management committees, "in a manner that is smooth and nondivisive."

Regional groups will continue to discuss the proposals this week and will meet with senior members of Mr. Ban's staff.

The backlash against the disarmament proposal "was so predictable," said a frustrated U.N. official, who noted that Mr. Ban had been repeatedly counseled to consult with key players to prepare the General Assembly for change.

"There has to be a plan, and you have to ready the battlefield, and this plan was launched before it was ready," the official said.

There is also concern about Mr. Ban's proposal to split the $4 billion peacekeeping department in two, with one side handling political and military affairs and the other administration and support of 18 peace missions.

Setting up a separate department will mean new high-level posts and increased spending that will either be borne by richer governments or gouged out of other budgets. Neither option has gathered much support, despite an acknowledged need to improve the management of the logistically complex peacekeeping department.

Within Mr. Ban's inner circle, there is a sense of disappointment that their message was not better-received. In conversations this week, several senior officials acknowledged that they should have held earlier consultations with key figures and done a better job of explaining their ideas.

UK Battles Europe's Largest Birdflu Outbreak (FT)

By Clive Cookson And John Aglionby

Financial Times, February 5, 2007

The UK authorities were on Sunday killing tens of thousands of turkeys in an effort to contain Europe's largest outbreak of H5N1 bird flu on a commercial poultry farm.

A biosecurity zone has also been set up around the Bernard Matthews farm in Suffolk, as a precaution against the deadly virus spreading.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said on Sunday night that the gassing operation, which has already killed 51,000 of the 159,000 turkeys on the farm, would continue on Monday. Their carcasses are being transported in "sealed, leak-proof lorries" for high-temperature rendering at a plant in Staffordshire.

Three security zones have been set up around the farm in Holton, which is 27km south-west of Lowestoft port on the east coast. Stringent precautions are in force in the 3km inner "protection zone" and 10km outer "surveillance zone". In addition a much wider “restricted zone” covers 2,090 sq km; here poultry have to be isolated from wild birds and all movements must be licensed.

The Suffolk H5N1 outbreak, the first to affect poultry in the country, follows a similar infection among geese in Hungary two weeks ago. Before that, Europe had had no reported cases of avian flu since last August. In Asia and Africa too there is an upsurge of international concern about the spread of the disease, after a few months in which bird flu had slipped out of the news media in most parts of the world.

On Saturday the World Health Organisation confirmed Nigeria’s first human death from bird flu – a 22-year-old woman.

In Japan, the National Institute of Animal Health said the country’s latest bird flu outbreak, its fourth this year, was caused by the H5N1 virus. Japanese Authorities have already ordered the killing of 93,000 chickens on a farm in Miyazaki prefecture on the southern island of Kyushu.

But the worst affected country remains Indonesia, where at least five people have died already this year, all but one in and around Jakarta. The government last month ordered the slaughter of the tens of millions of unlicensed backyard birds in the capital and the two surrounding provinces.

David Nabarro, the United Nations’s bird flu coordinator, on Sunday urged Indonesia to declare a national emergency to fight H5N1 virus, which is endemic in poultry across much of the country. This “focuses the minds of everybody into understanding what’s going on”, he told the Financial Times in an interview during a visit to Jakarta.

Dr Nabarro was heartened by the new “real momentum to scale up the effort to deal with bird flu” in Indonesia. But he warned ministers against repeating recent statements that some previously infected areas were now bird flu-free.

Brussels said on Sunday that the the UK had followed the correct procedures in dealing with the outbreak and had informed it in good time. The European Commission will on Monday formally endorse the security cordon established by the UK. Then on Tuesday government vets from all 27 member states will discuss how to deal with the return of bird flu.

An EU spokeswoman said she did not expect any internal or external pressure for a trade ban. “Last year there were 14 outbreaks in different member states and no calls for import bans. Trading partners have confidence in our measures,” she said.

French Blacks: J'accuse Racism (WT)

By Elizabeth Bryant

The Washington Times, February 5, 2007

PARIS -- France's comfortable image of itself as a colorblind society -- already weakened by race riots in 2005 -- received a further blow last week when a new survey found that a majority of French blacks believe they face discrimination in daily life.

Coinciding with a disturbing television documentary about living as a black person in France, the survey by the TNS-Sofres polling agency is the first of its kind and is galvanizing public debate just weeks before presidential election.

"This is going to change things," predicted Patrick Lozes, president of the Representative Council of Black Associations, an advocacy group that commissioned the survey. "Until now, blacks have never been counted in this country. And I have always said that blacks who aren't counted don't count."

There is no legal way to count France's black population. Census-takers and other government statisticians are barred by law from compiling figures based on religion or race. But the poll, which appears lawful, suggests France's cherished values of "egalite" and "fraternite" remain elusive goals for the nation's estimated 5 million blacks.

Of the 13,000 blacks surveyed, 61 percent said they experienced at least one racist incident within the past year. More than one in 10 said they were frequently the target of racism that ranged from verbal aggression to difficulty finding housing or jobs.

"The findings don't surprise me at all," said Mouloud Aounit, president of the Movement Against Racism and for Friendship Between Peoples, an anti-discrimination group. "Racism exists in our daily life. Look at the Senate, the National Assembly, regional councils. Ethnic representation is totally absent."

"Racism isn't daily, but I face it from time to time," agreed security guard Jacques Bassong, 36, who moved to France from his native Cameroon in 1979. "A little bit at work, at government offices, even in the stores. Some French are more racist than others, but on average, it's bearable."

Until now, much of the hand-wringing about minorities has focused on France's estimated 5 million ethnic Arabs.

The seething anger among young "beurs," French-born children of North African immigrants, grabbed the spotlight in the fall of 2005, when riots spread across France. But it was the accidental deaths of two black African teenagers, reportedly while fleeing police, which sparked the violence in the first place.

Today, only 10 of 577 National Assembly members are black, and all were elected from overseas territories. Blacks remain similarly underrepresented in the private sector, being less likely than whites to find jobs and to be promoted when they do.

DOJ_NMG_0127223

Last week, France's Canal+ channel aired a two-part documentary, "In the Skin of a Black," a local spin on the U.S. reality series "Black. White," which aired early last year on the FX cable-TV network.

The French program tracked a series of small and large humiliations faced by members of a white French family that, using heavy makeup, had swapped places with a black family.

"It's important to show to our society what it doesn't see or know," said Mr. Lozes, who wants the government to adopt affirmative-action policies.

French politicians stumping in this year's presidential and legislative races are beginning to grasp the potential power of the minority vote, particularly since a voter-registration drive has been stunningly successful in many low-income areas where minorities live.

Mr. Lozes' organization has not ruled out fielding a black presidential candidate for the coming election. But France has no nationally known prospect comparable to Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, on the horizon.

"France is in no way ready to elect a Mohammed ... as president of the Republic, unfortunately," anti-discrimination activist Mr. Aounit said.

Seeing What We Want To See In Qaddafi (NYT)

By Hisham Matar

The New York Times, February 5, 2007

Paris

SINCE 2003, Libyan diplomats have been hard at work convincing the West that Libya is no longer interested in amassing weapons of mass destruction, blowing up Western airplanes or covertly financing armed movements abroad. Presenting this new face has been largely effective: sanctions, in place since 1982, have been lifted; Libya has been removed from the United States roster of terrorist nations; and the list of international trade agreements continues to grow.

As part of this public relations drive, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi and his officials have been keen to reassure Libyan critics that it is now safe to return to Libya. Unsurprisingly, the vast majority of the hundreds of thousands of exiled Libyans have not returned. However, one did: Idrees Boufayed, a doctor living and working in Switzerland. On Sept. 30, 2006 he returned to Libya for the first time in 16 years. And on Nov. 5, he disappeared.

Throughout its 37-year rule, the Qaddafi government has found as many reasons to arrest its citizens as Libyans have found to abandon their country. Thousands of critics of the Qaddafi regime, inside and outside Libya, have either disappeared or been assassinated. My father, the political dissident Jaballa Matar, disappeared from his home in Cairo in March 1990. We still do not know whether he is alive or dead.

Astonishingly, on Dec. 29 — 55 days after his arrest — Dr. Boufayed was released. The Libyan authorities offered no explanation for his detention. And Dr. Boufayed, who had been a regular contributor to dissident Web sites, has remained uncharacteristically silent ever since. This change in behavior is not unusual: almost all political dissidents fortunate enough to be released have given up their criticism of the regime. The machinery of Colonel Qaddafi's government is as effective as ever.

Now that the United States has incorporated the Libyan regime into its so-called war on terrorism, it is difficult to see what political pressure it can exert on the Libyan government to reform. Western governments have had the power to effect change in Libya only as long as the dictator's government has hungered for the West's acceptance. The short-sighted paranoia with which the war on terrorism has been managed has weakened any moral advantage the United States might once have had.

The cards surrendered were hugely undervalued: the United States could have compelled the Libyan dictatorship to do much more than just hand over its outdated weapons of mass destruction and compensate the families of the victims of the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jet over Lockerbie, Scotland, with $2.7 billion — a sum that would be earned back in trade deals during the first week after sanctions were lifted.

Although America has highlighted the issue of human rights in its negotiations with Libya, none of the countries that now profit from a close association with the Libyan leadership has demanded the release, or even the trial, of the silenced political prisoners who crowd Libya's prisons. No country made it a condition in negotiations that Libya investigate the countless cases of the "disappeared." None of them compelled the Qaddafi government even to address the massacre at Abu Salim prison, where, one night in June 1996, more than 1,000 political prisoners were shot dead.

In its 2003 negotiations with Libya, the United States lost a golden opportunity to link the improvement of Libya's dismal human rights situation to its acceptance into the international community. Indeed, it can be argued that the United States has instead helped worsen human rights in Libya. It has not only defended torture, which has softened the critical gaze on Libya's own practice of torture, but also encouraged the practice by sending Libyans suspected of terrorism to Tripoli for "interrogation."

Furthermore, Colonel Qaddafi has used the new panic — that the Islamist bogeyman will imminently shroud the world under his dark beard — as an excuse to silence the regime's critics. That tactic has fomented rather than curbed religious extremism in Libya as elsewhere.

The impression that a bloodless battle has been won in Libya rests on an inflated notion of the threat the country, even with its rusty weapons of mass destruction, ever posed to the West. It misreads an act of diplomatic negligence toward the rights of the Libyan people as a victory for world peace.

Colonel Qaddafi deserves sole credit for Libya's foreign policy U-turn. He has never found it necessary to devote himself to a single political ideology; his only consistent policy has been to guard his personal political survival. The United States and Britain understand this, but have only exploited it for their own myopic objectives, forgetting that Libya's political development can lie only with its people.

A Palace For Sudan (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

Last week China's leader, Hu Jintao, provided Sudan with an interest-free loan to build a presidential palace. With that gesture, Hu demonstrated his contempt for the Western understanding of the world -- and for Western policy toward his own country.

Sudan, you will recall, is the scene of the Darfur genocide. Since the killing began three years ago, the United States and its allies have flown in food and medicines, provided logistical help and money for a token African peacekeeping force, and done their best to isolate the Sudanese regime, which orchestrates the massacres. They have done this not because they have a selfish interest in Darfur but because tossing babies into bonfires is a crime against humanity.

In the run-up to Hu's visit to Sudan on Friday and Saturday, there were hopes that the Chinese leader would back the West's Sudan policy.

China's diplomats are forever reassuring the world about their country's "peaceful rise," and Hu duly expressed support for an expanded peacekeeping force in Darfur. But everything else about his visit demonstrated the gap between Chinese and Western priorities.

Hu called on nations to "respect the sovereignty of Sudan." But since the end of the Cold War, the Western view of sovereignty has grown increasingly contingent. If a nation slaughters its civilians (think Rwanda, Kosovo), harbors terrorists (Afghanistan) or refuses to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors (yes, Iraq), it forfeits its right to sovereignty. It may not be invaded, but it certainly can expect to face sanctions.

Sudan, by these standards, is an easy candidate for sanctions. But China's talk of "sovereignty" is code for the opposite policy. As well as paying for a presidential palace, Hu used his trip to cancel $80 million of Sudanese debt, to announce a plan to build a railway line and to visit an oil refinery that China partly owns, basking in the fact that 80 percent of Sudan's oil goes to his country.

Hu's visit was a statement that, in the Chinese view of the world, the principle of sovereignty trumps even the most appalling human rights abuses: It brushed aside the memory of the Rwandan genocide and the Holocaust. But at the same time, Hu was saying more than that. He was advancing an understanding of modernization that the West discarded 15 years ago.

By pursuing commercial ties with Sudan, Hu was implicitly saying that economic development comes first and that political development is unimportant. This was once the view of Western development organizations, which financed projects in health, education, infrastructure and so on -- but steered clear of human rights, corruption and anything else that could be deemed "political." But in the early 1990s, the Western approach changed. Development experts pointed out that independent courts and newspapers help to limit corruption and so make economic development possible. In the absence of minimal political accountability, aid money is stolen. Rather than helping Africa's poor, it is siphoned off to pay for presidential palaces.

China is not financing a presidential palace by mistake; it is doing so deliberately. It is not financing just any presidential palace; it has chosen a president so odious that his fellow African leaders hold their noses at him. But this gesture is only the tip of the iceberg. To read the accounts of Hu's Africa visit in China's People's Daily is to recall Western development thinking of a half a century ago. "From 1995 to 2003, China administered 43 sessions of the 'Advanced Education and Scientific Research Program' in 21 African countries," the paper's online version crowed yesterday. Development, in this conception, is all about technical transfers. Politics plays no part.

This Chinese understanding of development threatens to undermine the Western one. Western development aid is increasingly linked to measures of good governance, and investment from Western corporations and banks comes with conditions designed to ensure that ordinary people benefit. This promising advance cannot succeed if African dictators can ignore Western conditions with Chinese assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0127225

But then there is an even more disturbing question: What does China's policy toward Sudan say about the West's policy toward China? The West is engaging with China on the theory that economic modernization will bring political modernization as well; otherwise, the West would merely be assisting the development of a communist adversary. China's Sudan policy is an assertion that this link between economic and political modernization is by no means inevitable, even in the extreme case. You can construct oil refineries, educate scientists, build ambitious new railways -- and simultaneously pursue a policy of genocide.

Bangladesh On The Brink (WSJ)

By C. Christine Fair And Sumit Ganguly

The Wall Street Journal, February 5, 2007

With the world's attention focused on whether accountable government can take root in Iraq, the democratic life blood of a much larger Muslim country -- Bangladesh -- is seeping away with hardly a murmur from the international community. Home to 147 million people and once considered a stable, secular Muslim democracy, Bangladesh is becoming a de facto military-controlled state.

Earlier this month, scheduled elections were cancelled and a state of emergency was imposed when the caretaker government stepped down under military pressure. The government is now headed by Fakhruddin Ahmed, a former World Bank official, along with 10 advisors and no functioning parliament. Mr. Ahmed has pledged to hold elections soon, but all indications suggest that the army is in control. While some foreign and domestic observers are optimistic that the army can clean up the corruption and dysfunctional political structure, this is wishful -- even dangerous -- thinking. The international community must act immediately to compel Dhaka to lift the state of emergency, restore full rights, withdraw the army from the political arena, and establish a specific date for credible elections.

Some 60,000 troops have been deployed in recent weeks and more than 2,000 people have been detained. With a history of prolonged military rule since gaining independence from Pakistan, the army's political adventurism is unlikely to rehabilitate Bangladesh's feeble democracy. The international community has not learned from Pervez Musharraf's similar experiment in Pakistan. Under Gen. Musharraf, democracy has not flourished and the political parties have not become more competent.

The roots of Bangladesh' problems run deep. The political system has been destroyed by an acrimonious power struggle between the Bangladesh National Party, led by the most recent prime minister, Khaleda Zia, and the opposition Awami League, led by the former PM, Sheikh Hasina Wajed. Both have prioritized personal gain above the needs of the state. They have forged Faustian bargains with Islamist groups to maximize their chances of victory. Since the 2001 elections, Islamist parties have become king-makers and enjoy some ministerial positions, which are not earned by their electoral strength. Some of these parties have been linked to terrorist groups.

These terrorists have targeted secular artists and intellectuals, Sufi shrines, the minuscule Ahamaddiya community, and key members of the opposition. In August 2005, within an hour's span, Islamist militants detonated hundreds of small bombs across the country and demanded that Bangladesh become an Islamic state based on Shariah. While some of the most notorious Islamist militants were detained, key members of Harkat-ul-Jihad-Bangladesh and Jagrata Muslim Janata Bangladesh remain at large.

Bangladesh is responsive to public exhortation and receives significant international aid. Donor countries can achieve leverage if they coordinate and render some forms of assistance conditional. Multilateral agencies can pressure Dhaka by convening high-profile meetings to discuss democracy. Some bilateral programs, such as U.S. aid to security forces, are subject to the provisions of the Leahy amendment, which restricts aid when there are human-rights abuses. Public discussions of the Leahy requirements may exert pressure on those institutions that value U.S. security programs. Finally, the U.S. and the Commonwealth (of which Bangladesh is a member) have a suite of punitive measures should there be martial law. The army must be reminded of this to discourage any extraconstitutional action -- and to teach it that the suppression of democracy cannot be a cost-free business.

Ms. Fair is the managing editor of India Review. Mr. Ganguly is a professor of political science at Indiana University, Bloomington.

Russian Retail Politics (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

MOSCOW -- The government recently outlawed foreign migrant workers at Russian retail markets as of April 1. A similar restriction cuts out middlemen by requiring that at least half of all salespeople sell their own produce. The official rationale is that this legislation protects domestic producers. But this politically motivated, hasty decision is more likely to harm Russian consumers and further exacerbate the situation of migrant workers.

DOJ_NMG_0127226

The affected markets are vast premises where salesmen pay for counter space and offer produce and other goods such as clothes. Buyers looking for lower prices or fresher produce than in conventional stores find such foods as homegrown or imported fruit and vegetables, homemade preserves, cottage cheese, pickles, meat and fish.

Given Russia's climate, throughout most of the year vegetables and especially fruit are imported from warmer parts of the world. But the law seeks to impose the same pattern on all regions, even though the products and markets in southern Russian and areas beyond the polar circle are not at all alike. Without the choices provided by middlemen, diet options in many places will be reduced to carrots, potatoes, cabbage and little else.

The new regulations were probably a reaction to growing ethnic intolerance, which took an alarming turn late last summer when a riot in the northwestern town of Kondopoga forced non-Slavic residents to flee, and their businesses were looted and burned. The Russian government is concerned about controlling such hostility, especially in an election year, when any sign of autonomous activism is regarded as a potential threat to the political status quo.

Propagation of tolerance is only a marginal policy for the Kremlin -- it would hardly be efficient given the current degree of xenophobia -- so instead it opted to co-opt the spreading nationalist sentiments. In October, President Vladimir Putin called for "additional measures to improve trade in . . . retail markets in order to protect the interests of the Russian manufacturers and . . . the native population of Russia." He reiterated this concern, in a more balanced form, in his annual news conference on Thursday, saying that "labor market issues . . . have not always been settled to the benefit of Russia's own people, its own citizens."

By this time, however, government monitoring had found that migrant workers at the markets were not a national issue: They were in high proportion to natives only in Moscow and the Far East.

This is not surprising, since those regions are the two that experience workforce shortages, making migrant workers a necessity. In Far East areas near China, this need is filled by Chinese workers, many of whom cross the border to sell cheap goods.

The new regulations have already pushed Chinese traders to sell their stock at catchpenny prices and leave. And local news reports indicate that the markets are staying empty: "The benefit of the new regulation looks vague. But the disadvantages are evident," reported a newspaper in Sakhalin, in the Far East. "For the time being there's no replacement for the cheap Chinese goods and southern fruit."

A Moscow official echoed those concerns: "Do we want to leave the Muscovites without tangerines, raisins and dried apricots?"

Other problems are expected because the law enables employers to cancel contracts with migrant workers without a court decision. Significant numbers of migrant workers could find themselves jobless. Meanwhile, Muscovites are unlikely to want the low-paying, menial jobs of market salesmen. "The citizens of Russia don't wait in lines to take those 28 to 30 thousand jobs in market trade that [the new law] will require. This is a serious vacuum that will have to be filled before April 1," the Moscow official said.

These consequences should have been obvious before the law was enacted. But there wasn't much time -- or desire -- for discussion, as is the case when an initiative originates with the president. After Putin asked his ministers to protect native manufacturers at the markets, the cabinet issued a regulation restricting foreigners' presence in retail trade; in less than three months a bill was put together, passed by both chambers of parliament and signed into law.

Such actions corrode what respect for law and lawmaking is left here. Local officials will probably think of ways around the restrictions, and some are sure to take advantage of new opportunities for graft. Still others expect that the absurdity of some provisions and the damage the law is inflicting on consumers will lead to its revision. Indeed, shortly after the new regulations -- drafted by his own ministry at the president's urging -- took effect, German Gref, the minister of economic development and trade, said a full ban on the employment of migrant foreign workers may be postponed.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Responds To Hayat Retrial Motion, Dispute Juror Misconduct Claim. The Sacramento Bee (2/4, B1, Walsh) reported, "Federal prosecutors said Saturday there is little or no evidence to support allegations of juror misconduct in a motion for a new trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity. Misconduct claims on behalf of Hamid Hayat are barred by rules of evidence, cannot be substantiated, actually describe proper conduct, or describe conduct not harmful to Hayat, prosecutors maintain in a 187-page brief opposing a new trial. In their October motion, defense attorneys cite a statement by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a 'hangman gesture' and once said 'hang him' in discussions with other jurors during the trial." The Bee adds, "Burrell erroneously rejected the defense's attempt to present James Wedick, a retired FBI agent, as an expert witness on the bureau's policies and procedures for interviews, the defense lawyers argued in their motion. … But the prosecutors argued in Saturday's brief that Wedick's testimony 'would have been needlessly confusing, cumulative and wasteful of time.'"

The Stockton Record (2/4, Hood) reported that in addition to addressing the juror misconduct allegations, prosecutors "stated the defense's claim that it has new proof of Hayat's innocence -- the testimony of Hayat cousins Usama Ismail and Jaber Ismail of Lodi -- is not accurate, saying there is a legal difference between 'newly discovered' and 'newly available' evidence, because they did not subpoena Usama Ismail to testify and made no effort to obtain testimony from Jaber Ismail, who was in Pakistan during the trial." The AP (2/4) noted, "The defense motion also highlights post-trial statement's by Cote in an Atlantic magazine report suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings. Prosecutors answered that the Atlantic article should be given little weight and that 'it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a "racist statement," or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds.'"

Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges Faces Continuing Legal Battles. The Daily Southtown (IL) (2/4, Hack) reports, "Attorneys for Mohammed Salah, who was acquitted of racketeering charges last week, have vowed to keep working to clear the name of the Bridgeview man deemed a terrorist by the federal government and to help his family lead a normal life. … 'These good people have had their lives put through the wringer,' longtime Salah attorney Matthew Piers said Friday. 'We are not done fighting on behalf of this family.'" The Southtown continues, "While the long-looming threat of a hefty prison sentence may now be off the table, Salah still faces an uncertain future of civil-court judgments, restricted liberties and the stigma of the government's terrorist label." The Southtown adds, "Salah, 53, was acquitted Thursday of the terrorism-related charges after a three-month trial. He was found guilty of a far lesser charge of obstruction of justice, but the overall outcome marked a dramatic victory for the defense in a case once touted by the U.S. Justice Department as an important component of the war on terror. … 'If this is the government's idea of the war on terror, it should keep us all awake at night,' said Piers, a vocal critic of several federal anti-terror cases unveiled after 9-11. 'This was a political prosecution plain and simple, and I think everyone in that courtroom knew it.' … In the racketeering case, Salah was accused of breaking American laws to aid the militant Palestinian group Hamas, which is considered a terrorist group by the U.S. government. According to federal prosecutors, he delivered laundered money to Hamas operatives in the Occupied Territories in the early 1990s and helped recruit would-be terrorists." The Southtown notes, "The obstruction charge normally wouldn't carry much prison time, although prosecutors might push to have Salah's 1993 conviction in an Israeli military court on Hamas money-running charges count against him here. Defense attorneys, who insist the Israeli conviction was the result of bogus confessions tortured out of Salah during a two-month interrogation session, contend Salah should receive only probation for the U.S. conviction. … Also hanging over Salah's head is a 1998 civil case filed by federal prosecutors in a bid to seize $1.4 million in cash and assets they claimed Salah meant to funnel to Hamas. That civil case was put on hold as a criminal probe into Salah's alleged Hamas links stopped and started over the years."

Columnist Blasts US Over Treatment Of Arar. In a column for the St. Petersburg (FL) Times (2/4), Robyn E. Blumner writes, "'On behalf of the United States, I wish to apologize to you and your family,' President Bush told Maher Arar in a televised news conference, during which the president announced that the United States was also giving Arar $8.9-million in compensation for our role in sending the Canadian to a Syrian prison where he was tortured. … Okay, now it's time to wake up from a dream. This scene happened all right, not in the United States but in Canada, and the nobly contrite politician was Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, not our own Decider-in-Chief." Blumner continues, "Since Arar's return to Canada, our neighbor to the north has committed itself to investigating its role in this outrage. A two-year inquiry by Justice Dennis O'Connor concluded that there was no evidence linking Arar to terrorism and that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were demonstrably wrong when they informed U.S. border agents that Arar was suspected of Islamic extremism. The head of the RCMP resigned over the incident. … Canada has now issued a very public apology, coming straight from its national leader, and the nation will compensate Arar for its hand in his terrifying ordeal … Before George W. Bush came to the White House, I would have expected our own government to act in a very similar manner: a public apology, the rolling of heads responsible, a promise to exert tighter controls and due compensation to the victim. … Instead, we've responded to Arar by keeping him, his wife and his children on a government watch list so that they cannot travel in or over our country or its territories. We have stymied his lawsuit against the United States for abducting and deporting him, claiming that to allow it to go forward would jeopardize state secrets. And, perhaps most galling, even though it is an open secret that we send people to other countries for interrogation where they are sure to be tortured, we continue to claim that our actions are consistent with the Convention Against Torture - a treaty that explicitly bars such conduct." Blumner notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claim that there is reason to keep Arar on a watch list. But when Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, examined Arar's confidential U.S. files, he announced that there was 'nothing new' to justify any continued suspicion. … Gonzales could only reiterate the bald-faced lie that the United States tries to meet its antitorture treaty obligations. How lame. … When Canada is better at demonstrating American values than we are, it's time our government took a refresher in Civics 101. Learn how to apologize and admit error and maybe our great nation will live up to its billing once again."

WAR NEWS:

Addressing House Democrats, Bush Says Iraq War Is "Sapping Our Nation's Soul." The AP (2/3) reports President Bush "squarely addressed the issue most on the mind of House Democrats, saying Saturday that deep divisions over the Iraq war need not bring anyone's patriotism into question. 'You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that,' Bush said. … He said disagreeing with him over the war -- as many in the room do -- does not mean 'you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do.' 'You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe,' the president said. 'These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do.' Bush's conciliatory words were similar to some of his previous statements. But the applause that followed them offered some indication that this audience was happy to hear them so directly and in person."

All three broadcast networks reported on the meeting, generally casting the President's visit in a positive light. ABC World News (2/3, story 5, 2:30, Weir, 8.78M) said, "A day of political fence mending as President Bush reached out to House Democrats at their meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia. The President hasn't addressed the Democrats gathering since 2001, and poked a little him fun at himself with his opposition now in power in Capitol Hill. But for all the banter, divisions, especially over Iraq, were very much in evidence." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 5, 1:40, Chen, 7.66M) said that Democrats" stopped just short of licking their chops as they welcomed the other team's quarterback into their arena," but "both sides canned the usual trash talk. The President stayed away from his pre-election 'cut-and-run slams' against Democrats' plans for Iraq, and gave a nod to the Speaker's demands for benchmark for Iraq's leaders." NBC Nightly News (2/3, story 3, 2:30, Yang, 9.87M) said, "The last time President Bush met with House Democrats like this was February 2001. He just had been elected; 9/11 was months away. Today's visit was very different. The tone on both sides was concilatory."

On its Web site, The Hill (2/3, Kaplan) reports Bush "admitted that the country's morale has suffered because of the war in Iraq. Bush said that the war in Iraq is 'sapping our nation's soul,' as part of his answer to a question from Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) about why the burden of fighting the Iraq war has fallen primarily on the military. … Democratic aides were stunned at the pronouncement perhaps recollecting President Carter's pronouncement in 1979 that there exited a 'crisis of the spirit in our country.'

The Politico (2/3, Hearn) reports that when "asked whether the president had responded to Democrats' criticism of his plan to send more troops to Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., offered a flat: 'No.' 'The president really stood his ground on Iraq,' she said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Levey, 850K) reports Bush "invite[d] the new congressional majority to work with him on immigration, energy and even national security. … But even the meticulous planning that went into the encounter could not conceal the deep divisions" and "no issue brought out the divisions more than the war in Iraq. The president devoted less than two minutes of his 16-minute address to the subject. And his attempt to highlight common ground over the feeling that the Iraqi government should do more to bridge sectarian divisions offered little comfort to his critics. The president suggested, as he has before, that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki would have to meet a list of 'benchmarks,' including providing adequate troops to help American soldiers in Baghdad. But Bush did not discuss timetables for Maliki's government or specify consequences if it should fail — omissions that have been repeatedly criticized by Democrats."

Bush Strikes Conciliatory Notes During Speech. The AP (2/3, Loven) reports, "Relying on self-deprecating jokes, unusual candor and outright flattery, President Bush on Saturday wooed lawmakers he not only needs but will have to answer to in the final two years of his presidency."

The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Abramowitz, Kane, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation," reports that the president, "forced by circumstance to reach out to some of his strongest adversaries, appealed directly to House Democrats on Saturday to work with him to reform the immigration system, limit the cost of Social Security, curb the consumption of gasoline and balance the federal budget. Visiting the Democrats' annual retreat for the first time since 2001, the president told lawmakers there are 'big things' they could accomplish by working together and sought to defuse any bad blood with self-deprecating humor. He opened his public remarks with an allusion to his tendency to mispronounce the name of the rival party by calling it the Democrat Party, seen by many party activists as a calculated insult." According to the Post, "Democrats rose to politely applaud Bush before and after the speech, a sign of the outwardly cordial and respectful nature of the day's session."

The New York Times (2/4, A26, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "for nearly two hours, Mr. Bush held forth with some of the very Democrats he has spent the better part of six years sparring with. He spoke to members of Congress and their spouses, took pointed questions in a private session about Iraq, the budget deficit and immigration, and shook hands and posed for pictures. … The political reality, of course, requires Mr. Bush to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency if he wants his legacy to include legislation like overhauling the nation's immigration and health care systems, and beginning to curb America's dependence on foreign oil. … The president's speech, which lasted about 16 minutes, was interrupted by applause 21 times. Occasionally, the clapping seemed tepid, as some legislators looked across the room to see whether fellow Democrats were joining in. At other times, particularly if Mr. Bush delivered a self-deprecating line, the clapping boomed."

The New York Times (2/4, WK1, Stolberg, 1.16M), in a "Week in Review" piece reports, "Now that Democrats are in charge, the president is making a great show of Congressional outreach. Consider the last week: On Tuesday, Mr. Bush agreed on a bipartisan panel to advise him on the war. On Wednesday…Pelosi dropped by the Oval Office to report on her trip to Iraq. On Friday, Mr. Bush held a White House reception for Republican senators. On Saturday, he was headed to Williamsburg, Va., to a House Democratic retreat. But there is little evidence that the Congressional courtship has influenced the president who famously called himself 'the decider,' whether the issue is Social Security or the decision to send more troops to Iraq."

Bush Signals Willingness To Work With Democrats On Immigration. The Washington Times (2/4, A1, Dinan, 88K) titles its account of the meeting "Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat," and reports that Bush and House Democrats "got off to a good start in finding common ground yesterday at the Democrats' annual retreat -- with Mr. Bush saying they even share a bond in having been shot in the back by Republicans on immigration. 'You are not the only one with arrows in your back,' the president said during a closed-door question-and-answer session with the House Democratic Caucus, according to two individuals who were in the room. He was responding to Rep. Luis Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat, who said Republicans had been merciless during last year's elections in attacking Democrats on border security. He asked Mr. Bush to win more Republican support for the Democrats' preferred bill. To a round of applause, the president said he will fight for a bill that does not deport illegal aliens. Mr. Bush said it would be a mistake to miss the opportunity for reform this year and let the issue enter the 2008 election campaign, when he worried it would become too political."

At Least 130 Killed By Baghdad Truck Bomb. Coverage of the high-casualty suicide bombing in Baghdad emphasized the scale of the carnage and the pall it cast over efforts to stabilize Iraq. ABC World News (2/3, story 4, 1:30, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Baghdad is reeling from one of the worst attacks of the war. A 2,000-pound truck bomb driving into a crowded marketplace and unleashing carnage on a marketplace. Over one hundred killed and hundreds injured and the White House is calling the brazen attack an atrocity." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 3, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "It was the second time this market has been targeted in less than two months. Three car bombs killed fifty one people there last December. ... tonight, in what was thought to be revenge for the bombing, mortars rained down on Sunni neighborhoods, a sign that it will take more than words to stop the cycle of violence here." NBC Nightly News (2/3, lead story, 2:30, Arraf, 9.87M), reported, "It was the latest in a series of devastating attacks in dense Shi'ia areas."

The New York Times (2/4, A1, Oppel, Mizher, 1.16M) reports, "A mammoth truck bomb obliterated a popular central Baghdad market on Saturday, ripping through scores of shops and flattening apartment buildings, killing at least 130 people and wounding more than 300 in the worst of a series of horrific attacks against Shiites in recent weeks. ... It was the deadliest single bomb blast since the United States invasion almost four years ago." The bombing "seemed sure to inflame Shiite political and militia leaders just as more than 20,000 American troops begin to arrive in an attempt to stop the civil war that threatens to tear Iraq apart." The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Londono, 690K) reports, "The attack followed a recent string of bombings targeting places where Shiites congregate in Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. Officials say Sunni insurgents are behind the violence." Maliki spokesman Ali Dabbagh "blamed Syria for not doing enough to stop the violence, saying that 50 percent of insurgents enter Iraq through Syria."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, A1, Susman, 850K) reports that the attack "was designed to inflict a massive physical as well as psychological toll." The payload "included land mines, ammunition, rockets, mortars and other explosives, which erupted in a fireball and sent buildings crashing down on top of merchants and customers, said Maj. Gen. Jihad Jabiri of Iraq's Interior Ministry. The White House and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced the attack, which was another reminder that their vows to counter spiraling bloodshed with increased troops are having no deterrent effect." The Chicago Tribune (2/4, Sly, 617K) reports, "Two buildings were obliterated, 10 others collapsed, dozens of stalls were incinerated, and many victims died instantly in the huge explosion, which reverberated across the city. ... this bombing was shocking, in its size and in the number of casualties inflicted," even by Iraq's standards. The bombing occurred "40 days after the execution of Saddam Hussein, prompting some speculation that it was intended to mark the day normally commemorated as the end of the traditional mourning period in Iraq."

The AP (2/4, Hurst) reports, "Suspected Sunni attackers have appeared emboldened in recent weeks after radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, under pressure from fellow Shiites who dominate the government, ordered the thousands of gunmen in his Mahdi Army militia to avoid American attacks in the coming assault." An Interior Ministry general "called for the government to 'deport (non-Iraqi) Arabs immediately.' The general's comments reflected growing displeasure inside the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with neighboring Syria, which Baghdad charges has done too little to close its border to Sunni militants." BBC.com (2/4) reports the "attacks on markets are widely seen as Sunni insurgent groups stepping up their activities before a new joint Iraqi-US security operation in Baghdad gets under way."

Bush's Iraq Plan Said To Hinge On "Go-For-Broke" Reforms. A 1,500-word piece in today's Washington Post (2/4, A16, DeYoung, 690K) says "doubts run deep" about the probable success of many reforms in Iraq. "The success of the Bush administration's new Iraq strategy depends on a series of rapid and dramatic political and economic reforms that even the plan's authors have little confidence will work. In the current go-for-broke atmosphere, administration officials say they are aware that failure to achieve the reforms would result in a repeat of last year's unsuccessful Baghdad offensive, when efforts to consolidate military gains with lasting stability on the ground did not work. This time, they acknowledge, there will be no second chance." Several anonymous sources described "the administration as standing on the brink of an intricate combination of maneuvers whose outcome is far from assured." The Post cites several "deep uncertainties," including Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's ability and commitment "to spearheading what the administration foresees as a fundamental realignment of Iraqi politics." Also in question, the Post says, is "whether Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and its sluggish financial bureaucracy will part with $10 billion for rapid job creation and reconstruction, at least some of it directed to sectarian opponents; and whether the U.S. military and State Department can calibrate their own stepped-up reconstruction assistance to push for action without once again taking over."

Antiwar Criticism Of Rice Said To Be Increasing. In an analysis of changing criticism of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the New York Times (2/4, Cooper, 1.16M) notes, "For six years, first as national security adviser and then as secretary of state," Rice "worked under the cover of a very effective shield: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was the administration's lightning rod for criticism over its handling of Iraq. But in recent weeks, with Mr. Rumsfeld gone, Ms. Rice has faced increased, and somewhat unfamiliar, criticism." The "criticism of Ms. Rice has yet to reach the decibel level of that directed against Mr. Rumsfeld, and it may never get to that point, in part because she is not highhanded in her behavior toward colleagues and underlings, her close friends and aides said." Rice "has yet to inspire that level of exasperation from colleagues, either from inside the State Department or the National Security Council," but "she sometimes does take criticism personally."

Japan's Aso Calls Initial Iraq Occupation "Very Naïve." AFP (2/4) carries remarks by Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, in which he "criticised the US occupation of Iraq as 'very naïve' and blamed it for spiralling unrest there, in another swipe at US tactics by the key Washington ally." He said former Secretary Rumsfeld "'started off the war, but the operation after the occupation was very naive. Because this operation did not work well, it (Iraq) is in trouble now. It became clear that the operation after a war is very important when you think about peace-building.'" AFP notes Aso's remarks "follow those by Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma, who has made a series of critical comments about US policies. Last month Kyuma said US President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq and warned that Tokyo might not automatically renew its air force mission to the war-torn country."

Prophets Of Iraqi Troubles Saddened To Be Proven Right. The Washington Post (2/4, D1, Duke, 690K) reports, "It is the culture of this town -- trafficking in rightness. People clamor day in and day out, in that polished and politic way of the Washingtonian, to be proved right. But on Iraq, the vindicated are pained. There is no gloating -- not with thousands of people dead, Americans and Iraqis; not with the Iraq war precipitating an ongoing foreign policy crisis that has left the United States' global image in tatters. ... Lots of people predicted things would turn out this way." Now, "a cynical Washington exercise is underway, some of the vindicated say. It's a snake-like shedding of skin, a policy metamorphosis in which people who once were prominent cheerleaders for the war now are cozying up with the war's early opponents and distancing themselves from their earlier roles."

Kristof Looks For Classical Allusions Relevant To Administration. New York Times (2/4, WK17, 1.16M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes, "Thucydides' account of the failed 'surge' in the Sicilian expedition 2,400 years ago is newly relevant, and 'Moby Dick' is interesting reading today as a bracing warning of the dangers of an obsessive adventure that casts aside all rules." Kristof adds, "The classics have an overwhelmingly cautionary bias, operating as a check on any impulsive rush to war. Perhaps that is because…humans have an ingrained psychological tilt to hawkishness."

Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Perry, 850K) reports," Here and elsewhere in the Persian Gulf off Iraq's shores, Iraqis are gradually taking over jobs once done by U.S. Marines and sailors. They stand guard on terminals such as this one, which is often compared to the bizarre structures of the movie 'Waterworld.' ... It is a slow process for a nation whose navy was destroyed in the early hours of the 2003 assault led by the United States." The Times continues, "'They're learning as they go, but they're definitely getting better,' said Coast Guard Lt. j.g. Kristopher Ensley, executive officer of the cutter Aquidneck. U.S. officials say Iraq's navy faces the same challenge as its army: changing a top-down style that does not encourage leadership in the enlisted ranks."

Contractors To Continue Providing Security In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/4, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports, "The Defense Department plans to continue hiring private contractors to provide security at reconstruction projects in Iraq and to train U.S. and Iraqi military officers in counterinsurgency, despite problems with past contracts for such jobs that traditionally have been done by military personnel. The contracting out of these wartime activities comes at a time when the United States is stretching its resources to provide the additional 21,500 troops in Iraq that are needed under President Bush's new strategy."

Bremer Eager To Defend Record. The Politico (2/3, Allen) reports former Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer "plans to point to unexpectedly chaotic conditions in post-Saddam Baghdad as he defends his record at a hearing on Iraq spending before House Democrats on Tuesday, according to sources familiar with his testimony. ... Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has billed it as a 'hearing on waste, fraud and abuse,' one some administration officials have been dreading." Bremer "told Politico he looks forward to committee members' questions, but also plans to give them a 5,000- to 6,000-word treatise in addition to his five-minute opening statement."

Mass Migration Driven By Iraq War. The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports in a pessimistic article, "Nearly 2 million Iraqis -- about 8 percent of the prewar population -- have embarked on a desperate migration, mostly to Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The refugees include large numbers of doctors, academics and other professionals vital for Iraq's recovery. Another 1.7 million have been forced to move to safer towns and villages inside Iraq, and as many as 50,000 Iraqis a month flee their homes, the U.N. agency said in January." The AP (2/3, Hendawi) reports of the exodus, "When it might peak, nobody knows, but if it continues at its present rate, the consequences for the region would be profound. Iraqis now make up more than 5 percent of Syria's population, the U.N. refugee agency says. Jordan says its 700,000 Iraqis have swollen its population by 12 percent, and its officials say they have already moved to cut off the flow. So has Egypt, with 130,000 Iraqi newcomers."

Key Taliban Figure Killed By NATO Airstrike. The AP (2/4) carries a NATO statement that "NATO-led troops killed a senior Taliban leader with a precision airstrike near a southern Afghan town overrun by militants." Initial reports suggest that Mullah Abdul Gafoor and several associates were killed today "while they were riding in a truck through a small village just outside Musa Qala." Outgoing SACEUR Gen. David Richards told the AP "that 'very surgical and deliberate' force would be used to evict the fighters from Musa Qala, where he said the alliance's strategy of avoiding military action has driven a wedge between residents and Taliban insurgents."

Residents Flee Taliban-Occupied Town. An earlier AP (2/3) report stated, "Hundreds of villagers fled a southern Afghan town overrun by Taliban militants, fearful of a NATO attack on the insurgent fighters who have hoisted their trademark white flag over the town's ransacked government center, residents said."

US General Takes Over NATO Afghan Force. BBC.com (2/4) reports, "UK General David Richards has handed over control of the Nato force in Afghanistan to US General Dan McNeil. During Gen Richards's nine months in charge, the International Security Assistance Force (Isaf) has increased from 9,000 to more than 33,000 troops."

Afghan Schools Take On Taliban. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, King, 850K) reports that a school in Wach Tangi, Afghanistan, "was one of nearly 200 schools across the country burned in the last year by Islamic insurgents. Four hundred more schools were closed by threats and intimidation, driving more than 130,000 students from their classrooms and dealing a harsh blow to massive international efforts to rebuild an education system ravaged during the years of Taliban rule. Over the last three months, however, the rate of attacks has fallen dramatically, with fewer than half a dozen schools believed to have been targeted. ... There are no reliable figures, but the [education] ministry believes more than half the country's 9,000 schools are under some form of locally organized protection, whose effectiveness remains to be seen." On the other hand, "Some educators believe that the recent lull in school burnings and other attacks is only partly due to the establishment of protection committees. Violence traditionally decreases during the coldest months, and they think the insurgents will become more active again during the spring. Other school officials believe that the Taliban, after initially underestimating the strength of the country's education ethic, may have discerned that the school-burning campaign was backfiring."

Former Aid Worker Says Good Intentions Insufficient In Afghanistan. In a Washington Post (2/4, 690K) Outlook piece, former aid worker Holly Barnes Higgins writes, "I went to Afghanistan in October 2005 to work on an economic development project funded by the U.S. government. I went because I believed in the mission: helping to improve the quality of life in a war-torn land. I was lucky to get out. Now I am home, hearing with dismay that President Bush lauds our work as a success and is requesting more aid for Afghanistan. ... I know about the millions of dollars already wasted there." Higgins says of her time in Helmand province, "I now think that the West can do little if anything to quell the opium poppy trade, except to intercept the traffickers. This will be true as long as Helmand's residents refuse to recognize and respect the central government; as long as streets and schools, markets, mosques and government buildings are targeted by suicide bombers; as long as elders strike deals with the Taliban and government officials themselves profit from poppy production."

NYTimes Says Colombian Model Will Not Work In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/4, B1, 1.16M) editorializes, "There is no question that Afghanistan needs to wage a far more effective fight against opium trafficking if it ever hopes to achieve a stable peace. But Colombia -- another United States ally whose narcotics trade is helping finance a lethal insurgency -- is not the model to follow. ... The limited gains Colombia has achieved in recent years have been offset by an overly generous amnesty program for right-wing paramilitary leaders and drug traffickers, which has seriously compromised the rule of law. And American aid has been disproportionately directed into military and police programs, leaving far too little to promote alternative livelihoods for Colombia's farmers. ... The amount of land planted with coca crops has risen and the net harvest has been reduced only slightly. Afghanistan's problems will not be solved by copying these mistakes.

US Attorney Firings Prove Controversial. The Washington Post (2/4, A7, Eggen, 690K) reports, "H.E. 'Bud' Cummins III had served for five years as the U.S. attorney in Little Rock -- a job he obtained in large part because of his credentials as a longtime GOP lawyer and avid supporter of President Bush. So Cummins, 47, was more than a little surprised when he got a call from the Justice Department last year asking him to resign. He was told there was nothing wrong with his performance, but that officials in Washington wanted to give the job to another GOP loyalist." Cummins "was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove. … Cummins was the first in a wave of seven U.S. attorneys to be fired by the Justice Department, a move that has prompted sharp criticism from Democrats in Congress and has set the stage for a legislative battle over the attorney general's power to appoint federal prosecutors." The Post goes on to report, "there is also evidence that broader political forces are at work. One administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing personnel issues, said the spate of firings was the result of 'pressure from people who make personnel decisions outside of Justice who wanted to make some things happen in these places.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Thomas Group To Review Stock Option Grants. The AP (2/4) reports, "Thomas Group Inc., a management consulting firm, said Friday that it is initiating a review of its past stock option granting practices and will report its fourth-quarter and full-year results when the review is complete." The AP continues, "The company said that the stock options review was initiated voluntarily and not in response to an inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission or any other regulatory agency. More than 100 companies are under investigation by the SEC or Justice Department for their stock option granting practices, and at least 93 others have launched their own internal reviews, according to an Associated Press review." The AP adds, "Thomas said it plans to report its full quarterly and full-year earnings and file its Form 10-K annual report by the March 31 filing deadline. … The company did report revenue for the quarter ended Dec. 31 and the full year. Thomas said quarterly revenue increased 26 percent to $14.8 million from $11.7 million in the year-earlier period. For the full-year, revenue increased 38 percent to $59.5 million from $43.1 million in 2005."

Libby Trial Spotlights Cheney's Role In Rebutting Wilson. The Washington Post (2/4, A5, Smith, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "the unanswered question hanging over [Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff Scooter] Libby's trial is, did the vice president's former chief of staff decide to leak that disparaging information on his own? No evidence has emerged that Cheney told him to do it. But Cheney's dictated reply [regarding Joseph Wilson's NYTimes op-ed] is one of many signs to emerge at the trial of the vice president's unusual attentiveness to the controversy and his desire to blunt it. His efforts included the extraordinary disclosure of classified information, including one-sided synopses of Wilson's report and a 2002 intelligence estimate on Iraq. Under questioning from FBI agent Deborah S. Bond, Libby acknowledged that he and Cheney 'may have talked' aboard the plane from Norfolk that day about whether to make public Plame's CIA employment, Bond testified Thursday. Her testimony brought Cheney closer than ever to the heart of the controversy surrounding the Bush administration's efforts to discredit Wilson."

Libby Lawyers Fighting Release Of Grand Jury Testimony Tapes. The AP (2/4, Apuzzo) reported, "Former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby is fighting to keep his grand jury testimony about the leak of a CIA officer's name from being released and broadcast. That testimony -- the sworn statements Libby gave investigators about his conversations with Vice President Cheney and journalists -- is at the heart of his perjury trial. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to play hours of recordings of that testimony in court next week to bolster his case that Libby lied and obstructed Fitzgerald's leak investigation." The AP noted, "If the tapes are released, they could be broadcast on television, radio and online. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he worried that would sensationalize an already public trial."

Prosecutors Could Rest Case As Soon As Tuesday. CNN.com (2/4, Courson) reported that prosecutors "plan to rest their case as soon as Tuesday. Nearly a dozen witnesses have taken the stand in the past two weeks. The last witness is expected to be Tim Russert, moderator of NBC's 'Meet the Press.'" CNN added that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "wants the jury to consider two undisclosed newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office files. Defense attorneys have objected, saying the articles contain all manner of hearsay they would not be able to challenge in court. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton hopes to rule on the evidence by the time the trial resumes Monday."

Rich Says Cheney "Lost It" During Interview. The New York Times' Frank Rich (2/4, WK16) writes, "In the days since Dick Cheney lost it on CNN, our nation's armchair shrinks have had a blast. The vice president who boasted of 'enormous successes' in Iraq and barked 'hogwash' at the congenitally mild Wolf Blitzer has been roundly judged delusional, pathologically dishonest or just plain nuts. … The vice president's on-camera crackup reflected his understandable fear that a White House cover-up was crumbling. He knew that sworn testimony in a Washington courtroom would reveal still more sordid details about how the administration lied to take the country into war in Iraq. He knew that those revelations could cripple the White House's current campaign to escalate that war and foment apocalyptic scenarios about Iran. Scariest of all, he knew that he might yet have to testify under oath himself."

Libby Defense Seeks To Block WPost Articles. The Washington Post (2/4, A5, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "The day of his interview with the FBI" Libby "hand-marked copies of two Washington Post articles about the breadth of a criminal leak investigation -- and underlined were passages suggesting that any official who had told reporters about a CIA officer could be in legal jeopardy, prosecutors said in court filings yesterday. Government prosecutors argued that the October 2003 articles -- stored in former chief of staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's personal folders, and printed from the Internet at his request -- show that Libby had a motive to lie about his secret conversations with reporters and knew that he could be in trouble. The prosecutors are urging presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to let the articles be placed into evidence so the jury can see them. … Defense attorneys argued in competing filings yesterday that the Oct. 4 and Oct. 12 articles, written by Walter Pincus and Mike Allen, would prejudice the jury against Libby. They say the articles are 'inflammatory' because they indicate that Plame had been engaged in covert work in recent years and that revelations about her identity could harm national security interests -- both issues that, they argue, the judge has ruled are not relevant to Libby's trial."

Reporter Provides Behind-The-Scenes Look At Libby Trial. In a behind the scenes look at the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, CNN.com (2/4) reporter Kevin Bohn reports, "As the trial… goes on, we are learning more and more about special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's investigation, which was prompted by the leak that Valerie Plame was an undercover CIA agent. … Now we learning what witnesses told FBI agents or testified before a grand jury, and we are gaining more insight through the release of many documents related to the case. … Those range from a mundane calendar of then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman to the often-talked about memo from the State Department's intelligence unit about former ambassador Joseph Wilson's 2002 trip to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain uranium in Africa." CNN adds, "We have seen correspondence between the Justice Department and Fitzgerald's office and Vice President Dick Cheney's office asking for documents, as well as subpoenas that were issued. … In fact, David Addington, the vice president's current chief of staff, says his office handed over more than 12,000 documents as part of the probe, including many handwritten notes from Libby himself. … Some of those notes had to be analyzed by experts to figure out exactly what Libby was saying since his handwriting is notoriously bad." CNN notes, "One unusual thing in this trial: allowing the jurors to ask questions of witnesses. Lawyers say it's rare in federal courtrooms but occurring more in some federal trials. … The presiding judge, Reggie Walton, is a former superior court judge where this practice is more common. Some lawyers say there is a lot of discussion about this type of activity to try to get the jury more involved and to allow them to address any doubts they might have. … Jurors have so far posed several questions for most of the witnesses."

FBI Investigating Miller's Failure To Pay Taxes On Land Sales. The New York Times (2/4, A20, Steinhauer, Shenon, 1.16M) reports the FBI is investigating whether Rep. Gary Miller "improperly used an unusual tax provision to avoid paying capital gains taxes on profits from land sales to California cities, law enforcement and government officials said. Last summer, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group, filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service saying that Mr. Miller had failed to pay capital gains tax on the 2002 sale of 165 acres in Monrovia, Calif. The complaint said Mr. Miller invoked a rarely used provision that allows tax deferment if the land that is sold is facing an eminent domain threat and the protected proceeds are reinvested within two years. Mr. Miller, who would have faced about a 30 percent tax on the property under a normal sale, used the roughly $10 million in profits from the Monrovia sale to buy property in Fontana, Calif., from Lewis Operating Corp., one of his major campaign contributors, and then resold some of that land to the City of Fontana in 2005 and later in 2006."

FBI Arrests Longtime Kentucky Mayor On Suspected Corruption Charges. The Lexington Herald-Leader (2/4) reported, "Federal authorities have arrested a longtime Eastern Kentucky mayor who lost re-election last November. Former Manchester Mayor Daugh K. White was being held yesterday at the Laurel County Detention Center on federal charges," although the "charge against White was not available. The FBI raided Manchester City Hall last October and seized a variety of records, but has not disclosed the nature of its investigation. However, a state audit released in December said that while White was mayor, the city misused taxpayers' money by paving more than 30 private driveways, making undocumented loans to employees and private companies and paying for personal travel expenses of city workers." The Herald-Leader notes, "White becomes the third Clay County public figure arrested by federal authorities in the last few months."

Indictment Expected Soon In FBI Probe Of Pennsylvania State Senator. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/4, Shiffman, Cattabiani, McCoy) reported, "The four-year investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is coming to an end, and lawyers familiar with the case expect him to be indicted soon, possibly as early as Tuesday. Fumo, one of the most powerful politicians in Pennsylvania, last year received a target letter -- a formal notice that he is likely to face charges related to the fraud and obstruction-of-justice probe. … 'He's looking forward to clearing his name,' said a person close to the Philadelphia Democrat." The Inquirer noted, "Since 2003, the FBI and IRS have grilled everyone from Fumo's florist to a Senate-paid private eye. … But the heart of the case appears to be whether Fumo illegally exploited a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity to fund his personal and political agenda - using it, as one person close to the case put it, 'as his personal piggy bank.'"

FBI Probe Of Perata Appears To Have Stalled. The San Mateo County Times (2/4, Harmon) reported, "Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata has spent nearly $1 million defending himself against a federal probe into whether he illegally funneled money to family and close associates. But more than two years after the harsh light of suspicion first fell on the 61-year-old East Bay Democrat, the FBI investigation appears to have fallen quietly into a black hole of obscurity. The flurry of subpoenas flying out of FBI offices in San Francisco has slowed to an apparent stop. There haven't been any publicly acknowledged FBI interviews of witnesses since last summer." The Times added, "Perata refuses to talk about the investigation with reporters and it appears to be a nonissue in the Capitol. … But no one knows if another shoe is out there ready to drop. The FBI has made no comment on where the investigation is, whether they're about to indict or if they're ready to close up shop — and a spokeswoman said they won't comment."

Scope Of "Operation Dollar Bill" Continues To Expand. The Providence Journal (2/4, Stanton) reported, "Politicians are looking over their shoulder, witnesses are lawyering up and the FBI and state police have spent many hours at the State House library, poring over the arcane details of committee votes and the travel of legislation. Welcome to Operation Dollar Bill, the newly minted federal corruption probe that seeks to connect the dots between dollars, as in payoffs, and bills, as in legislation." The Journal added, "Like a hurricane gathering force, a case that began three years ago with one state senator, John A. Celona, has gained sufficient strength to recently earn its own name in the FBI register. Not since Operation Plunder Dome, the corruption probe of Providence City Hall that brought down Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., has Rhode Island seen such a high-profile public corruption case. And this case is bigger. While Plunder Dome focused on one mayor and one city, Operation Dollar Bill encompasses 'multiple entities and a lot of players,'" according to US Attorney Robert Clark Corrente. However, "Corrente noted last week that an investigation does not necessarily lead to criminal charges, and he declined to identify specific targets."

FBI Investigating Top Aide To Minnesota Sheriff. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (2/3, Gottfried) reported, "Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher said Friday the FBI is investigating a high-level civilian aide in his department. Mark Naylon, a public information officer and Fletcher's friend, is being investigated for allegations of criminal conduct, the sheriff said. … No other county employees were being investigated, he said." The Pioneer-Press noted, "The FBI contacted Fletcher about its investigation into Naylon for the first time Friday and asked for a meeting, the sheriff said. Agents requested documents and access to employees for interviews. Fletcher said his office is cooperating." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/4, McEnroe, Smith, Padilla) added, "Sources have told the Star Tribune that the FBI is particularly interested in Naylon's relationship with the Hell's Outcasts motorcycle gang, which has a history of gun and drug trafficking. … Officially, Naylon is the office's public information officer. Fletcher said that Naylon also has played a key role for the office's interaction with drug and gun task forces."

Killings Of Four Indiana Men Spark Fear Among Homeless. The New York Times (2/4, Saulny) reports, "The first two bodies were found on a hunch in early January in South Bend, Ind., during a search of an old industrial part town. Two police officers popped open the lid of a manhole and down there, beaten to death and stacked upright one above the other, were two missing men, Michael S. Nolan Jr. and Michael W. Lawson." The Times continues, "Just three days later, as the investigation expanded, the police opened another manhole about 100 yards away from the first and found two more men, Jason A. Coates and Brian Talboom, their bodies bludgeoned and discarded underground the same way. … To one officer on the scene, Sgt. David Wells, the discovery seemed more like something from a dark crime drama than anything that tranquil and academic South Bend had ever experienced. 'It was really horrific,' Sergeant Wells said. 'And really perplexing.'" The Times notes, "The four men had only two things in common: they lived together in a burned-out building that they had painstakingly transformed into a makeshift home. And they made money by 'scrapping' — hunting the urban landscape for increasingly valuable and marketable metals like copper and brass to sell to recyclers and construction businesses. … On Saturday night, the police announced that two homeless men had been arrested and charged with murder in the four deaths, said Capt. Jeffrey Walters of the South Bend Police Department. … The men, Daniel J. Sharp, 56, and Randy L. Reeder, 50, were being held in St. Joseph County, Ind., and Berrien County, Mich., respectively, according to The Associated Press. The police said Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder killed the four men because they believed they had stolen salvaged scrap metal that Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder had intended to sell. … The killings have fostered a sense of dread in the unusually tight-knit community of homeless men and women in South Bend."

Michigan Man Sentenced For Offering Bribe To Iraqi Police Official. The AP (2/4) reports, "A suburban Detroit man who worked as a translator in Iraq was sentenced today to three years in prison for offering a bribe to a police official for the purchase of armored vests and other equipment for $1 million." The AP continues, "Faheem Mousa Salam, 29, was sentenced in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by Judge Richard J. Leon, according to a statement from the Justice Department. … Salam, of Livonia, pleaded guilty on Aug. 4 to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act." The AP adds, "He admitted that he offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, prosecutors said. Salam said he had 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer to sell. … Salam tried to complete the sale with someone he believed was an official of the training group, but who actually was an undercover agent of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Salam offered the agent a separate payment of $28,000 to $35,000 for his help."

US Indicts Missouri Man On Child Pornography Charges. The Jefferson City (MO) News Tribune (2/4) reports, "David Matthew McCormick is facing new federal charges after a grand jury on Friday issued a new indictment in his case." The Tribune continues, "Bradley J. Schlozman, the United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, announced in a Friday news release the federal grand jury in Jefferson City added a charge in its new, two-count indictment that replaces one issued last Nov. 6. … McCormick, 20, now is charged with possessing child pornography on April 27, 2005, and distributing child pornography over the Internet on March 26, 2005." The Tribune adds, "Friday's indictment also includes a forfeiture allegation, which would require McCormick to give the government any property used to commit the alleged crimes, including two computer hard drives, a computer tower, a compact disc and a cellular camera telephone. … Schlozman said the case is being brought as part of 'Project Safe Childhood,' a nationwide federal Justice Department initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. … The national effort is led by the United States Attorneys' offices, with help from federal, state and local resources to identify and rescue victims and to better locate, apprehend, and prosecute individuals who exploit children using the Internet."

Report Raises Questions About Weed & Seed Grant Spending. The Andover (MA) Eagle Tribune (2/4, Chelf, Church) reports from Methuen, MA, "Methuen police Capt. Kristopher McCarthy treated himself and other top police brass to an afternoon snack of pretzels and water at an Atlanta mall in March 2005 and billed taxpayers $11.22. … Later on, someone wanted cheese sauce, and taxpayers picked up that tab, too - a bill for 45 cents at Mr. Pretzel. … These expenses were among $27,000 in travel costs billed to a $1 million federal grant meant to fight crime in the Arlington district, the city's poorest neighborhood. The receipts are just a small part of the police spending records subpoenaed by the federal government last August. The U.S. attorney's office will not discuss the subpoena, its investigation or whether it is looking into the travel costs." The Tribune continues, "An Eagle-Tribune analysis of the records shows that between 2001 and 2006, the grant known as 'Weed and Seed' paid for 11 trips to conferences across the country for seven people - police Chief Joseph Solomon, his secretary Patricia Giarrusso, Deputy Chief Joseph Alaimo, Lt. Kevin Mahoney, Sgt. Michael Havey, Capt. Katherine Lavigne and McCarthy. … For the first several trips, police officials documented their expenses with receipts backing up each reimbursement claim. But by 2005, police began using a per diem system granting themselves a daily spending allowance. Fewer supporting documents were provided." The Tribune adds, "During the March 2005 trip to Atlanta, Solomon, Giarrusso, Mahoney and McCarthy stayed for nearly six days at the Hyatt Regency on the government's dime. They had dinner at the Hard Rock Cafe, racked up a $70 breakfast bill for three at the Hyatt Hotel, spent another $203 for dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse and took more than $400 worth of cab rides. … McCarthy also expensed $8.06 for breakfast at Logan Airport in Boston. Solomon was paid $305.59 for food and transportation on the trip, but did not submit receipts to the city. … Five months later, the group got together in Los Angeles and did it all again." The Tribune notes, "Solomon, in a written response to questions for this story, said the trips 'form an integral part of the Weed and Seed program' and that federal grant officials expect attendance."

LATimes Mocks Government Efforts To Curtail Gambling. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush in October signed the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, a law intended to resolve any ambiguities about the unlawfulness of placing bets online. Although most fans in the free world can place bets with regulated online casinos, U.S. law enforcement has been busy cracking down on the heinous crime, going after enabling credit card companies, detaining those who run legal foreign online sites if they deign to enter the country and subpoenaing major Wall Street investment banks involved in overseas initial public offerings of online casinos. It's another brazen attempt to extend prudish American mores to other jurisdictions."

FTC Fines Telemarketer $1 Million For Violations. The AP (2/4, Rugaber) reports, "Federal regulators have slapped a $1 million penalty on a telemarketer that automatically dialed and then illegally hung up on more than 64 million people." The AP continues, "A Florida-based company known as The Broadcast Team settled charges brought by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice by agreeing to a court order that will bar them from making similar calls in the future and require them to pay a $1 million penalty. … The Broadcast Team also called more than a million numbers on the national Do Not Call Registry, the FTC said. … The company's principals, Robert J. Tuttle and Mark S. Edwards, were also named in the FTC's complaint." The AP adds, "The FTC said that the company was able to deliver over a million recorded messages per day to voice mailboxes and answering machines. But the company violated the commission's telemarketing sales rule by calling tens of millions of numbers and, when the calls were answered by people, hanging up or playing a recording. … The commission's rules require that calls answered by a person rather than an answering machine be connected to a live representative within two seconds, and not be 'abandoned' by hanging up or playing a recording. … Telemarketers that make sales calls or for-profit telemarketers seeking charitable contributions are bound by the restrictions on abandoning calls, the commission said. .. .And the Broadcast Team received more than $2 million in revenue for telemarketing calls that violated the FTC's telemarketing sales rules, the commission said last year." The AP notes, "The Justice Department first filed a complaint in federal court at the FTC's request in December 2005. The complaint said the company abandoned 64 million calls on behalf of debt management companies and more than 450,000 calls made for charities and other purposes. … The complaint also said that the company violated the law by calling numbers on the national "Do Not Call" Registry and for making calls without paying the required annual fee for access to that Registry."

ITT To Settle US-China Technology Case. Bloomberg (2/4, Schmidt, Capaccio) reports, "Defense contractor ITT Corp. may pay as much as $100 million to resolve U.S. charges the company violated export control rules by allowing the transfer of night- vision technology to China, people familiar with the case said." Bloomberg continues, "ITT, the world's biggest maker of night vision goggles, is in advanced talks with Justice Department prosecutors in Virginia, said the people who asked not to be identified because negotiations with the government are continuing and the size of the settlement could still change. The agreement probably will be announced within a few weeks, the people said." Bloomberg adds, "China has been energetic in trying to obtain so-called Generation 3 night-vision technology and develop ways to counteract the devices, analysts say. The goggles, binoculars and scopes are used by soldiers to see clearly when fighting in darkness and low light. … The settlement would be ITT's second in a little more than two years for export control violations. In November 2004, the company agreed to settle a State Department civil case by paying $8 million and improving its internal controls for preventing sensitive technology from falling into the wrong hands. … The company must still honor the terms of the settlement in that case, which involved export violations of night-vision technology and remote sensing equipment for satellites. The agreement with the State Department requires ITT to submit to heightened government scrutiny, including arranging for on-site audits at the request of the agency, until 2009."

Concerns Raised About Report Showing Increase In NYPD Searches. The New York Times (2/4, Lee) reports, "On Friday, the New York Police Department released a report showing that police officers stopped 508,540 people on city streets in 2006, an average of 1,393 a day and quintuple the number from 2002. While it was difficult to find a consensus on the significance of those statistics — good patrolling, overly aggressive officers and more faithful recordkeeping are just a few explanations — it was not hard yesterday in Red Hook to find a handful of that number walking around. … More than half of those stopped, and sometimes frisked, by the police were black. The Red Hook projects have a large black population, a history of crime problems and, at least in a few young men, a wariness of the police." The Times adds, "At a press conference outside police headquarters yesterday, representatives of black and Hispanic officers' groups called the data damning, and renewed calls for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly to step down. … The Police Department said that officers stop people only if they are suspected of committing a crime, and that the practice is vital in getting guns off the streets. About 21,000 of the stops ended in arrests and about 29,000 in summonses."

Officer Convicted In Louima Case To Finish Sentence In NY Halfway House. The New York Times (2/4, Ramirez) reports, "A former police officer convicted of perjury in the 1997 assault on Abner Louima, a case that scarred both the city's race relations and its police force for years, has been released from prison to a halfway house in upstate New York, his lawyer said yesterday." The Times continues, "The officer, Charles Schwarz, 41, was released from a minimum-security facility on a former Air Force base in Duluth, Minn., more than two months ago, said the lawyer, Ronald Fischetti. Mr. Schwarz is expected to complete the remainder of his five-year sentence in May. … Mr. Fischetti would not disclose the location of the halfway house but said Mr. Schwarz's wife, Andra, and 2-year-old son, William, lived nearby. … Mr. Schwarz 'plans to relocate in a different area and doesn't plan to come back to the city,' Mr. Fischetti said, because of unwanted press attention." The Times adds, "In August 1997, Mr. Louima, a Haitian immigrant arrested after a nightclub disturbance, was beaten in a police station's bathroom by an officer who then sodomized him with a broomstick. The officer, Justin A. Volpe, later pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. … Mr. Louima has contended that there was a second officer in the bathroom, Mr. Schwarz. Mr. Schwarz has denied the allegation, and Mr. Volpe also said Mr. Schwarz was not there."

California Taser Task Force To Study Weapon's Effects. The San Jose Mercury News (2/4, Wykes) reports, "The members of the Palo Alto Taser Task Force, beginning their journey toward a decision about whether stun guns should be a part of any police officer's equipment in the city, will get as close as they can Tuesday to test-driving the experience." The News continues, "Part of Palo Alto Police Chief Lynne Johnson's presentation will include videos of people being shocked with a stun gun. … These videos were taken in real-life situations by other police agencies, Johnson said." The News adds, "At last week's meeting, Johnson told the panel that the presentation would include a live Taser stunning of a volunteer from the police department. … Some members of the task force balked at the idea, not wanting to be directly responsible for a deliberate infliction of pain, so Johnson changed to the video format. .. But she held fast to the idea that if the task force is going to educate itself as wholly as possible, the use of a stun gun is important to see." The News notes, "In November, the family of a Fresno man, who died after being stunned by San Jose police, filed a federal lawsuit claiming he was the victim of excessive and unreasonable force. The Santa Clara County coroner included the use of the Taser and pepper spray as a contributing factor in the man's death -- one of the first times that has happened in Santa Clara County. …More than a quarter-million Tasers are in use by police departments nationwide and justified as a control method far less lethal than a gun. … The San Jose Police Department was the first in the Bay Area to use the weapon. Other Taser-carrying departments now include Gilroy, Fremont, Morgan Hill, Belmont, San Bruno, San Mateo and San Mateo County SWAT teams. … The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing its use and researchers at Wayne State University in Indiana are applying biomedical engineering to determine if a stun gun can be made safer by lessening its power."

Curb Cuts Offer Disabled An Easier Way To Get Around. McClatchy Newspapers (2/4, Greve) reports, "The barricades that quadriplegic Ed Roberts and his comrades stormed nearly 40 years ago were a few inches high. Yet today, millions of Americans pass daily through the breaches they created. … Curb cuts, the breaches are called. Or curb ramps." McClatchy continues, Since 1990, the Americans with Disabilities Act has required them in construction, renovation and wherever a city does major street or sidewalk work. All this curb-ramp building has helped the United States lead the world when it comes to providing public access for people with disabilities. … 'For all this country's many faults, one thing we do better than anybody is architectural-barrier removal,' said Mary Lou Breslin, the co-founder and senior policy adviser of the Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, based in Berkeley. By her estimate, more than 60 countries are trying to catch up." McClatchy adds, "Curb ramps also are a boon for bicyclists, stroller-pushers, skateboarders and in-line skaters. They're a help, too, for travelers with wheeled luggage and delivery truckers with hand carts. … In fact, nine out of 10 unencumbered pedestrians will veer off course to take advantage of a curb ramp, according to Jim Terry, an architect specializing in accessible design who studied pedestrian behavior at a shopping mall in Sarasota, Fla." McClatchy notes, "Curb ramps are crucial to independence for people who use wheelchairs, according to architect Bill Hecker of Hecker Design Ltd. in Birmingham, Ala., a specialist in access for people with disabilities. … It's unclear how many ramps are in existence or how much they've cost. The simplest single curb ramp runs about $900, according to Hecker. As a rule, cities put them in when it's convenient or when the Justice Department convinces them that they must."

Former Louisiana Deputy Claims Home Seizure Violated Rights. The Monroe (LA) News-Star (2/4, Gunter, Temple) reports, "Another volley has been fired in the dispute between the Ouachita Parish Sheriff's Office and some of its former deputies." The News-Star continues, "Former deputy Stan Felts said he has filed a federal civil rights complaint against Lt. Mike Rowlan and Chief Deputy Joe Davis. … Felts was a 16-year employee of the Sheriff's Office and headed up the department's Special Crimes Apprehension Team before resigning Jan. 4 with the rank of sergeant. His resignation came in the middle of an Internet scandal that accuses the department of corruption. The complaint alleges that Davis and Rowlan, who has been the major target of the Internet postings, conspired under color of the law to deprive Felts and his wife of their civil rights to privacy." The News-Star adds, "The complaint states that Rowlan, under Davis' direction, tried in July 2003 to remove a personal computer from Felts' western Ouachita Parish residence without probable cause or without trying to obtain a search warrant. … Felts' federal filing follows a lawsuit filed Jan. 25 by Rowlan naming three former deputies — Gene Caviness, Jacob Greer and Todd Newton — claiming defamation, invasion of privacy and Internet stalking. The postings on the Copwatch.com Web site accuse Rowlan of illegal activity and accuse Sheriff Richard Fewell of covering up for him. Rowlan works with Metro Narcotics Unit, and the postings on Copwatch.com revealed his identity by showing his driver's license photo and even his home address." The News-Star notes, "Only Greer was employed by the department at the time of the Internet postings and was fired after an internal investigation revealed he passed along his personal identification number to Newton so Newton could enter the Thinkstream law enforcement information center. Newton had left the Sheriff's Office for a job with the West Monroe Police Department. … Caviness was working with the FBI Task Force through his employment with the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office. After the internal investigations by the Sheriff's Office and West Monroe police, Caviness resigned his job with FBI Task Force but still works with the East Carroll Sheriff's Office."

DOJ Asked To Monitor New York Election. The New York Times (2/4, Lambert) reports, "The already ferocious campaign to fill a State Senate seat on Long Island reached a new pitch yesterday with a mass mailing featuring Osama bin Laden, accusations of improper donations, and a request for federal monitors to guard against voter intimidation at the polls on Tuesday." The Times continues, "The contest has drawn intense statewide political attention because a Democratic victory would edge that party closer to controlling the Senate. Unions and other special interest groups are funneling money and workers into the contest, which could become New York's most expensive state legislative race. … Gov. Eliot Spitzer has taken a direct role by campaigning and filming a television commercial for the Democratic nominee, Craig M. Johnson. Equally determined to preserve their majority, top Republicans are marshalling their forces behind their candidate, Maureen O'Connell." The Times adds, "Citing fears that Republicans will challenge the legitimacy of Democratic voters on Election Day to sway the outcome, the Democratic campaign formally asked the United States Department of Justice to dispatch monitors to polling places to prevent 'voter intimidation' and voting delays. … 'Independent federal monitors are critical to ensure a fair election,' the request said. A Justice Department spokeswoman said the request was under review."

The Long Island Newsday (2/4, Hadrick) reports, "Democrats raised the issue of intimidation this week after Republicans requested that poll inspectors be supplied with voter challenge forms and validation oaths. … Nassau Republican Chairman Joseph Mondello said, 'We welcome federal monitoring because it will prevent anyone from running people in from New York City who are not eligible to vote in Nassau County.'" Newsday adds, "A Justice Department spokeswoman said the agency is considering Johnson's request and will decide by Monday 'if there is a factual and legal basis that warrants' monitors."

US Shiites Complain Of Discrimination By Sunni Organizations. The New York Times (2/4, A1, MacFarquhar, 1.16M) reports, "Escalating tensions between Sunnis and Shiites across the Middle East are rippling through some American Muslim communities, and have been blamed for events including vandalism and student confrontations. … Some Shiite students said they had faced repeated discrimination, like being formally barred by the Sunni-dominated Muslim Student Association from leading prayers." According to the Times, "At the University of Michigan's campus in Dearborn, the Muslim association pushed through rules that effectively banned Shiites from leading collective prayers. … At Rutgers University, the tension started last year after…conservative Sunni students began openly mocking Shiites, and considered barring women from leading the student association. Several students involved said the group was heavily influenced by teachings from Saudi Arabia."

California To Export Inmates To Other States. The New York Times/AP (2/4, A23) reports, "As many as 5,000 California convicts will be transferred out of state to ease an overcrowding crisis in the state prison system, the top corrections official said Friday. 'We are severely overcrowded, and the need for more space is absolutely critical,' James E. Tilton, the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, said in a statement. 'This decision is being made to protect public safety.' In December, a federal judge warned that he would start releasing inmates early or prohibit convicts from being sent to state prisons from county jails unless the state acted immediately to ease overcrowding. The threat followed an executive order signed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in October authorizing voluntary and involuntary transfers of up to 5,000 inmates."

Faked Letters Cloud Dispute Over Monsanto's Bid For Delta & Pine. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/4, Melcer) reports, "Biotech crop giant Monsanto Co.'s proposed purchase of the nation's largest cottonseed company is alarming some farmers and agribusiness competitors — but Charles Martin isn't one of them." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Martin said he doesn't know how a letter opposing the deal, bearing his name, address and purported signature, was sent to a U.S. senator by a former congressional colleague as part of a lobbying campaign. … The letter identifies Martin as a longtime family farmer. 'Somebody is using my name falsely,' said Martin, a retired mechanical engineer from Hawkinsville, Ga. 'I've never farmed. … I can't even raise dust.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "The letter is one part of varied efforts aimed at derailing Creve Coeur-based Monsanto's plan to buy Delta & Pine Land Co. of Scott, Miss., for $1.5 billion. Opponents say the acquisition would give Monsanto too much control over American cotton. … Some opponents are pushing for congressional hearings on the deal, which Washington observers say are unlikely. Letter-writing campaigns are sparking interest among states' attorneys general; 32 have requested information from Monsanto. Staff at a Minneapolis public-relations firm are e-mailing appeals for an outcry in regions where no cotton is planted. … Monsanto already provides — and profits from — genetic traits that last year protected nearly 86 percent of the U.S. cotton crop from worms, herbicide or both, according to data from the Agriculture Department. … If Monsanto buys D&PL and fulfills a related promise to sell its own Stoneville cottonseed business, Monsanto's share of the U.S. cottonseed market will jump to nearly 50 percent, up from about 12 percent. In a half-dozen Southern states where D&PL is the preferred brand, that market share would top 85 percent."

Lame-Duck Delta CEO Leads Successful Takeover Resistance. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/4, Hirschman, Grantham) reports, "At first glance, the battle for Delta Air Lines seemed likely to be a rout. … The youthful, dynamic executive team at US Airways seized the initiative last fall when it launched a surprise takeover bid that caught a wounded Delta off guard." The AJC continues, "The group had already transformed a second-tier airline, the Tempe, Ariz-based America West, into a major player by buying US Airways and taking its name a year earlier. By snatching Delta from bankruptcy court, 45-year-old Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker would get a tarnished gem and create the world's biggest airline in a single audacious stroke. … All that stood in the way was lame-duck Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein who, at 74, already planned to step down as soon as the Atlanta icon got out of bankruptcy court. He led a corps of untested executives who got their jobs when the previous executive team bailed out with controversial bonuses and protected pensions. Delta's 45,000-member work force had been battered by a string of layoffs, pay cuts and benefit reductions." The AJC adds, "Grinstein vowed to resist the US Airways offer, but some wondered if the opposition would wilt. Many airline analysts — always eager to see fewer players in the fractious industry — thought the deal would be a long-awaited catalyst for consolidation. … What neither US Airways nor Wall Street anticipated, however, was the high-spirited campaign Grinstein and Delta workers waged to defeat the merger proposal, which died last week when the airline's bankruptcy creditors refused to back it. Instead, they endorsed Delta's standalone reorganization plan, forcing Parker to abandon his $10 billion bid." The AJC notes, "Delta's strategy took advantage of Grinstein's long experience as a smooth boardroom operator and persuasive leader, as well as workers' hunger for a positive cause to rally around … It also benefited from the daunting obstacles that have long made large-scale airline mergers easier to talk about than pull off. While such deals may make financial sense, they are rarely popular with labor leaders, politicians or passenger advocates — and merger foes played those cards as well."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

CDC Flu Pandemic Drill Halted By Weather Concerns. The Washington Post (2/4, A3, Brown, 690K) reports the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention "held a pandemic 'war game' here [Georgetown] last week but aborted it at midnight Wednesday, halfway through its planned 24-hour run. The reason -- ironically, but perhaps not surprisingly -- was concern about public safety. CDC did not want a hundred of its most valuable employees rushing on Thursday morning over ice-slick roads to a mock disaster. … CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, who spent Wednesday facing nail-biting pseudo-decisions -- and made the real one to call things off -- was happy with half a pandemic."

Administration's "Interference" With Climate Change Research Denounced. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) Chris Mooney, author of 'The Republican War on Science,' and Alan Sokal, professor of physics at New York University, write, "By beginning to investigate the Bush administration's interference with scientists' work on global warming, the Democratic Congress has embarked on a key task: restoring respect for science — and more generally, for evidence and reason — in the federal government. That we need such reform, and from Democrats, is a historic irony, because it's the Republicans who have often tried to paint themselves as defenders of 'sound science' against ideologically motivated attacks."

Bush's Global Warming Measures Considered "Demonstrably Inadequate." The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M) editorializes, "Should Congress require any further reason to move aggressively to limit greenhouse gas emissions, it need only read Friday's report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the world's authoritative voice on global warming. … As we have learned over the years, talk is cheap in Washington, while meaningful action is almost certain to be expensive. President Bush has brandished those very real costs of moving to a new energy-delivery system again and again to argue against mandatory caps on emissions and to make the case for his own cost-free (and demonstrably inadequate) program of voluntary reductions. Yet what the panel is telling us is that the costs of doing nothing, especially to future generations, will be far greater than the price of acting now."

FBI, Los Angeles Police Cracking Down On Rising Gang Violence. The Chicago Tribune (2/4, Martinez) reported, "With one recent study enumerating 40,000 members in 700 gangs in Los Angeles, the city is the originator and exporter of dangerous gangs gone national, such as the Bloods, the Crips and Mara Salvatrucha 13 (MS-13), said FBI spokesman Kenneth Smith. … Chicago Crime Commission President Jim Wagner acknowledged Los Angeles as a breeding ground for gangs that are now in Chicago's western suburbs." The Tribune added that "on Wednesday, local officials and the FBI office in Los Angeles will host a long-planned summit with law officials from the U.S., Canada and Central America on 'transnational' gangs such as MS-13, which has ties to El Salvador. During the conference, the mayor and police chief are expected to announce anti-gang programs emphasizing prevention and intervention, officials said.

3rd Circuit Overturns Pennsylvania Man's Gun Conviction. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/4, Ove) reports, "Jason Korey, suspected by police of being a serial hit man and once described by one detective as 'John Dillinger Jr.' and by another as the 'closest to the devil I'll ever come,' again has proved a slippery target for prosecutors. … Already acquitted of two killings, and with charges of attempting a third withdrawn, he's won another legal battle." The Post-Gazette continues, "An appellate court has thrown out a federal gun conviction that would have sent him to prison for three decades. The case was built largely on evidence from a homicide trial that the district attorney's office lost. … The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last month that faulty jury instructions by U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster might have influenced jurors to convict Mr. Korey in 2005." The Post-Gazette adds, "The appellate court also took the unusual step of admonishing the judge for his handling of an inappropriate remark by the prosecutor. Judge Lancaster allowed an assistant U.S. attorney to launch into a speech to the jury instead of apologizing after the remark. … U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is now considering whether her office will retry Mr. Korey, 24, of Baldwin Borough, whose ability to escape homicide charges has long frustrated Pittsburgh police." The Post-Gazette notes, "He was acquitted in 2000 in the 1999 slaying of William Kuhn III, 24, a South Side cocaine dealer. The decision outraged detectives, especially because they believed that Mr. Korey had beaten another murder charge in 1999 when he was acquitted in the killing of Joseph Brucker, 17, of Whitehall. … Police didn't give up, though, and turned instead to the federal court system. … As part of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns, they teamed up with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to link Mr. Korey and the .22-caliber pistol used in the Kuhn killing. … A jury found him guilty of using a gun during a drug-trafficking crime and Judge Lancaster sentenced him to nearly 33 years in prison. … But among several challenges to the sentence, his public defenders said he was denied a fair trial because of prejudicial jury instructions and because the judge allowed Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love to issue an 'apology for foul language that bolstered the prosecutor's reputation.'"

Police Reap Benefits Of Seized Assets. The New York Times (2/4, Domash) reports, "In 2001, federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents gave the Nassau County Police Department Asset Forfeiture Unit a license plate number that was registered to an elderly woman in the county. It was the only lead they had on a suspected major drug and money-laundering operation, but it paid off in arrests — and, for the Nassau police, much more." The Times continues, "After a two-year investigation started by that lead, the Forfeiture Unit executed six search warrants in Nassau County, New York City, Miami and Boston and seized guns, drugs, $300,000 in jewelry, $600,000 in vehicles, $750,000 in cash and $3 million in real property — assets with a total value of more than $4.6 million. Spinoff investigations are continuing, and officials expect that the total forfeitures will eventually exceed an additional $5 million. … Most of that money will wind up in the bank accounts of law enforcement agencies instead of the criminals', paying for a wide array of crime-fighting equipment." The Times adds, "By confiscating equipment used in a crime, like cars; the proceeds of a crime; or items purchased with those proceeds, like jewelry or houses, asset forfeiture is designed to strip criminals of their ability to continue illegal activities. But it also has financial benefits for the police and taxpayers. … Although the Suffolk County Police and some municipal departments have also received forfeiture money, the Nassau County Police have been in the forefront locally in getting it. And the payoff has been substantial. … Nassau County established its forfeiture office in 1992. Twelve years later, Suffolk County started a unit as part of its narcotics bureau. … The forfeiture process is overseen by federal, state and local regulations. Once a prosecution begins, the forfeiture action runs parallel to it, but the distribution is not made until the criminal action is completed. … Distribution is determined by federal and state laws that first require an administrative or judicial finding that the property seized is an instrument or proceed of criminal conduct. The laws then address how the seized assets will be distributed, including the share that each law enforcement agency involved in the investigation will receive."

IMMIGRATION:

Former Circus Acrobat Pleads Guilty In Visa Scam. The Washington Times (2/4, Seper) reports, "A former acrobat has pleaded guilty to charges of helping as many as 870 foreign nationals enter the United States illegally and making false statements in visa applications, the Justice Department said." The Times continues, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Kristo Ivanov, 70, of Orlando, Fla., entered the plea Thursday before U.S. District Judge Donald P. Dietrich in federal court in Orlando." The Times adds, "In his plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Ivanov admitted that from 2001 to February 2006, he helped the illegal aliens enter or remain in the United States through fraudulent means, preparing visa applications falsely saying they were circus performers coming to work in Florida. … Mrs. Fisher said none of the aliens had been hired by any of the circuses listed in the visa applications, adding that they were 'simply a means for the aliens to enter or remain in the United States.' She said Ivanov charged each alien from $500 to $2,500 to prepare the applications. … 'Ivanov admits to helping hundreds of illegal aliens into the United States under false pretenses so that he could benefit financially,' Mrs. Fisher said. 'We will not allow this type of exploitation of our immigration system, which poses a risk to the security of our nation.' … A Bulgarian native who is now a naturalized American citizen, Ivanov came to the United States in 1980 as an acrobat for Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus. He has owned and operated a circus booking agency, Magic Star Entertainment, of Lake Mary, Fla., for more than five years and used that agency to sponsor illegal aliens to enter or remain in this country."

DOJ_NMG_0127247

Contractors Decry Lack Of Rules For Hiring Immigrants. The Denver Post (2/4, Aguilera) reports, "Facing growing public criticism from activists opposed to illegal immigration, Colorado's construction contractors have begun to shed their reluctance to debate the issue publicly. … Contractors are joining a growing chorus of business leaders - including hotels, restaurants and agriculture - who say they are trying to hire only legal workers but lack a foolproof system for confirming an employee's legal status." The Post adds, "A company's best option is the beleaguered Basic Pilot Program, which uses Social Security numbers to verify worker eligibility. But federal authorities acknowledge that Basic Pilot can't reliably show when someone is misusing a citizen's identity. … As a result, the state's contractors say they are left with a difficult choice: Use Basic Pilot and risk hiring undocumented workers or aggressively profile prospective employees, which could lead to legal penalties." The Post notes, "Like contractors, meatpacking company Swift & Co. has walked both sides of the line when hiring, each time leading to federal scrutiny, observers say. … The company's efforts to confirm citizenship of its foreign applicants led to a Justice Department investigation in 2000. The company eventually paid a $200,000 settlement in 2002 and increased its reliance on the Basic Pilot Program. By 2006, however, federal authorities suspected Swift had become a job haven for illegal immigrants. In December, federal authorities raided six Swift plants and arrested 1,282 undocumented workers, many suspected of or charged with identity theft."

Immigration Fees Increase Deemed "Exorbitant" By NYTimes. The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes, "Citizenship and Immigration Services, the beleaguered federal bureaucracy that makes new Americans, has announced plans to increase fees sharply to cover its costs. The agency is distinctive in the federal government for being entirely dependent on fees it collects. It is also notable for backlogs and what its director, Emilio Gonzalez, acknowledges are 'dingy buildings' and 'rude employees.' Mr. Gonzalez promises that if the agency is granted an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers, it will process applications more quickly and take other steps to fulfill its responsibilities, the costs of which have risen sharply since 9/11. … Advocacy groups on both sides of the immigration debate agree that the increases are exorbitant, and we agree."

TAX:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In New York Tax Case. The New York Times (2/4, Johnston) reports, "The federal tax court has ruled in favor of the Internal Revenue Service in a 14-year-old evasion case involving a now-dead lawyer who was one of the nation's leading tax advisers, millions of dollars in reported real estate kickbacks and a Supreme Court ruling that ended a longstanding practice of secrecy in tax court." The Times continues, "In the decision last week, Judge Harry A. Haines of the United States Tax Court ruled that the lawyer, Burton W. Kanter, and two associates had accepted kickbacks from the Pritzker family of Chicago, which owns the Hyatt hotels, and then evaded taxes on the payments. … Lawyers for the three said they were stunned by the decision and would appeal it, expecting it to go to the Supreme Court for a second time." The Times adds, "They said the decision ran counter to the findings of a special trial judge who heard the case in 1994. That judge, they said, determined that small amounts of tax were due because of technical violations but that there was no civil fraud. … The two associates are Claude M. Ballard, a former general partner at Goldman Sachs who before that was a real estate executive at Prudential Insurance, and Robert W. Lisle, a Prudential real estate executive who died before the original trial. Mr. Kanter died in 2001."

Netherlands Is Tax Shelter Hot-Spot For Royalty Earnings. The New York Times (2/4, Browning) reports, "Last spring, Keith Richards, the craggy-faced and hard-partying lead guitarist for the Rolling Stones, fell from a tree at a beach resort in Fiji, slamming his head against the trunk on his way down. Mr. Richards was flown to New Zealand, where a surgeon provided emergency care to treat swelling in his brain. While the accident forced the Rolling Stones to cancel part of their summer tour, Mr. Richards, 62, handily survived his plunge. … What two of the other three Rolling Stones apparently learned, including Mick Jagger and Charlie Watts, was that Mr. Richards's near-death experience meant that it was time to think about their heirs. For that, the aging rockers turned to a reclusive Dutch accountant, Johannes Favie, whose company, Promogroup, has helped them minimize their tax bills for more than 30 years. (The fourth Rolling Stone, Ron Wood, handles his finances apart from Promogroup.)" The Times adds, "And so, last August, according to details disclosed in documents maintained by the Handelsregister, the trade registry of the Netherlands, Promogroup helped the three performers set up a pair of private Dutch foundations that will allow them to transfer assets tax-free to heirs when they die. Other Dutch shelters that Promogroup has arranged for the three have already paid off handsomely; over the last 20 years, according to Dutch documents, the three musicians have paid just $7.2 million in taxes on earnings of $450 million that they have channeled through Amsterdam — a tax rate of about 1.5 percent, well below the British rate of 40 percent. … The Rolling Stones are not the only celebrities sheltering income in the land of tulips, windmills and Rembrandt. The rock powerhouse U2 has transferred lucrative assets to Amsterdam, as have other pop singers and well-known athletes, all of whom have used or continue to take advantage of the Netherlands' tax shelters, according to a Dutch tax lawyer who requested anonymity because of client confidentiality agreements." The Times notes, "When it comes to attracting celebrity wealth seeking shelter from taxes, the Cayman Islands and other classic Caribbean tax havens are receding in favor like so many waves on the beach, according to tax experts here and overseas. While old-school, offshore tax havens — the warm ones with tropical fish, off-the-shelf holding companies sporting post-office-box addresses, and scant regulation or transparency — still attract money, they are largely patronized, tax lawyers and entertainment bankers say, by hedge funds and private equity firms looking to protect lush trading profits from taxes. … But for earnings derived from intellectual property such as royalties, the Netherlands has become a tax shelter of choice. With celebrities lending their names and images to clothing lines, licensing their hit songs to corporate sponsors, seeking roles in Hollywood and engaging in other ventures that generate significant taxable income, the Dutch system, which does not tax royalties, offers a nifty shelter."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proposing 11% Pentagon Spending Jump, Medicaid And Medicare Cuts. The AP (2/3) reports the Pentagon "is the big winner in President Bush's proposed budget for next year, while domestic items such as aid to schools and grants to local governments will get slight increases. Medicare and Medicaid, the health program for the poor and disabled, would shoulder modest but politically difficult cost curbs in the budget the White House is submitting to Congress on Monday. Some $18 billion in budget savings would come from farm programs over five years. … Domestic agencies would not face an outright cut, as proposed last year, but would see increases averaging 1 percent, White House Budget director Rob Portman said. That is less than anticipated inflation, but higher costs for veterans' health care probably would result in a larger than average increase." The Pentagon "would get an 11 percent increase, to $481.4 billion in its core budget. And that is before accounting for an additional $235 billion in war costs over the next year and a half." The AP notes Bush's plan "will get a skeptical reception from the Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats say it meets the president's promise to balance the budget by 2012 by omitting war costs and expensive changes to the alternative minimum tax and assuming politically untenable cuts in payments to doctors under Medicare."

Medicare Beneficiaries Face Higher Premiums. The New York Times (2/4, A23, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "More and more Medicare beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for coverage of prescription drugs and doctors' services under President Bush's 2008 budget, to be unveiled on Monday. Single people with annual incomes over $80,000 and married couples with incomes over $160,000 already have to pay higher premiums for the part of Medicare that covers doctors' services. … Budget documents show that Mr. Bush will propose a similar surcharge on premiums for Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. In addition, the president will ask Congress to 'eliminate annual indexing of income thresholds,' so that more people would eventually have to pay the higher premiums."

Senators Seek To Close $300 Billion Tax Gap. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Washington has suddenly discovered a new buzzword — the 'tax gap' — and the roughly $300-billion pot of untouched gold that it promises. That's how much the Internal Revenue Service says taxpayers owe the government annually but, for various reasons, never pay. … Democrats and Republicans alike are talking it up as a way to fund politically appealing initiatives — and bring down the deficit to boot. 'Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities,' said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). The IRS is probably low-balling its estimate of the tax gap, he said, and there should be more than $300 billion available. To boost efforts to harvest it, the chairman and the top Republican member of the Senate's tax-writing finance committee, Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and Chuck Grassley of Iowa, took the unusual step last week of visiting the IRS and asking some of its top bureaucrats about the tax gap — and presumably ways it might be closed."

Bush Tax Cuts Said To Have Exacerbated Income Inequality. The Washington Post (2/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "went to Manhattan and acknowledged for the first time the reality of income inequality. … This week Mr. Bush will insist in his proposed budget that all of his tax cuts be extended. Those have proved enormously more beneficial to the super-rich than to anyone else. Given the reality that Mr. Bush has at last taken note of, such a policy just makes no sense."

Waxman Hearings Will Probe Administration's Reliance On Contractors. The New York Times (2/4, A1, Shane, Nixon, 1.16M) reports, "Without a public debate or formal policy decision, contractors have become a virtual fourth branch of government. On the rise for decades, spending on federal contracts has soared during the Bush administration, to about $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, fueled by the war in Iraq, domestic security and Hurricane Katrina, but also by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does. … The contracting explosion raises questions about propriety, cost and accountability that have long troubled watchdog groups and are coming under scrutiny from the Democratic majority in Congress." The Times notes that the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, "added the word 'oversight' to signal his intentions, begins a series of investigative hearings on Tuesday focusing on contracts in Iraq and at the Department of Homeland Security. 'Billions of dollars are being squandered, and the taxpayer is being taken to the cleaners,' said Mr. Waxman, who got an 'F' rating last year from the Contract Services Association, an industry coalition. The chairman he succeeded, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, earned an 'A.'"

Tester Becomes First Senator To Post His Daily Schedule. The Washington Post (2/4, A6, Layton, 690K) reports Sen. Jon Tester stands out from the other 99 members of the Senate" in that he "posts his daily schedule on his Web site for all the world to see. In a culture where lawmakers spend hours in closed-door meetings, and their activities out of the public eye are considered proprietary, Tester is a trailblazer bent on opening up the inner workings of his office. His radical practice comes after irate voters in November tossed out longtime incumbents implicated in lobbying scandals and as public interest groups clamor for more transparency in the way Congress does business. … Every session with lobbyists, constituents and other lawmakers is conscientiously recorded, including names, affiliations and the duration of the meeting. 'I just wanted to give people an opportunity to see who I meet with,' said Tester. … 'I believe in transparent government and this is my effort.'" The Post notes Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand "is doing something similar. Although she gives less detail than Tester, Gillibrand lists her work-related meetings each day on her Web site."

WPost Decries Attempts To Stop Disclosure Of Lobbyists' Contributions. The Washington Post (2/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that "disturbing, though not particularly surprising, rumblings are emanating from the House of Representatives to the effect that some Democrats are balking at requiring lobbyists to disclose the campaign contributions they arrange or collect for lawmakers. … The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported last week that some Democratic House members, egged on by K Street lobbyists, are agitating to have the provision removed. That can't be allowed to happen."

Cardin Assumes More Active Role As Senator. The Washington Times (2/4, Miller, 88K) reports Sen. Benjamin Cardin "has distinguished himself…with bold words and an aggressive style. In his first speech on the Senate floor, delivered a week after taking office, Mr. Cardin denounced President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq and called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces." Cardin "also spoke passionately about global warming as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee. 'The impact of global warming is real and right before our eyes,' he said. 'It's a crisis that affects every human being on this Earth, and we must take action now.'" Cardin's "quick transition from 20-year House veteran to up-and-coming freshman senator has not gone unnoticed by his colleagues."

Experts, Officials Protest Planned Closure Of Armed Forces Institute Of Pathology. The Washington Post (2/4, A10, Lee, 690K) reports, "Medical specialists and former military officials are protesting the planned dismantling of a Defense Department health agency whose origin dates to the Civil War, saying the move would eliminate an invaluable tool in the diagnosis and understanding of disease. The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology is scheduled to be broken up as part of the federal base-closing process that will shutter Walter Reed Army Medical Center by 2011."

Bush Health Care Proposal Seen As Step Toward Systemic Reform. The Washington Post's David Broder (2/4, B7) writes, ""A major barrier to" healthcare reform "is the feature of the federal tax code that subsidizes job-based health insurance by making its cost deductible to the business and tax-free to the employee. As C. Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute testified to Congress last week, this represents a $200 billion-a-year subsidy, with most of the benefits going to the well-to-do -- a sum that could be much better spent on helping the uninsured. President Bush has proposed a partial remedy for that problem, substituting a flat deduction for the value of every health insurance policy costing the employer and worker up to $7,500 a person. … Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, joined many Democrats in saying that Bush's proposal can be improved by using tax credits, rather than deductions, to distribute the benefits."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Update Public Campaign Financing. The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain have already signaled their intentions to make a shameful and lucrative retreat to private fund-raising. The Clinton camp is creating a new honored donor category for those who bag at least a million dollars each. … All of this is because past Congresses failed to update the public financing option to keep pace with the costs of running a modern campaign." The Times concludes, "The new Congress pledged to clean up big-money corruption; it can make a good start by rescuing the good that came of Watergate."

LATimes Calls New Farm Bill A "Modest Fix." The Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) editorializes, "The Bush administration last week unveiled its proposal for the 2007 farm bill, a blueprint spelling out U.S. agricultural subsidies and food stamp payments for the next five years. For anybody interested in fairness, government waste, free trade or economic growth, it was a deeply disappointing document, even if it is a major improvement over the trade-distorting porkapalooza that was the 2002 farm bill. The trouble is, even this modest fix is being heavily resisted by the farm lobby and its backers in Congress."

Giuliani Says "There's A Real Good Chance" He Will Seek Presidency. The New York Times (2/4, A27, Rivera, 1.16M) reports Rudy Giuliani "appeared to move a step closer to announcing his presidential ambitions yesterday, saying after an appearance in South Carolina that 'there's a real good chance' he will run." While Giuliani "has made two trips to New Hampshire…and has promised to make more," on the "nascent campaign trail itself," Giuliani "has coyly stepped around the question of 'Will he or won't he?'" The AP (2/3) says that Giuliani made the comment following a 30-minute speech and question-and-answer session with South Carolina GOP leaders.

"Oral History" Chronicles Giuliani's Career. The New York Times (2/4, A30, Roberts, 1.16M) examines "Giuliani: Flawed or Flawless?" by Deborah Hart Strober and Gerald S. Strober, an "oral history" consisting of interviews with "friends, former friends, and unforgiving foes" of Giuliani.

McCain Turns To Ex-Foes For Campaign Team. The New York Times (2/4, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Sen. John McCain's "team of political bruisers for 2008" includes "advisers who once sought to skewer him and whose work he has criticized as stepping over the line in the past." For example, McCain has hired three members of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign team to make ads. McCain's advisers "said he was not changing. But they were unapologetic about putting together a group dedicated to doing what it takes to reach the White House and employing lessons from his defeat at the hands of Mr. Bush in 2000." McCain's "longtime senior strategist" John Weaver said, "This is about winning at the end of the day. I don't want to be in a knife fight ever again, but if I am, we're going to win it."

Romney Plans To "Derail" McCain In South Carolina. In the South Carolina newspaper the State (2/4), Lee Bandy writes, "Mitt Romney's assignment in the 2008 S.C. Republican presidential primary is simply this: Derail John McCain's 'Straight Talk Express.' If there were any doubts about Romney's mission, they were erased during the former Massachusetts governor's two-day visit to the state last week." Romney "attracted large, enthusiastic crowds at stops in Charleston, Aiken and Columbia. It was a shot in the arm for his campaign."

Hagel, McCain Pursue Different Maverick Paths. The New York Times (2/4, A27, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "he first time Senator John McCain ran for president, few allies were more loyal than Senator Chuck Hagel ... But at the dawn of the 2008 presidential campaign, as a debate over the administration's Iraq policy intensifies on Capitol Hill, Mr. Hagel is standing alone. Mr. McCain is perhaps the most influential and outspoken supporter in Congress of the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Hagel is the most outspoken critic of the war among Senate Republicans." The "gulf between them is a personal manifestation of the broader national debate over the war and, to some degree, the legacy and lessons of Vietnam. It also speaks to the deep divisions among Republicans as they confront the political fallout from the war, the need to develop a post-Bush posture on national security and the fight over who should lead their party and the country."

Lieberman Not Interested In Being McCain's Running Mate. The Hartford Courant (2/3, Pazniokas, 190K) reported Saturday that Sen. Joe Lieberman put the damper on "speculation he might join Republican Sen. John McCain on a fusion ticket" in 2008, saying, "No, that's not going to happen. My days of seeking national office are over."

House Conservatives Debate 2008 Strategy. The Washington Times (2/4, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Conservative House Republicans are disappointed that their leaders have no strategy to win back in 2008 the majority they lost in November. 'We think they need to be a lot more aggressive than they are,' Rep. Steve King of Iowa said. 'They don't seem willing to have blood on the floor, and there's got to be blood on the floor.' … The 48 conservative lawmakers who met here for the annual House Republican Study Committee (RSC) retreat generally agreed that their 2008 presidential nominee would be Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. 'I don't see any one of them being singled out as a great front-runner by the House Republican members or any one of them being singled out as a "no-go,"' Rep. Tom Price of Georgia said. 'But whichever one of the three gets the nomination is going to have to have some link to the South, which is the bedrock of the Republican Party.' But the legislators also agreed they were not inclined to coalesce behind any one of the three and thought each of them fell short of the highest conservative standards. Though the Heritage Foundation, sponsor of the annual retreat, had invited all three of the men to speak, only Mr. Romney showed up."

Giuliani Leads McCain By Seven Points In ARG Iowa Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely Iowa Republican caucus voters (+/- 4%), made up of 509 Republicans and 91 independents and conducted January 29-February 1, finds Rudy Giuliani at 27%, Sen. John McCain 22%, Newt Gingrich 16%, Mitt Romney 11%, Sen. Chuck Hagel 5%, Mike Huckabee 2%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, and Jim Gilmore, Rep. Duncan

Hunter, George Pataki, Rep. Ron Paul, and Tommy Thompson each at 0%, with 15% undecided.

McCain Leads, Giuliani And Romney Tied For Second, In ARG New Hampshire Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely New Hampshire Republican primary voters (+/- 4%), made up of 427 Republicans and 173 independents and conducted January 31-February 1, finds Sen. John McCain at 27%, Rudy Giuliani at Mitt Romney tied at 20% each, Newt Gingrich 11%, Sen. Chuck Hagel 4%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Mike Huckabee 1%, Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, and Jim Gilmore, Rep. Duncan Hunter, George Pataki, Rep. Ron Paul, and Tommy Thompson each at 0%, with 15% undecided.

McCain Leads Giuliani By Nine Points In South Carolina Poll. A Whit Ayres poll of 500 likely South Carolina Republican primary voters conducted January 24-28 finds Sen. John McCain at 29%, Rudy Giuliani 20%, Newt Gingrich 14%, Mitt Romney 6%, Sen. Sam Brownback 2%, Mike Huckabee 2%, Rep. Duncan Hunter 2%, and Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, with 23% undecided.

Giuliani, McCain Closely Matched In Michigan Poll. A Detroit Free Press-Local 4 Michigan poll on the Michigan Republican primary (+/- 8%) conducted last week finds Rudy Giuliani at 32%, Sen. John McCain 28%, Newt Gingrich 16%, and Mitt Romney at 8%.

Democratic Presidential Candidates Continue Attacks On Iraq War. The Washington Times (2/4, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic candidates whom many consider underdogs for the presidential nomination in 2008 continued their party's attacks on the Iraq war yesterday, demanding it be ended and the troops brought home immediately." Sen. Joseph Biden, Gov. Bill Richardson, and ex- Gov. Tom Vilsack addressed the meeting Saturday. Biden "said reducing the number of troops in Iraq, 'not escalating America's troops, is the only way to force Iraq's leaders to seek a political settlement.'" Vilsack "went further than many of his Democratic rivals who are calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next year or two." Richardson "also raised the end-the-war ante against his party's pack of candidates in a speech that pointedly criticized the Democrats' pending nonbinding Senate resolution against Mr. Bush's troop surge."

The Washington Post (2/4, A4, Balz, 690K) says the Iraq war "is shaping the opening stages of the contest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, just as it did in the 2004 campaign. After 10 candidates' speeches over two days at the winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, the war proved again to be the central point of differentiation among the party's presidential contenders." While "everyone" in the field now opposes the war, the "self-styled outsiders in the race -- those not in the Senate -- see political gain in pressing for a speedy end to the war."

The Albuquerque Tribune (2/4, Brosnan) says Richardson told Democrats Congress "should repeal the authorization for the Iraq War and 'bring our troops home by the end of this year.'" The Des Moines Register (2/4, 160K) reports Tom Vilsack "painted himself as an outsider and a truth-teller before members" of the DNC, "calling for an immediate end to financing of the war in Iraq." Vilsack "was the last of 10 presidential candidates to speak over two days to key Democrats from across the country shopping for their next nominee."

DNC Unanimously Backs House Vote For District Of Columbia. The Washington Post (2/4, C3, Pierre, 690K) reports the District of Columbia's "effort to win a full seat in the House of Representatives won unanimous support yesterday from the Democratic National Committee. It was the first step in a national lobbying campaign that will ask each of the presidential candidates to embrace the idea and will include grass-roots efforts in such early-voting states as Iowa and New Hampshire."

Biden Expresses "Regret" Over Comments About Obama. The AP (2/3, Pickler) reports Sen. Joseph Biden "tried yesterday to stem the damage from the botched launch of his presidential campaign as underdog candidates in the Democratic field looked to gain momentum from the party faithful." Biden "got right to the matter that has threatened his candidacy before it even gets off the ground," saying of his comments on Sen. Barack Obama and past black presidential candidates, "I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people that I admire very much."

More Commentary On Biden. Under the headline "Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief," the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/4) editorializes, "This guy is a one-man laugh factory. Despite his lack of tact, we don't think Biden really is a bigot. He is, however, the court jester of the U.S. Senate. Bringing his act on the road would provide some much-needed stress relief for the American people. If Democrats really cared about providing relief to the American people, they'd nominate a walking punch line so we could all spend the bulk of the election year laughing at the ineptitude of their candidate -- just like in 2004. If we get really lucky, Biden will get the nomination and pick Dennis Kucinich as his straight man/running mate."

In his Washington Post (2/4, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "Reporters who long ago learned to concentrate on Biden's ideas rather than on his ill-assorted nouns, verbs and adjectives had to treat this gaffe as momentous: Against much of the available evidence, Biden had just declared that he was a serious presidential contender. The Delaware senator is a thoroughly decent, hardworking and thoughtful legislator. But I found it unnerving in his previous bid for the Democratic nomination, in 1988, to have him frequently deliver a loosely connected set of ideas during an interview and then look up to ask: 'Am I making sense here?' So I say, plus ça change."

In his Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "I'm not saying Biden shouldn't be president. I have tons of respect for him, and I think he'd do a terrific job if he could get it. I just find it amusing that he thinks there's some chance he could actually become president. It's a case study of that bizarre mental affliction that strikes so many senators. They see younger, less-experienced Senate colleagues -- who are far less esteemed than they are -- running for president, and they're offended. If the 100 senators were the only ones who could vote, Biden would probably beat Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. Unfortunately for Biden, that's not how it works. … Biden looks as if he's the product of a laboratory experiment designed to create the world's worst presidential candidate. If the Obama gaffe doesn't knock him out of the race, something else will. I doubt he makes it to Iowa. Yes, Biden's very knowledgeable and dedicated. But to win the presidency, you actually have to be good at mass politics. Why is Biden not smart enough to recognize that?"

In the New York Times (2/4, WK1, 1.16M), Lynette Clemetson writes that Biden's characterization of Obama "as 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy' was so painfully clumsy that it nearly warranted pity. There are not enough column inches on this page to parse interpretations of each of Mr. Biden's chosen adjectives. But among his string of loaded words, one is so pervasive -- and is generally used and viewed so differently by blacks and whites -- that it calls out for a national chat, perhaps a national therapy session. It is amazing that this still requires clarification, but here it is. Black people get a little testy when white people call them 'articulate.'"

Gore Again Says He Has No Plans To Run In 2008. KEYT-TV Santa Barbara, California (2/3, 6:55 p.m.) reported, "Some say he will, some say he won't; KEY News has the official answer. Former Vice President Al Gore told us he has no plans to run for president in 2008. The Oscar nominee made a stop in Santa Barbara Saturday night to receive an honor from the Santa Barbara International Film Festival."

"Power Couple" Close To Clintons Hosted Richardson Fundraiser. The Washington Post (2/4, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) writes that "power couple" Beth and Ron Dozoretz, "longtime heavyweights in national Democratic money circles" and "close friends" of the Clintons, are making "tough choices." They hosted a fundraiser for Gov. Bill Richardson Friday; a Richardson spokesman said, "They and the governor are longtime friends." Some suggest the couple "has indicated privately that they will be with Richardson. Clinton communications director Howard Wolfson begged to differ." Wolfson said, "Beth Dozoretz is a good friend of the campaign, and she has made a major commitment to help Hillary. We appreciate her strong support."

Richardson Brings International Experience To Campaign. The AP (2/3, Pickler) profiles Richardson, saying it has been said that he "would negotiate with the devil. And by some definitions, he has -- several times." Richardson "has bartered with some of the most notorious rulers of modern times: Iraq 's Saddam Hussein , Yugoslavia's Slobodan Milosevic , Cuba's Fidel Castro , Kenya's Daniel Arap Moi, Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, Nigeria's Sani Abacha and most recently, Sudan's Omar al-Bashir. Richardson has compared himself to Red Adair, renowned for his ability to put out erupting oil well fires." Richardson "has more international experience than just about anyone else in the 2008 field. The 59-year-old was ambassador to the United Nations in the Clinton administration, served on the intelligence committee during his 14 years in the House and has done international work from his perch as a small-state governor."

Richardson Not Interested In Vice Presidency, State Department. The New York Times Magazine (2/4, Solomon) interviews Richardson, asking, "As the popular governor of New Mexico but one of the less-popular candidates seeking the Democratic nomination for president, did you enter the race to actually win or merely to angle for another position at the national level?" Richardson replied, "I want to be president. If I don't win the presidency, I am not interested in the vice presidency or in being secretary of state."

Illinois Senate President Says Blacks Should Back Obama. The Politico (2/3, Ben Smith) reports Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., a "key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama," urged "united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians." The comments by Jones, "which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists."

Safire Says Obama Chooses Words With Care. In his New York Times Magazine (2/4) "On Language" column, William Safire writes that Obama "is a politician who apparently chooses his words with care." Safire also warns Obama that "one way to zap a hitherto little-known person getting a rush of publicity is to afflict him with the bogus title media darling. That's because media, when construed as singular -- especially as mass media and mainstream media -- connotes to its crowd of critics some manipulative monolith whose control of communication is to be resisted."

Clinton Jumps To 17-Point Lead Over Edwards In ARG Iowa Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely Iowa Democratic caucus voters (+/- 4%), made up of 493 Republicans and 107 independents and conducted January 29-February 1, finds Sen. Hillary Clinton at 35%, John Edwards 18%, Sen. Barack Obama 14%, Tom Vilsack 12%, Sen. Joseph Biden 2%, Wesley Clark 2%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 2%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 1%, Gov. Bill Richardson 1%, and Mike Gravel 0%, with 12% undecided.

Clinton Leads Obama By 20 Points In ARG New Hampshire Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely New Hampshire Democratic primary voters (+/- 4%), made up of 408 Democrats and 192 independents and conducted January 31-February 1, finds Sen. Hillary Clinton at 39%, Sen. Barack Obama 19%, John Edwards 13%, Wesley Clark 2%, Gov. Bill Richardson 2%, Sen. Joseph Biden 1%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 1%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 1%, Tom Vilsack 1%, and Mike Gravel 0%, with 21% undecided.

Grove Biographer Questions Prohibition On Immigrants Seeking Presidency. In a Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) op-ed, Richard Tedlow of the Harvard Business School, author of "Andy Grove: The Life and Times of an American," writes that immigrant innovators like the former Intel chief are not prohibited from "leading a U.S.-based company" but are prohibited from seeking the presidency. Tedlow writes, "What if our Constitution had told Grove: 'You can't change the world because you come from Hungary.' Sound ridiculous? Of course it does. Imagine what else would have been lost if we faced such constraints in the business world. What if the Constitution said: Pierre Omidyar, you can't found eBay here because you were born in France. Sergey Brin, you can't co-found Google here because you were born in Russia. Jerry Yang, you can't co-found Yahoo here because you were born in Taiwan. … It is odd that this freedom to harness the best and the brightest Americans, including immigrants, is a guiding principle at every address in our nation except for one: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

Iran Invites Diplomats, Reporters To Tour Nuclear Site. Under the headline, "Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site," the New York Times (2/4, Fathi, 1.16M) notes Tehran "opened" the Isfahan facility "to a large number of local and international reporters and a delegation of foreign ambassadors on Saturday in an effort to show the transparency of its program before a United Nations Security Council deadline this month." Officials have "kept up efforts to give the Isfahan facility more publicity, and a senior tourism official said late last year that Iran planned to open it and other nuclear sites to foreign tourists." Ambassador Ali Asghar Soltanieh "said Saturday that the purpose of the tour was to assure the world that Iran's program was peaceful." The Times notes that reporters "passed the Natanz enrichment facility but were not permitted to tour the site, where Iran recently said it was installing 3,000 centrifuges."

The AP (2/4, Dareini) calls Isfahan "a key uranium conversion facility," and says Tehran "opened" its "gates" to "visiting diplomats and journalists in an effort to show that its disputed nuclear program is peaceful and not a cover for nuclear bomb making." The "visitors saw several areas of the Isfahan facility, including two cameras installed by the IAEA to monitor activity where uranium gas is produced."

On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (2/4, A1, Murphy, 850K) describes Isfahan as the city "where Iran has been taking the initial technological steps to turn ordinary uranium into the makings of nuclear fuel." Those foreigners accepting Tehran's "rare invitation" to tour the site heard from officials "that the fledgling conversion program, which was in its infancy only three years ago, has now manufactured 250 tons of uranium hexafluoride gas, the feedstock for Iran's controversial uranium enrichment program." The Times adds, "Saturday's tour was mainly a publicity exercise; the delegates admitted that they understood little of what they were seeing. But it was clearly part of a strong effort on Iran's part to demonstrate its willingness to open up its nuclear program to inspection." However, "not all of the uranium conversion facility was on view Saturday."

Iran May Not Have Know-How To Back Up Nuclear Claims. An extensive analysis in today's New York Times (2/4, Broad, Sanger, 1.16M) notes, "After decades of largely clandestine efforts, Iran is expected to declare in coming days that it has made a huge leap toward industrial-scale production of enriched uranium — a defiant act that the country's leaders will herald as a major technical stride and its neighbors will denounce as a looming threat. But for now, many nuclear experts say, the frenetic activity at the desert enrichment plant in Natanz may be mostly about political showmanship." The Times cites the "many setbacks and outright failures of Tehran's experimental program," and says that history suggests "that its bluster may outstrip its technical expertise." The Times continues, "What the Iranians are not talking about, experts with access to the atomic agency's information say, is that their experimental effort to make centrifuges work has struggled to achieve even limited success and appears to have been put on the back burner so the country's leaders can declare that they are moving to the next stage." Tehran's "nuclear boasts come in the midst of an increasingly rancorous chess game between Tehran's mullahs and the Bush administration over the aims of Iran's nuclear programs, its role in Iraq and its ambitions to become the dominant power in the Middle East."

Retired Flag Officers Ask Bush, Blair To Engage Diplomatically With Tehran. The AP (2/4, Lawless) reports, "Three former high-ranking U.S. military officers have called for Britain to help defuse the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, saying military action against Tehran would be a disaster for the region." The letter to the editor of the Sunday Times, written by Lt. Gen. Robert Gard, Gen. Joseph Hoar, and Vice Admiral Jack Shanahan, "urged President Bush to open talks 'without preconditions' with the Iranian government to find a diplomatic solution." The three retired officers "said Britain 'has a vital role to play in securing a renewed diplomatic push' and urged Prime Minister Tony Blair to make it clear he would oppose any military attack on Iran." They "said an attack 'would have disastrous consequences for security in the region, coalition forces in Iraq and would further exacerbate regional and global tensions.'"

Ex-Intelligence Offer Considers What To Ask Before "Next War." In the Washington Post (2/4, B7, 690K) Outlook, war critic and former intelligence officer Paul Pillar writes, "The administration so successfully shaped the policy question around its chosen selling points [on war with Iraq] that what passed for a national debate gave little attention to important questions about the likely nature and consequences of a war. ... Now, an accelerating debate about Iran and its nuclear program shows signs of the same dangerous reductionism." Pillar writes, "Some might argue that the worst case that could ensue from an Iranian nuclear weapon is so bad that it trumps all other considerations. But there is no more reason than there was with Iraq to consider the worst case of only one side of the policy equation. And the worst case that could result from U.S.-Iranian combat is plenty frightening: thousands of Americans dead from retaliatory terrorist attacks, a broader war in the Persian Gulf, $150-per-barrel oil, a global recession and more."

North Korea Allegedly Offers To Trade Nuclear Activity For Oil, Sanctions Relief. The AP (2/4, Chang) carries Japanese press reports that North Korea "is ready to freeze a key nuclear facility and allow international inspectors limited access to the country in exchange for millions of barrels of oil and an easing of U.S. financial restrictions." The Japanese reporting "quoted former U.S. State Department official Joel Wit, who met the North's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, and other regime officials during a visit to Pyongyang last week. It said the North was demanding half a million tons of oil a year — the equivalent of about 3.5 million barrels — in energy aid."

Kosovo Status Plan Said To Be Fraught With Regional Risks. The New York Times (2/4, Smith, 1.16M) describes Kosovar reactions to likely changes in the province's political status. It remains "bitterly divided between Serbian enclaves, including a large chunk of the north, and the rest of the territory, which is overwhelmingly ethnic Albanian." Any movement towards "secession by northern Serbs could provoke Albanian reprisals against Serbian enclaves elsewhere in Kosovo, warn Serbs and Albanians alike, and could destabilize a still fragile region full of ethnic slivers separated from their homelands." The Times says "the continued standoff suggested that the intended end may instead be a prologue to another difficult chapter in a troubled history." Noting the "deep" and "emotional connection to place [that] many Europeans have," the Times says European "countries facing their own secessionist movements … are skeptical of what they see as an American effort to jam a solution into place so Washington can turn its attention elsewhere."

Amid Continued Fighting, Hamas, Fatah Jointly Condemn Quartet's Aid Ban. Under the headline, "Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott," AFP (2/4) notes Hamas and Fatah "have both condemned the failure of the major powers involved in Middle East peacemaking to end a punishing Western aid embargo on the Palestinians." Prime Minsiter Ismail Haniya is quoted saying the Quartet's "decisions mean more suffering for our people. Continuing the siege is to continue the pain and injury we suffer from throughout the year."

BBC.com (2/4) focuses its coverage on comments by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that Hamas and Fatah "have made progress towards agreeing a government of national unity." Mubarak "said he was working to 'seal the crack' between the two sides. … 'What is happening now is a problem between the Palestinians themselves, and it is impossible for the Palestinian side to sit with the Israelis, as they are still not agreeing with each other.'" German Chancellor Angela Merkel, appearing with Mubarak, "praised Egypt's efforts to broker a deal between the two factions. She also said she hoped the Middle East quartet of the US, UN, EU and Russia would develop a coherent strategy for peace rather than working in isolation towards peace in the region." Describing yesterday's violence in Gaza, the BBC says the two sides "have repeatedly agreed to ceasefires, aimed at ending a bitter power struggle," however, "a very similar plan was declared on Friday but failed to halt the violence."

Hamas "Consolidating" Hold On Gaza. A lengthy New York Times (2/4, Erlanger, 1.16M) piece describes the tactical situation in Gaza. "Forces loyal to Hamas appeared to consolidate their hold on northern Gaza and much of Gaza City on Saturday, with at least 12 more people wounded in continuing clashes between" the two sides. "What has been some of the worst internal Palestinian fighting in years ebbed overnight after the warring factions … met to try to arrange a cease-fire." Hamas is coordinating an extensive system of roadblocks, and "detentions or kidnappings of fighters were reported, with Fatah accusing Hamas of detaining as many as 40 of its" fighters. Among civilians, "few people ventured from their homes, and many stayed away from windows."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Ellingwood, 850K) titles its coverage, "Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce." The fighting was "not as sustained or heavy as those of the previous two days, which left 23 people dead and scores injured. … Although the fighting had tapered off, the air in Gaza City was of a place besieged." The AP (2/4, Barzak) says both sides are "ignoring" the "truce deal" within Gaza. "Gunbattles raged across Gaza after the truce was announced, continuing through the night and early Saturday. With no casualties reported overnight, some Gazans, who had spent the previous two days huddled at home for safety, were emboldened to leave their houses to go to work."

Labor Revolt Against Blair Called Increasingly Likely. The Washington Times (2/4, Helm, 88K) reports, "The first cracks in Cabinet support for Prime Minister Tony Blair have emerged, with senior ministers questioning whether he can remain in office for another five months without inflicting lasting damage on the Labor Party." Blair's "defiant" refusal to "be hounded from office" has "failed to stem growing pressure for him to quit before the midterm May elections." The Times says high-ranking Labor MPs "have reported a collapse of morale within the party," and "some senior" Labor MPs are said to seek the Cabinet's support for Blair's removal. The Times also cites an opinion poll suggesting "that more than half of British voters believe Mr. Blair should leave office immediately."

UK Turkey Farm Infected With Deadly H5N1 Bird Flu. On its front page today, the Washington Times (2/4, A1, 88K) reports British authorities "scrambled to contain [the nation's] first outbreak of the highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of bird flu in domestic poultry yesterday after the virus was found at a farm run by Europe's biggest turkey producer." Officials will cull all of the 159,000 turkeys currently at the Bernard Matthews farm, near the town of Lowestoft. This outbreak is "the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm." The New York Times (2/4, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) adds the 2,500 turkeys killed by the virus so far at the Bernard Matthews farm makes this "the biggest outbreak of the strain reported in Britain since concern about its global spread began to take root in 2003." The Times says the "prospect of a mass slaughter recalled Britain's battle with foot-and-mouth disease in 2001, when nearly four million animals, mainly sheep, pigs and cows, were burned."

All three broadcast networks reported on the outbreak. ABC World News (2/3, story 7, :10, Weir, 8.78M) reported officials "are scrambling to contain an outbreak of bird flu on a turkey farm. … The first time bird flu has been detected in Britain since a dead wild swan washed ashore in Scotland last spring." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 4, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time, the deadly strain of bird flu has shown up in England." NBC Nightly News (2/3, story 4, :10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The bird flu is back in the news. Officials in the United Kingdom have confirmed their first major outbreak of bird flu. More than 2,500 turkeys have died in the same strain of bird flu that's killed people around the world. No sign this outbreak has spread to humans."

The Washington Post (2/4, A14, Sullivan, 690K) notes the H5N1 strain "has killed 165 people" worldwide in the past four years. This "outbreak is the first confirmed case of H5N1 among British domestic poultry in more than 15 years, officials said, and it comes at a time of increasing concern that migrating birds are carrying the disease from its origins in Asia through Africa, the Middle East and deeper into Europe." The Post adds that "health officials said the immediate risk to humans from the Suffolk case was 'extremely low.'" The AP (2/3) calls the infection "Britain's first mass outbreak of the disease that has ravaged Asia's poultry stocks and killed more than 160 people worldwide." This outbreak "was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm." British "experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk."

Turkmen Presidential Candidates Expand Debate Despite Certain Outcome. The Washington Post (2/4, A14, Finn, 690K) profiles the candidates and probable outcome of Turkmenistan's February 11 presidential vote. "Acting President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, 49, will almost certainly win when the Central Asian country's citizens go to the polls Feb. 11. His opponents, a deputy minister and four regional officials, are willing foils, according to analysts and exiled politicians." However, "the modicum of debate in a country that during its 15-plus years of independence lived under the megalomaniacal shadow of president-for-life Saparmurad Niyazov amounts to a slight thaw. For the first time, the country will hold a presidential election in which more than one candidate is running." While "each of the six candidates continues to pledge loyalty to the legacy of Niyazov," many of their "speeches contain some implicit criticism of the late president by acknowledging the need to reverse the erosion of social programs, in particular."

China's Hu Faces Skeptical Public In Zambia. Continuing coverage of Chinese President Hu Jintao's trip to Africa, the Washington Times/AP (2/4, Schatz) says Hu "brought his eight-nation African tour to Zambia, a copper-rich country where China's growing clout has prompted charges of exploitation and has emerged as a volatile political issue." Hu "has used the tour to cement China's increasing economic and political ties and its fast-growing role as a foreign donor throughout the continent." He planned "to attend a state banquet and meet with" Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa, "who has cultivated close ties with China. The country is a major foreign aid donor to Mr. Mwanawasa's government," and "has poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Zambia's copper sector, which accounts for 60 percent of the impoverished nation's exports." Hu's stop in Lusaka "is expected to focus on new Chinese aid for Zambia and the inauguration today of an economic partnership zone in Zambia's Copperbelt province, which has become a key source of copper for China's growing economy."

LATimes Implores Bush To Back Turkish-American Genocide Resolution. In an editorial

today, the Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) says there is "new hope" for Rep. Adam Schiff's non-binding Turkish-Armenian genocide resolution. The January murder of journalist Hrant Dink has increased pressure for passage, and "has sent a collective shiver down Turkey's spine, triggering street demonstrations and renewed calls for the government to change its policy." The Times says Schiff's "mild" text "makes the White House's opposition all the more vexing." While "Ankara has considerable diplomatic influence, and Turkey is too valuable an ally to alienate with congressional resolutions," the Times concludes that Washington "is at its best when it chooses truth over expedience, especially in matters as grave as genocide. It's hard to say 'never again' convincingly if you're too afraid to speak bluntly about what you aim to prevent."

Fukuyama Warns Against Pessimism, Says US, World Still Seeing Progress. In a 1,700-word op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K), scholar Francis Fukuyama cautions against becoming "very discouraged" about the modern world. "We "should stop to consider a broader context in which things look a lot brighter. The single most notable but overlooked fact about today's world is that the global economy has been driving ahead full speed, raising living standards and closing the gap between the First and Third worlds." China, India and East Asia are enjoying relative prosperity, and "the rest of the world is growing steadily too," especially Latin America and Sub-Saharan Africa. "These trends in the developing world are increasingly driven by south-south trade," and that "has spawned world-class multinational companies from developing countries." Fukuyama notes the "robustness" of worldwide growth, and says the "huge vulnerabilities" many experts see are exaggerated. He adds that, "in the long run, many of today's troublesome political trends are unlikely to be sustained," and "even pessimism about Iraq is overdone."

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 28

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Responds To Hayat Retrial Motion, Dispute Juror Misconduct Claim. The Sacramento Bee (2/4, B1, Walsh) reported, "Federal prosecutors said Saturday there is little or no evidence to support allegations of juror misconduct in a motion for a new trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity. Misconduct claims on behalf of Hamid Hayat are barred by rules of evidence, cannot be substantiated, actually describe proper conduct, or describe conduct not harmful to Hayat, prosecutors maintain in a 187-page brief opposing a new trial. In their October motion, defense attorneys cite a statement by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a 'hangman gesture' and once said 'hang him' in discussions with other jurors during the trial." The Bee adds, "Burrell erroneously rejected the defense's attempt to present James Wedick, a retired FBI agent, as an expert witness on the bureau's policies and procedures for interviews, the defense lawyers argued in their motion. … But the prosecutors argued in Saturday's brief that Wedick's testimony 'would have been needlessly confusing, cumulative and wasteful of time.'"

The Stockton Record (2/4, Hood) reported that in addition to addressing the juror misconduct allegations, prosecutors "stated the defense's claim that it has new proof of Hayat's innocence -- the testimony of Hayat cousins Usama Ismail and Jaber Ismail of Lodi -- is not accurate, saying there is a legal difference between 'newly discovered' and 'newly available' evidence, because they did not subpoena Usama Ismail to testify and made no effort to obtain testimony from Jaber Ismail, who was in Pakistan during the trial." The AP (2/4) noted, "The defense motion also highlights post-trial statement's by Cote in an Atlantic magazine report suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings. Prosecutors answered that the Atlantic article should be given little weight and that 'it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a "racist statement," or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds.'"

Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges Faces Continuing Legal Battles. The Daily Southtown (IL) (2/4, Hack) reports, "Attorneys for Mohammed Salah, who was acquitted of racketeering charges last week, have vowed to keep working to clear the name of the Bridgeview man deemed a terrorist by the federal government and to help his family lead a normal life. … 'These good people have had their lives put through the wringer,' longtime Salah attorney Matthew Piers said Friday. 'We are not done fighting on behalf of this family.'" The Southtown continues, "While the long-looming threat of a hefty prison sentence may now be off the table, Salah still faces an uncertain future of civil-court judgments, restricted liberties and the stigma of the government's terrorist label." The Southtown adds, "Salah, 53, was acquitted Thursday of the terrorism-related charges after a three-month trial. He was found guilty of a far lesser charge of obstruction of justice, but the overall outcome marked a dramatic victory for the defense in a case once touted by the U.S. Justice Department as an important component of the war on terror. … 'If this is the government's idea of the war on terror, it should keep us all awake at night,' said Piers, a vocal critic of several federal anti-terror cases unveiled after 9-11. 'This was a political prosecution plain and simple, and I think everyone in that courtroom knew it.' … In the racketeering case, Salah was accused of breaking American laws to aid the militant Palestinian group Hamas, which is considered a terrorist group by the U.S. government. According to federal prosecutors, he delivered laundered money to Hamas operatives in the Occupied Territories in the early 1990s and helped recruit would-be terrorists." The Southtown notes, "The obstruction charge normally wouldn't carry much prison time, although prosecutors might push to have Salah's 1993 conviction in an Israeli military court on Hamas money-running charges count against him here. Defense attorneys, who insist the Israeli conviction was the result of bogus confessions tortured out of Salah during a two-month interrogation session, contend Salah should receive only probation for the U.S. conviction. … Also hanging over Salah's head is a 1998 civil case filed by federal prosecutors in a bid to seize $1.4 million in cash and assets they claimed Salah meant to funnel to Hamas. That civil case was put on hold as a criminal probe into Salah's alleged Hamas links stopped and started over the years."

Columnist Blasts US Over Treatment Of Arar. In a column for the St. Petersburg (FL) Times (2/4), Robyn E. Blumner writes, "'On behalf of the United States, I wish to apologize to you and your family,' President Bush told Maher Arar in a televised news conference, during which the president announced that the United States was also giving Arar $8.9-million in compensation for our role in sending the Canadian to a Syrian prison where he was tortured. … Okay, now it's time to wake up from a dream. This scene happened all right, not in the United States but in Canada, and the nobly contrite politician was Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, not our own Decider-in-Chief." Blumner continues, "Since Arar's return to Canada, our neighbor to the north has committed itself to investigating its role in this outrage. A two-year inquiry by Justice Dennis O'Connor concluded that there was no evidence linking Arar to terrorism and that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were demonstrably wrong when they informed U.S. border agents that Arar was suspected of Islamic extremism. The head of the RCMP resigned over the incident. … Canada has now issued a very public apology, coming straight from its national leader, and the nation will compensate Arar for its hand in his terrifying ordeal … Before George W. Bush came to the White House, I would have expected our own government to act in a very similar manner: a public apology, the rolling of heads responsible, a promise to exert tighter controls and due compensation to the victim. … Instead, we've responded to Arar by keeping him, his wife and his children on a government watch list so that they cannot travel in or over our country or its territories. We have stymied his lawsuit against the United States for abducting and deporting him, claiming that to allow it to go forward would jeopardize state secrets. And, perhaps most galling, even though it is an open secret that we send people to other countries for interrogation where they are sure to be tortured, we continue to claim that our actions are consistent with the Convention Against Torture - a treaty that explicitly bars such conduct." Blumner notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claim that there is reason to keep Arar on a watch list. But when Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, examined Arar's confidential U.S. files, he announced that there was 'nothing new' to justify any continued suspicion. … Gonzales could only reiterate the bald-faced lie that the United States tries to meet its antitorture treaty obligations. How lame. … When Canada is better at demonstrating American values than we are, it's time our government took a refresher in Civics 101. Learn how to apologize and admit error and maybe our great nation will live up to its billing once again."

WAR NEWS:

Addressing House Democrats, Bush Says Iraq War Is "Sapping Our Nation's Soul." The AP (2/3) reports President Bush "squarely addressed the issue most on the mind of House Democrats, saying Saturday that deep divisions over the Iraq war need not bring anyone's patriotism into question. 'You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that,' Bush said. … He said disagreeing with him over the war -- as many in the room do -- does not mean 'you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do.' 'You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe,' the president said. 'These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do.' Bush's conciliatory words were similar to some of his previous statements. But the applause that followed them offered some indication that this audience was happy to hear them so directly and in person."

All three broadcast networks reported on the meeting, generally casting the President's visit in a positive light. ABC World News (2/3, story 5, 2:30, Weir, 8.78M) said, "A day of political fence mending as President Bush reached out to House Democrats at their meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia. The President hasn't addressed the Democrats gathering since 2001, and poked a little him fun at himself with his opposition now in power in Capitol Hill. But for all the banter, divisions, especially over Iraq, were very much in evidence." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 5, 1:40, Chen, 7.66M) said that Democrats" stopped just short of licking their chops as they welcomed the other team's quarterback into their arena," but "both sides canned the usual trash talk. The President stayed away from his pre-election 'cut-and-run slams' against Democrats' plans for Iraq, and gave a nod to the Speaker's demands for benchmark for Iraq's leaders." NBC Nightly News (2/3, story 3, 2:30, Yang, 9.87M) said, "The last time President Bush met with House Democrats like this was February 2001. He just had been elected; 9/11 was months away. Today's visit was very different. The tone on both sides was concilatory."

On its Web site, The Hill (2/3, Kaplan) reports Bush "admitted that the country's morale has suffered because of the war in Iraq. Bush said that the war in Iraq is 'sapping our nation's soul,' as part of his answer to a question from Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) about why the burden of fighting the Iraq war has fallen primarily on the military. … Democratic aides were stunned at the pronouncement perhaps recollecting President Carter's pronouncement in 1979 that there exited a 'crisis of the spirit in our country.'

The Politico (2/3, Hearn) reports that when "asked whether the president had responded to Democrats' criticism of his plan to send more troops to Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., offered a flat: 'No.' 'The president really stood his ground on Iraq,' she said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Levey, 850K) reports Bush "invite[d] the new congressional majority to work with him on immigration, energy and even national security. … But even the meticulous planning that went into the encounter could not conceal the deep divisions" and "no issue brought out the divisions more than the war in Iraq. The president devoted less than two minutes of his 16-minute address to the subject. And his attempt to highlight common ground over the feeling that the Iraqi government should do more to bridge sectarian divisions offered little comfort to his critics. The president suggested, as he has before, that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki would have to meet a list of 'benchmarks,' including providing adequate troops to help American soldiers in Baghdad. But Bush did not discuss timetables for Maliki's government or specify consequences if it should fail — omissions that have been repeatedly criticized by Democrats."

Bush Strikes Conciliatory Notes During Speech. The AP (2/3, Loven) reports, "Relying on self-deprecating jokes, unusual candor and outright flattery, President Bush on Saturday wooed lawmakers he not only needs but will have to answer to in the final two years of his presidency."

The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Abramowitz, Kane, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation," reports that the president, "forced by circumstance to reach out to some of his strongest adversaries, appealed directly to House Democrats on Saturday to work with him to reform the immigration system, limit the cost of Social Security, curb the consumption of gasoline and balance the federal budget. Visiting the Democrats' annual retreat for the first time since 2001, the president told lawmakers there are 'big things' they could accomplish by working together and sought to defuse any bad blood with self-deprecating humor. He opened his public remarks with an allusion to his tendency to mispronounce the name of the rival party by calling it the Democrat Party, seen by many party activists as a calculated insult." According to the Post, "Democrats rose to politely applaud Bush before and after the speech, a sign of the outwardly cordial and respectful nature of the day's session."

The New York Times (2/4, A26, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "for nearly two hours, Mr. Bush held forth with some of the very Democrats he has spent the better part of six years sparring with. He spoke to members of Congress and their spouses, took pointed questions in a private session about Iraq, the budget deficit and immigration, and shook hands and posed for pictures. … The political reality, of course, requires Mr. Bush to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency if he wants his legacy to include legislation like overhauling the nation's immigration and health care systems, and beginning to curb America's dependence on foreign oil. … The president's speech, which lasted about 16 minutes, was interrupted by applause 21 times. Occasionally, the clapping seemed tepid, as some legislators looked across the room to see whether fellow Democrats were joining in. At other times, particularly if Mr. Bush delivered a self-deprecating line, the clapping boomed."

The New York Times (2/4, WK1, Stolberg, 1.16M), in a "Week in Review" piece reports, "Now that Democrats are in charge, the president is making a great show of Congressional outreach. Consider the last week: On Tuesday, Mr. Bush agreed on a bipartisan panel to advise him on the war. On Wednesday…Pelosi dropped by the Oval Office to report on her trip to Iraq. On Friday, Mr. Bush held a White House reception for Republican senators. On Saturday, he was headed to Williamsburg, Va., to a House Democratic retreat. But there is little evidence that the Congressional courtship has influenced the president who famously called himself 'the decider,' whether the issue is Social Security or the decision to send more troops to Iraq."

Bush Signals Willingness To Work With Democrats On Immigration. The Washington Times (2/4, A1, Dinan, 88K) titles its account of the meeting "Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat," and reports that Bush and House Democrats "got off to a good start in finding common ground yesterday at the Democrats' annual retreat -- with Mr. Bush saying they even share a bond in having been shot in the back by Republicans on immigration. 'You are not the only one with arrows in your back,' the president said during a closed-door question-and-answer session with the House Democratic Caucus, according to two individuals who were in the room. He was responding to Rep. Luis Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat, who said Republicans had been merciless during last year's elections in attacking Democrats on border security. He asked Mr. Bush to win more Republican support for the Democrats' preferred bill. To a round of applause, the president said he will fight for a bill that does not deport illegal aliens. Mr. Bush said it would be a mistake to miss the opportunity for reform this year and let the issue enter the 2008 election campaign, when he worried it would become too political."

At Least 130 Killed By Baghdad Truck Bomb. Coverage of the high-casualty suicide bombing in Baghdad emphasized the scale of the carnage and the pall it cast over efforts to stabilize Iraq. ABC World News (2/3, story 4, 1:30, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Baghdad is reeling from one of the worst attacks of the war. A 2,000-pound truck bomb driving into a crowded marketplace and unleashing carnage on a marketplace. Over one hundred killed and hundreds injured and the White House is calling the brazen attack an atrocity." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 3, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "It was the second time this market has been targeted in less than two months. Three car bombs killed fifty one people there last December. ... tonight, in what was thought to be revenge for the bombing, mortars rained down on Sunni neighborhoods, a sign that it will take more than words to stop the cycle of violence here." NBC Nightly News (2/3, lead story, 2:30, Arraf, 9.87M), reported, "It was the latest in a series of devastating attacks in dense Shi'ia areas."

The New York Times (2/4, A1, Oppel, Mizher, 1.16M) reports, "A mammoth truck bomb obliterated a popular central Baghdad market on Saturday, ripping through scores of shops and flattening apartment buildings, killing at least 130 people and wounding more than 300 in the worst of a series of horrific attacks against Shiites in recent weeks. ... It was the deadliest single bomb blast since the United States invasion almost four years ago." The bombing "seemed sure to inflame Shiite political and militia leaders just as more than 20,000 American troops begin to arrive in an attempt to stop the civil war that threatens to tear Iraq apart." The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Londono, 690K) reports, "The attack followed a recent string of bombings targeting places where Shiites congregate in Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. Officials say Sunni insurgents are behind the violence." Maliki spokesman Ali Dabbagh "blamed Syria for not doing enough to stop the violence, saying that 50 percent of insurgents enter Iraq through Syria."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, A1, Susman, 850K) reports that the attack "was designed to inflict a massive physical as well as psychological toll." The payload "included land mines, ammunition, rockets, mortars and other explosives, which erupted in a fireball and sent buildings crashing down on top of merchants and customers, said Maj. Gen. Jihad Jabiri of Iraq's Interior Ministry. The White House and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced the attack, which was another reminder that their vows to counter spiraling bloodshed with increased troops are having no deterrent effect." The Chicago Tribune (2/4, Sly, 617K) reports, "Two buildings were obliterated, 10 others collapsed, dozens of stalls were incinerated, and many victims died instantly in the huge explosion, which reverberated across the city. ... this bombing was shocking, in its size and in the number of casualties inflicted," even by Iraq's standards. The bombing occurred "40 days after the execution of Saddam Hussein, prompting some speculation that it was intended to mark the day normally commemorated as the end of the traditional mourning period in Iraq."

The AP (2/4, Hurst) reports, "Suspected Sunni attackers have appeared emboldened in recent weeks after radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, under pressure from fellow Shiites who dominate the government, ordered the thousands of gunmen in his Mahdi Army militia to avoid American attacks in the coming assault." An Interior Ministry general "called for the government to 'deport (non-Iraqi) Arabs immediately.' The general's comments reflected growing displeasure inside the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with neighboring Syria, which Baghdad charges has done too little to close its border to Sunni militants." BBC.com (2/4) reports the "attacks on markets are widely seen as Sunni insurgent groups stepping up their activities before a new joint Iraqi-US security operation in Baghdad gets under way."

Bush's Iraq Plan Said To Hinge On "Go-For-Broke" Reforms. A 1,500-word piece in today's Washington Post (2/4, A16, DeYoung, 690K) says "doubts run deep" about the probable success of many reforms in Iraq. "The success of the Bush administration's new Iraq strategy depends on a series of rapid and dramatic political and economic reforms that even the plan's authors have little confidence will work. In the current go-for-broke atmosphere, administration officials say they are aware that failure to achieve the reforms would result in a repeat of last year's unsuccessful Baghdad offensive, when efforts to consolidate military gains with lasting stability on the ground did not work. This time, they acknowledge, there will be no second chance." Several anonymous sources described "the administration as standing on the brink of an intricate combination of maneuvers whose outcome is far from assured." The Post cites several "deep uncertainties," including Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's ability and commitment "to spearheading what the administration foresees as a fundamental realignment of Iraqi politics." Also in question, the Post says, is "whether Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and its sluggish financial bureaucracy will part with $10 billion for rapid job creation and reconstruction, at least some of it directed to sectarian opponents; and whether the U.S. military and State Department can calibrate their own stepped-up reconstruction assistance to push for action without once again taking over."

Antiwar Criticism Of Rice Said To Be Increasing. In an analysis of changing criticism of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the New York Times (2/4, Cooper, 1.16M) notes, "For six years, first as national security adviser and then as secretary of state," Rice "worked under the cover of a very effective shield: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was the administration's lightning rod for criticism over its handling of Iraq. But in recent weeks, with Mr. Rumsfeld gone, Ms. Rice has faced increased, and somewhat unfamiliar, criticism." The "criticism of Ms. Rice has yet to reach the decibel level of that directed against Mr. Rumsfeld, and it may never get to that point, in part because she is not highhanded in her behavior toward colleagues and underlings, her close friends and aides said." Rice "has yet to inspire that level of exasperation from colleagues, either from inside the State Department or the National Security Council," but "she sometimes does take criticism personally."

Japan's Aso Calls Initial Iraq Occupation "Very Naïve." AFP (2/4) carries remarks by Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, in which he "criticised the US occupation of Iraq as 'very naïve' and blamed it for spiralling unrest there, in another swipe at US tactics by the key Washington ally." He said former Secretary Rumsfeld "'started off the war, but the operation after the occupation was very naive. Because this operation did not work well, it (Iraq) is in trouble now. It became clear that the operation after a war is very important when you think about peace-building.'" AFP notes Aso's remarks "follow those by Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma, who has made a series of critical comments about US policies. Last month Kyuma said US President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq and warned that Tokyo might not automatically renew its air force mission to the war-torn country."

Prophets Of Iraqi Troubles Saddened To Be Proven Right. The Washington Post (2/4, D1, Duke, 690K) reports, "It is the culture of this town -- trafficking in rightness. People clamor day in and day out, in that polished and politic way of the Washingtonian, to be proved right. But on Iraq, the vindicated are pained. There is no gloating -- not with thousands of people dead, Americans and Iraqis; not with the Iraq war precipitating an ongoing foreign policy crisis that has left the United States' global image in tatters. ... Lots of people predicted things would turn out this way." Now, "a cynical Washington exercise is underway, some of the vindicated say. It's a snake-like shedding of skin, a policy metamorphosis in which people who once were prominent cheerleaders for the war now are cozying up with the war's early opponents and distancing themselves from their earlier roles."

Kristof Looks For Classical Allusions Relevant To Administration. New York Times (2/4, WK17, 1.16M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes, "Thucydides' account of the failed 'surge' in the Sicilian expedition 2,400 years ago is newly relevant, and 'Moby Dick' is interesting reading today as a bracing warning of the dangers of an obsessive adventure that casts aside all rules." Kristof adds, "The classics have an overwhelmingly cautionary bias, operating as a check on any impulsive rush to war. Perhaps that is because…humans have an ingrained psychological tilt to hawkishness."

Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Perry, 850K) reports," Here and elsewhere in the Persian Gulf off Iraq's shores, Iraqis are gradually taking over jobs once done by U.S. Marines and sailors. They stand guard on terminals such as this one, which is often compared to the bizarre structures of the movie 'Waterworld.' ... It is a slow process for a nation whose navy was destroyed in the early hours of the 2003 assault led by the United States." The Times continues, "'They're learning as they go, but they're definitely getting better,' said Coast Guard Lt. j.g. Kristopher Ensley, executive officer of the cutter Aquidneck. U.S. officials say Iraq's navy faces the same challenge as its army: changing a top-down style that does not encourage leadership in the enlisted ranks."

Contractors To Continue Providing Security In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/4, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports, "The Defense Department plans to continue hiring private contractors to provide security at reconstruction projects in Iraq and to train U.S. and Iraqi military officers in counterinsurgency, despite problems with past contracts for such jobs that traditionally have been done by military personnel. The contracting out of these wartime activities comes at a time when the United States is stretching its resources to provide the additional 21,500 troops in Iraq that are needed under President Bush's new strategy."

Bremer Eager To Defend Record. The Politico (2/3, Allen) reports former Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer "plans to point to unexpectedly chaotic conditions in post-Saddam Baghdad as he defends his record at a hearing on Iraq spending before House Democrats on Tuesday, according to sources familiar with his testimony. ... Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has billed it as a 'hearing on waste, fraud and abuse,' one some administration officials have been dreading." Bremer "told Politico he looks forward to committee members' questions, but also plans to give them a 5,000- to 6,000-word treatise in addition to his five-minute opening statement."

Mass Migration Driven By Iraq War. The Washington Post (2/4, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports in a pessimistic article, "Nearly 2 million Iraqis -- about 8 percent of the prewar population -- have embarked on a desperate migration, mostly to Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The refugees include large numbers of doctors, academics and other professionals vital for Iraq's recovery. Another 1.7 million have been forced to move to safer towns and villages inside Iraq, and as many as 50,000 Iraqis a month flee their homes, the U.N. agency said in January." The AP (2/3, Hendawi) reports of the exodus, "When it might peak, nobody knows, but if it continues at its present rate, the consequences for the region would be profound. Iraqis now make up more than 5 percent of Syria's population, the U.N. refugee agency says. Jordan says its 700,000 Iraqis have swollen its population by 12 percent, and its officials say they have already moved to cut off the flow. So has Egypt, with 130,000 Iraqi newcomers."

Key Taliban Figure Killed By NATO Airstrike. The AP (2/4) carries a NATO statement that "NATO-led troops killed a senior Taliban leader with a precision airstrike near a southern Afghan town overrun by militants." Initial reports suggest that Mullah Abdul Gafoor and several associates were killed today "while they were riding in a truck through a small village just outside Musa Qala." Outgoing SACEUR Gen. David Richards told the AP "that 'very surgical and deliberate' force would be used to evict the fighters from Musa Qala, where he said the alliance's strategy of avoiding military action has driven a wedge between residents and Taliban insurgents."

Residents Flee Taliban-Occupied Town. An earlier AP (2/3) report stated, "Hundreds of villagers fled a southern Afghan town overrun by Taliban militants, fearful of a NATO attack on the insurgent fighters who have hoisted their trademark white flag over the town's ransacked government center, residents said."

US General Takes Over NATO Afghan Force. BBC.com (2/4) reports, "UK General David Richards has handed over control of the Nato force in Afghanistan to US General Dan McNeil. During Gen Richards's nine months in charge, the International Security Assistance Force (Isaf) has increased from 9,000 to more than 33,000 troops."

Afghan Schools Take On Taliban. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, King, 850K) reports that a school in Wach Tangi, Afghanistan, "was one of nearly 200 schools across the country burned in the last year by Islamic insurgents. Four hundred more schools were closed by threats and intimidation, driving more than 130,000 students from their classrooms and dealing a harsh blow to massive international efforts to rebuild an education system ravaged during the years of Taliban rule. Over the last three months, however, the rate of attacks has fallen dramatically, with fewer than half a dozen schools believed to have been targeted. ... There are no reliable figures, but the [education] ministry believes more than half the country's 9,000 schools are under some form of locally organized protection, whose effectiveness remains to be seen." On the other hand, "Some educators believe that the recent lull in school burnings and other attacks is only partly due to the establishment of protection committees. Violence traditionally decreases during the coldest months, and they think the insurgents will become more active again during the spring. Other school officials believe that the Taliban, after initially underestimating the strength of the country's education ethic, may have discerned that the school-burning campaign was backfiring."

Former Aid Worker Says Good Intentions Insufficient In Afghanistan. In a Washington Post (2/4, 690K) Outlook piece, former aid worker Holly Barnes Higgins writes, "I went to Afghanistan in October 2005 to work on an economic development project funded by the U.S. government. I went because I believed in the mission: helping to improve the quality of life in a war-torn land. I was lucky to get out. Now I am home, hearing with dismay that President Bush lauds our work as a success and is requesting more aid for Afghanistan. ... I know about the millions of dollars already wasted there." Higgins says of her time in Helmand province, "I now think that the West can do little if anything to quell the opium poppy trade, except to intercept the traffickers. This will be true as long as Helmand's residents refuse to recognize and respect the central government; as long as streets and schools, markets, mosques and government buildings are targeted by suicide bombers; as long as elders strike deals with the Taliban and government officials themselves profit from poppy production."

NYTimes Says Colombian Model Will Not Work In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/4, B1, 1.16M) editorializes, "There is no question that Afghanistan needs to wage a far more effective fight against opium trafficking if it ever hopes to achieve a stable peace. But Colombia -- another United States ally whose narcotics trade is helping finance a lethal insurgency -- is not the model to follow. ... The limited gains Colombia has achieved in recent years have been offset by an overly generous amnesty program for right-wing paramilitary leaders and drug traffickers, which has seriously compromised the rule of law. And American aid has been disproportionately directed into military and police programs, leaving far too little to promote alternative livelihoods for Colombia's farmers. ... The amount of land planted with coca crops has risen and the net harvest has been reduced only slightly. Afghanistan's problems will not be solved by copying these mistakes.

DOJ:

US Attorney Firings Prove Controversial. The Washington Post (2/4, A7, Eggen, 690K) reports, "H.E. 'Bud' Cummins III had served for five years as the U.S. attorney in Little Rock -- a job he obtained in large part because of his credentials as a longtime GOP lawyer and avid supporter of President Bush. So Cummins, 47, was more than a little surprised when he got a call from the Justice Department last year asking him to resign. He was told there was nothing wrong with his performance, but that officials in Washington wanted to give the job to another GOP loyalist." Cummins "was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove. … Cummins was the first in a wave of seven U.S. attorneys to be fired by the Justice Department, a move that has prompted sharp criticism from Democrats in Congress and has set the stage for a legislative battle over the attorney general's power to appoint federal prosecutors." The Post goes on to report, "there is also evidence that broader political forces are at work. One administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing personnel issues, said the spate of firings was the result of 'pressure from people who make personnel decisions outside of Justice who wanted to make some things happen in these places.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Thomas Group To Review Stock Option Grants. The AP (2/4) reports, "Thomas Group Inc., a management consulting firm, said Friday that it is initiating a review of its past stock option granting practices and will report its fourth-quarter and full-year results when the review is complete." The AP continues, "The company said that the stock options review was initiated voluntarily and not in response to an inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission or any other regulatory agency. More than 100 companies are under investigation by the SEC or Justice Department for their stock option granting practices, and at least 93 others have launched their own internal reviews, according to an Associated Press review." The AP adds, "Thomas said it plans to report its full quarterly and full-year earnings and file its Form 10-K annual report by the March 31 filing deadline. … The company did report revenue for the quarter ended Dec. 31 and the full year. Thomas said quarterly revenue increased 26 percent to $14.8 million from $11.7 million in the year-earlier period. For the full-year, revenue increased 38 percent to $59.5 million from $43.1 million in 2005."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Spotlights Cheney's Role In Rebutting Wilson. The Washington Post (2/4, A5, Smith, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "the unanswered question hanging over [Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff Scooter] Libby's trial is, did the vice president's former chief of staff decide to leak that disparaging information on his own? No evidence has emerged that Cheney told him to do it. But Cheney's dictated reply [regarding Joseph Wilson's NYTimes op-ed] is one of many signs to emerge at the trial of the vice president's unusual attentiveness to the controversy and his desire to blunt it. His efforts included the extraordinary disclosure of classified information, including one-sided synopses of Wilson's report and a 2002 intelligence estimate on Iraq. Under questioning from FBI agent Deborah S. Bond, Libby acknowledged that he and Cheney 'may have talked' aboard the plane from Norfolk that day about whether to make public Plame's CIA employment, Bond testified Thursday. Her testimony brought Cheney closer than ever to the heart of the controversy surrounding the Bush administration's efforts to discredit Wilson."

Libby Lawyers Fighting Release Of Grand Jury Testimony Tapes. The AP (2/4, Apuzzo) reported, "Former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby is fighting to keep his grand jury testimony about the leak of a CIA officer's name from being released and broadcast. That testimony -- the sworn statements Libby gave investigators about his conversations with Vice President Cheney and journalists -- is at the heart of his perjury trial. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to play hours of recordings of that testimony in court next week to bolster his case that Libby lied and obstructed Fitzgerald's leak investigation." The AP noted, "If the tapes are released, they could be broadcast on television, radio and online. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he worried that would sensationalize an already public trial."

Prosecutors Could Rest Case As Soon As Tuesday. CNN.com (2/4, Courson) reported that prosecutors "plan to rest their case as soon as Tuesday. Nearly a dozen witnesses have taken the stand in the past two weeks. The last witness is expected to be Tim Russert, moderator of NBC's 'Meet the Press.'" CNN added that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "wants the jury to consider two undisclosed newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office files. Defense attorneys have objected, saying the articles contain all manner of hearsay they would not be able to challenge in court. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton hopes to rule on the evidence by the time the trial resumes Monday."

Rich Says Cheney "Lost It" During Interview. The New York Times' Frank Rich (2/4, WK16) writes, "In the days since Dick Cheney lost it on CNN, our nation's armchair shrinks have had a blast. The vice president who boasted of 'enormous successes' in Iraq and barked 'hogwash' at the congenitally mild Wolf Blitzer has been roundly judged delusional, pathologically dishonest or just plain nuts. … The vice president's on-camera crackup reflected his understandable fear that a White House cover-up was crumbling. He knew that sworn testimony in a Washington courtroom would reveal still more sordid details about how the administration lied to take the country into war in Iraq. He knew that those revelations could cripple the White House's current campaign to escalate that war and foment apocalyptic scenarios about Iran. Scariest of all, he knew that he might yet have to testify under oath himself."

Libby Defense Seeks To Block WPost Articles. The Washington Post (2/4, A5, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "The day of his interview with the FBI" Libby "hand-marked copies of two Washington Post articles about the breadth of a criminal leak investigation -- and underlined were passages suggesting that any official who had told reporters about a CIA officer could be in legal jeopardy, prosecutors said in court filings yesterday. Government prosecutors argued that the October 2003 articles -- stored in former chief of staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's personal folders, and printed from the Internet at his request -- show that Libby had a motive to lie about his secret conversations with reporters and knew that he could be in trouble. The prosecutors are urging presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to let the articles be placed into evidence so the jury can see them. … Defense attorneys argued in competing filings yesterday that the Oct. 4 and Oct. 12 articles, written by Walter Pincus and Mike Allen, would prejudice the jury against Libby. They say the articles are 'inflammatory' because they indicate that Plame had been engaged in covert work in recent years and that revelations about her identity could harm national security interests -- both issues that, they argue, the judge has ruled are not relevant to Libby's trial."

Reporter Provides Behind-The-Scenes Look At Libby Trial. In a behind the scenes look at the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, CNN.com (2/4) reporter Kevin Bohn reports, "As the trial… goes on, we are learning more and more about special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's investigation, which was prompted by the leak that Valerie Plame was an undercover CIA agent. … Now we learning what witnesses told FBI agents or testified before a grand jury, and we are gaining more insight through the release of many documents related to the case. … Those range from a mundane calendar of then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman to the often-talked about memo from the State Department's intelligence unit about former ambassador Joseph Wilson's 2002 trip to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain uranium in Africa." CNN adds, "We have seen correspondence between the Justice Department and Fitzgerald's office and Vice President Dick Cheney's office asking for documents, as well as subpoenas that were issued. … In fact, David Addington, the vice president's current chief of staff, says his office handed over more than 12,000 documents as part of the probe, including many handwritten notes from Libby himself. … Some of those notes had to be analyzed by experts to figure out exactly what Libby was saying since his handwriting is notoriously bad." CNN notes, "One unusual thing in this trial: allowing the jurors to ask questions of witnesses. Lawyers say it's rare in federal courtrooms but occurring more in some federal trials. … The presiding judge, Reggie Walton, is a former superior court judge where this practice is more common. Some lawyers say there is a lot of discussion about this type of activity to try to get the jury more involved and to allow them to address any doubts they might have. … Jurors have so far posed several questions for most of the witnesses."

FBI Investigating Miller's Failure To Pay Taxes On Land Sales. The New York Times (2/4, A20, Steinhauer, Shenon, 1.16M) reports the FBI is investigating whether Rep. Gary Miller "improperly used an unusual tax provision to avoid paying capital gains taxes on profits from land sales to California cities, law enforcement and government officials said. Last summer, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group, filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service saying that Mr. Miller had failed to pay capital gains tax on the 2002 sale of 165 acres in Monrovia, Calif. The complaint said Mr.

Miller invoked a rarely used provision that allows tax deferment if the land that is sold is facing an eminent domain threat and the protected proceeds are reinvested within two years. Mr. Miller, who would have faced about a 30 percent tax on the property under a normal sale, used the roughly $10 million in profits from the Monrovia sale to buy property in Fontana, Calif., from Lewis Operating Corp., one of his major campaign contributors, and then resold some of that land to the City of Fontana in 2005 and later in 2006."

FBI Arrests Longtime Kentucky Mayor On Suspected Corruption Charges. The Lexington Herald-Leader (2/4) reported, "Federal authorities have arrested a longtime Eastern Kentucky mayor who lost re-election last November. Former Manchester Mayor Daugh K. White was being held yesterday at the Laurel County Detention Center on federal charges," although the "charge against White was not available. The FBI raided Manchester City Hall last October and seized a variety of records, but has not disclosed the nature of its investigation. However, a state audit released in December said that while White was mayor, the city misused taxpayers' money by paving more than 30 private driveways, making undocumented loans to employees and private companies and paying for personal travel expenses of city workers." The Herald-Leader notes, "White becomes the third Clay County public figure arrested by federal authorities in the last few months."

Indictment Expected Soon In FBI Probe Of Pennsylvania State Senator. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/4, Shiffman, Cattabiani, McCoy) reported, "The four-year investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is coming to an end, and lawyers familiar with the case expect him to be indicted soon, possibly as early as Tuesday. Fumo, one of the most powerful politicians in Pennsylvania, last year received a target letter -- a formal notice that he is likely to face charges related to the fraud and obstruction-of-justice probe. … 'He's looking forward to clearing his name,' said a person close to the Philadelphia Democrat." The Inquirer noted, "Since 2003, the FBI and IRS have grilled everyone from Fumo's florist to a Senate-paid private eye. … But the heart of the case appears to be whether Fumo illegally exploited a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity to fund his personal and political agenda - using it, as one person close to the case put it, 'as his personal piggy bank.'"

FBI Probe Of Perata Appears To Have Stalled. The San Mateo County Times (2/4, Harmon) reported, "Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata has spent nearly $1 million defending himself against a federal probe into whether he illegally funneled money to family and close associates. But more than two years after the harsh light of suspicion first fell on the 61-year-old East Bay Democrat, the FBI investigation appears to have fallen quietly into a black hole of obscurity. The flurry of subpoenas flying out of FBI offices in San Francisco has slowed to an apparent stop. There haven't been any publicly acknowledged FBI interviews of witnesses since last summer." The Times added, "Perata refuses to talk about the investigation with reporters and it appears to be a nonissue in the Capitol. … But no one knows if another shoe is out there ready to drop. The FBI has made no comment on where the investigation is, whether they're about to indict or if they're ready to close up shop — and a spokeswoman said they won't comment."

Scope Of "Operation Dollar Bill" Continues To Expand. The Providence Journal (2/4, Stanton) reported, "Politicians are looking over their shoulder, witnesses are lawyering up and the FBI and state police have spent many hours at the State House library, poring over the arcane details of committee votes and the travel of legislation. Welcome to Operation Dollar Bill, the newly minted federal corruption probe that seeks to connect the dots between dollars, as in payoffs, and bills, as in legislation." The Journal added, "Like a hurricane gathering force, a case that began three years ago with one state senator, John A. Celona, has gained sufficient strength to recently earn its own name in the FBI register. Not since Operation Plunder Dome, the corruption probe of Providence City Hall that brought down Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., has Rhode Island seen such a high-profile public corruption case. And this case is bigger. While Plunder Dome focused on one mayor and one city, Operation Dollar Bill encompasses 'multiple entities and a lot of players,'" according to US Attorney Robert Clark Corrente. However, "Corrente noted last week that an investigation does not necessarily lead to criminal charges, and he declined to identify specific targets."

FBI Investigating Top Aide To Minnesota Sheriff. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (2/3, Gottfried) reported, "Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher said Friday the FBI is investigating a high-level civilian aide in his department. Mark Naylon, a public information officer and Fletcher's friend, is being investigated for allegations of criminal conduct, the sheriff said. … No other county employees were being investigated, he said." The Pioneer-Press noted, "The FBI contacted Fletcher about its investigation into Naylon for the first time Friday and asked for a meeting, the sheriff said. Agents requested documents and access to employees for interviews. Fletcher said his office is cooperating." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/4, McEnroe, Smith, Padilla) added, "Sources have told the Star Tribune that the FBI is particularly interested in Naylon's relationship with the Hell's Outcasts motorcycle gang, which has a history of gun and drug trafficking. … Officially, Naylon is the office's public information officer. Fletcher said that Naylon also has played a key role for the office's interaction with drug and gun task forces."

Killings Of Four Indiana Men Spark Fear Among Homeless. The New York Times (2/4, Saulny) reports, "The first two bodies were found on a hunch in early January in South Bend, Ind., during a search of an old industrial part town. Two police officers popped open the lid of a manhole and down there, beaten to death and stacked upright one above the other, were two missing men, Michael S. Nolan Jr. and Michael W. Lawson." The Times continues, "Just three days later, as the investigation expanded, the police opened another manhole about 100 yards away from the first and found two more men, Jason A. Coates and Brian Talboom, their bodies bludgeoned and discarded underground the same way. … To one officer on the scene, Sgt. David Wells, the discovery seemed more like something from a dark crime drama than anything that tranquil and academic South Bend had ever experienced. 'It was really horrific,' Sergeant Wells said. 'And really perplexing.'" The Times notes, "The four men had only two things in common: they lived together in a burned-out building that they had painstakingly transformed into a makeshift home. And they made money by 'scrapping' — hunting the urban landscape for increasingly valuable and marketable metals like copper and brass to sell to recyclers and construction businesses. … On Saturday night, the police announced that two homeless men had been arrested and charged with murder in the four deaths, said Capt. Jeffrey Walters of the South Bend Police Department. … The men, Daniel J. Sharp, 56, and Randy L. Reeder, 50, were being held in St. Joseph County, Ind., and Berrien County, Mich., respectively, according to The Associated Press. The police said Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder killed the four men because they believed they had stolen salvaged scrap metal that Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder had intended to sell. … The killings have fostered a sense of dread in the unusually tight-knit community of homeless men and women in South Bend."

Michigan Man Sentenced For Offering Bribe To Iraqi Police Official. The AP (2/4) reports, "A suburban Detroit man who worked as a translator in Iraq was sentenced today to three years in prison for offering a bribe to a police official for the purchase of armored vests and other equipment for $1 million." The AP continues, "Faheem Mousa Salam, 29, was sentenced in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by Judge Richard J. Leon, according to a statement from the Justice Department. … Salam, of Livonia, pleaded guilty on Aug. 4 to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act." The AP adds, "He admitted that he offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, prosecutors said. Salam said he had 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer to sell. … Salam tried to complete the sale with someone he believed was an official of the training group, but who actually was an undercover agent of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Salam offered the agent a separate payment of $28,000 to $35,000 for his help."

US Indicts Missouri Man On Child Pornography Charges. The Jefferson City (MO) News Tribune (2/4) reports, "David Matthew McCormick is facing new federal charges after a grand jury on Friday issued a new indictment in his case." The Tribune continues, "Bradley J. Schlozman, the United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, announced in a Friday news release the federal grand jury in Jefferson City added a charge in its new, two-count indictment that replaces one issued last Nov. 6. … McCormick, 20, now is charged with possessing child pornography on April 27, 2005, and distributing child pornography over the Internet on March 26, 2005." The Tribune adds, "Friday's indictment also includes a forfeiture allegation, which would require McCormick to give the government any property used to commit the alleged crimes, including two computer hard drives, a computer tower, a compact disc and a cellular camera telephone. … Schlozman said the case is being brought as part of 'Project Safe Childhood,' a nationwide federal Justice Department initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. … The national effort is led by the United States Attorneys' offices, with help from federal, state and local resources to identify and rescue victims and to better locate, apprehend, and prosecute individuals who exploit children using the Internet."

Report Raises Questions About Weed & Seed Grant Spending. The Andover (MA) Eagle Tribune (2/4, Chelf, Church) reports from Methuen, MA, "Methuen police Capt. Kristopher McCarthy treated himself and other top police brass to an afternoon snack of pretzels and water at an Atlanta mall in March 2005 and billed taxpayers $11.22. … Later on, someone wanted cheese sauce, and taxpayers picked up that tab, too - a bill for 45 cents at Mr. Pretzel. … These expenses were among $27,000 in travel costs billed to a $1 million federal grant meant to fight crime in the Arlington district, the city's poorest neighborhood. The receipts are just a small part of the police spending records subpoenaed by the federal government last August. The U.S. attorney's office will not discuss the subpoena, its investigation or whether it is looking into the travel costs." The Tribune continues, "An Eagle-Tribune analysis of the records shows that between 2001 and 2006, the grant known as 'Weed and Seed' paid for 11 trips to conferences across the country for seven people - police Chief Joseph Solomon, his secretary Patricia Giarrusso, Deputy Chief Joseph Alaimo, Lt. Kevin Mahoney, Sgt. Michael Havey, Capt. Katherine Lavigne and McCarthy. … For the first several trips, police officials documented their expenses with receipts backing up each reimbursement claim. But by 2005, police began using a per diem system granting themselves a daily spending allowance. Fewer supporting documents were provided." The Tribune adds, "During the March 2005 trip to Atlanta, Solomon, Giarrusso, Mahoney and McCarthy stayed for nearly six days at the Hyatt Regency on the government's dime. They had dinner at the Hard Rock Cafe, racked up a $70 breakfast bill for three at the Hyatt Hotel, spent another $203 for dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse and took more than $400 worth of cab rides. … McCarthy also expensed $8.06 for breakfast at Logan Airport in Boston. Solomon was paid $305.59 for food and transportation on the trip, but did not submit receipts to the city. … Five months later, the group got together in Los Angeles and did it all again." The Tribune notes, "Solomon, in a written response to questions for this story, said the trips 'form an integral part of the Weed and Seed program' and that federal grant officials expect attendance."

LATimes Mocks Government Efforts To Curtail Gambling. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush in October signed the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, a law intended to resolve any ambiguities about the unlawfulness of placing bets online. Although most fans in the free world can place bets with regulated online casinos, U.S. law enforcement has been busy cracking down on the heinous crime, going after enabling credit card companies, detaining those who run legal foreign online sites if they deign to enter the country and subpoenaing major Wall Street investment banks involved in overseas initial public offerings of online casinos. It's another brazen attempt to extend prudish American mores to other jurisdictions."

FTC Fines Telemarketer $1 Million For Violations. The AP (2/4, Rugaber) reports, "Federal regulators have slapped a $1 million penalty on a telemarketer that automatically dialed and then illegally hung up on more than 64 million people." The AP continues, "A Florida-based company known as The Broadcast Team settled charges brought by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice by agreeing to a court order that will bar them from making similar calls in the future and require them to pay a $1 million penalty. … The Broadcast Team also called more than a million numbers on the national Do Not Call Registry, the FTC said. … The company's principals, Robert J. Tuttle and Mark S. Edwards, were also named in the FTC's complaint." The AP adds, "The FTC said that the company was able to deliver over a million recorded messages per day to voice mailboxes and answering machines. But the company violated the commission's telemarketing sales rule by calling tens of millions of numbers and, when the calls were answered by people, hanging up or playing a recording. … The commission's rules require that calls answered by a person rather than an answering machine be connected to a live representative within two seconds, and not be 'abandoned' by hanging up or playing a recording. … Telemarketers that make sales calls or for-profit telemarketers seeking charitable contributions are bound by the restrictions on abandoning calls, the commission said. .. .And the Broadcast Team received more than $2 million in revenue for telemarketing calls that violated the FTC's telemarketing sales rules, the commission said last year." The AP notes, "The Justice Department first filed a complaint in federal court at the FTC's request in December 2005. The complaint said the company abandoned 64 million calls on behalf of debt management companies and more than 450,000 calls made for charities and other purposes. … The complaint also said that the company violated the law by calling numbers on the national "Do Not Call" Registry and for making calls without paying the required annual fee for access to that Registry."

ITT To Settle US-China Technology Case. Bloomberg (2/4, Schmidt, Capaccio) reports, "Defense contractor ITT Corp. may pay as much as $100 million to resolve U.S. charges the company violated export control rules by allowing the transfer of night- vision technology to China, people familiar with the case said." Bloomberg continues, "ITT, the world's biggest maker of night vision goggles, is in advanced talks with Justice Department prosecutors in Virginia, said the people who asked not to be identified because negotiations with the government are continuing and the size of the settlement could still change. The agreement probably will be announced within a few weeks, the people said." Bloomberg adds, "China has been energetic in trying to obtain so-called Generation 3 night-vision technology and develop ways to counteract the devices, analysts say. The goggles, binoculars and scopes are used by soldiers to see clearly when fighting in darkness and low light. … The settlement would be ITT's second in a little more than two years for export control violations. In November 2004, the company agreed to settle a State Department civil case by paying $8 million and improving its internal controls for preventing sensitive technology from falling into the wrong hands. … The company must still honor the terms of the settlement in that case, which involved export violations of night-vision technology and remote sensing equipment for satellites. The agreement with the State Department requires ITT to submit to heightened government scrutiny, including arranging for on-site audits at the request of the agency, until 2009."

Concerns Raised About Report Showing Increase In NYPD Searches. The New York Times (2/4, Lee) reports, "On Friday, the New York Police Department released a report showing that police officers stopped 508,540 people on city streets in 2006, an average of 1,393 a day and quintuple the number from 2002. While it was difficult to find a consensus on the significance of those statistics — good patrolling, overly aggressive officers and more faithful recordkeeping are just a few explanations — it was not hard yesterday in Red Hook to find a handful of that number walking around. … More than half of those stopped, and sometimes frisked, by the police were black. The Red Hook projects have a large black population, a history of crime problems and, at least in a few young men, a wariness of the police." The Times adds, "At a press conference outside police headquarters yesterday, representatives of black and Hispanic officers' groups called the data damning, and renewed calls for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly to step down. … The Police Department said that officers stop people only if they are suspected of committing a crime, and that the practice is vital in getting guns off the streets. About 21,000 of the stops ended in arrests and about 29,000 in summonses."

Officer Convicted In Louima Case To Finish Sentence In NY Halfway House. The New York Times (2/4, Ramirez) reports, "A former police officer convicted of perjury in the 1997 assault on Abner Louima, a case that scarred both the city's race relations and its police force for years, has been released from prison to a halfway house in upstate New York, his lawyer said yesterday." The Times continues, "The officer, Charles Schwarz, 41, was released from a minimum-security facility on a former Air Force base in Duluth, Minn., more than two months ago, said the lawyer, Ronald Fischetti. Mr. Schwarz is expected to complete the remainder of his five-year sentence in May. … Mr. Fischetti would not disclose the location of the halfway house but said Mr. Schwarz's wife, Andra, and 2-year-old son, William, lived nearby. … Mr. Schwarz 'plans to relocate in a different area and doesn't plan to come back to the city,' Mr. Fischetti said, because of unwanted press attention." The Times adds, "In August 1997, Mr. Louima, a Haitian immigrant arrested after a nightclub disturbance, was beaten in a police station's bathroom by an officer who then sodomized him with a broomstick. The officer, Justin A. Volpe, later pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. … Mr. Louima has contended that there was a second officer in the bathroom, Mr. Schwarz. Mr. Schwarz has denied the allegation, and Mr. Volpe also said Mr. Schwarz was not there."

California Taser Task Force To Study Weapon's Effects. The San Jose Mercury News (2/4, Wykes) reports, "The members of the Palo Alto Taser Task Force, beginning their journey toward a decision about whether stun guns should be a part of any police officer's equipment in the city, will get as close as they can Tuesday to test-driving the experience." The News continues, "Part of Palo Alto Police Chief Lynne Johnson's presentation will include videos of people being shocked with a stun gun. … These videos were taken in real-life situations by other police agencies, Johnson said." The News adds, "At last week's meeting, Johnson told the panel that the presentation would include a live Taser stunning of a volunteer from the police department. … Some members of the task force balked at the idea, not wanting to be directly responsible for a deliberate infliction of pain, so Johnson changed to the video format. .. But she held fast to the idea that if the task force is going to educate itself as wholly as possible, the use of a stun gun is important to see." The News notes, "In November, the family of a Fresno man, who died after being stunned by San Jose police, filed a federal lawsuit claiming he was the victim of excessive and unreasonable force. The Santa Clara County coroner included the use of the Taser and pepper spray as a contributing factor in the man's death -- one of the first times that has happened in Santa Clara County. …More than a quarter-million Tasers are in use by police departments nationwide and justified as a control method far less lethal than a gun. … The San Jose Police Department was the first in the Bay Area to use the weapon. Other Taser-carrying departments now include Gilroy, Fremont, Morgan Hill, Belmont, San Bruno, San Mateo and San Mateo County SWAT teams. … The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing its use and researchers at Wayne State University in Indiana are applying biomedical engineering to determine if a stun gun can be made safer by lessening its power."

Curb Cuts Offer Disabled An Easier Way To Get Around. McClatchy Newspapers (2/4, Greve) reports, "The barricades that quadriplegic Ed Roberts and his comrades stormed nearly 40 years ago were a few inches high. Yet today, millions of Americans pass daily through the breaches they created. … Curb cuts, the breaches are called. Or curb ramps." McClatchy continues, Since 1990, the Americans with Disabilities Act has required them in construction, renovation and wherever a city does major street or sidewalk work. All this curb-ramp building has helped the United States lead the world when it comes to providing public access for people with disabilities. … 'For all this country's many faults, one thing we do better than anybody is architectural-barrier removal,' said Mary Lou Breslin, the co-founder and senior policy adviser of the Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, based in Berkeley. By her estimate, more than 60 countries are trying to catch up." McClatchy adds, "Curb ramps also are a boon for bicyclists, stroller-pushers, skateboarders and in-line skaters. They're a help, too, for travelers with wheeled luggage and delivery truckers with hand carts. … In fact, nine out of 10 unencumbered pedestrians will veer off course to take advantage of a curb ramp, according to Jim Terry, an architect specializing in accessible design who studied pedestrian behavior at a shopping mall in Sarasota, Fla." McClatchy notes, "Curb ramps are crucial to independence for people who use wheelchairs, according to architect Bill Hecker of Hecker Design Ltd. in Birmingham, Ala., a specialist in access for people with disabilities. … It's unclear how many ramps are in existence or how much they've cost. The simplest single curb ramp runs about $900, according to Hecker. As a rule, cities put them in when it's convenient or when the Justice Department convinces them that they must."

Former Louisiana Deputy Claims Home Seizure Violated Rights. The Monroe (LA) News-Star (2/4, Gunter, Temple) reports, "Another volley has been fired in the dispute between the Ouachita Parish Sheriff's Office and some of its former deputies." The News-Star continues, "Former deputy Stan Felts said he has filed a federal civil rights complaint against Lt. Mike Rowlan and Chief Deputy Joe Davis. … Felts was a 16-year employee of the Sheriff's Office and headed up the department's Special Crimes Apprehension Team before resigning Jan. 4 with the rank of sergeant. His resignation came in the middle of an Internet scandal that accuses the department of corruption. The complaint alleges that Davis and Rowlan, who has been the major target of the Internet postings, conspired under color of the law to deprive Felts and his wife of their civil rights to privacy." The News-Star adds, "The complaint states that Rowlan, under Davis' direction, tried in July 2003 to remove a personal computer from Felts' western Ouachita Parish residence without probable cause or without trying to obtain a search warrant. … Felts' federal filing follows a lawsuit filed Jan. 25 by Rowlan naming three former deputies — Gene Caviness, Jacob Greer and Todd Newton — claiming defamation, invasion of privacy and Internet stalking. The postings on the Copwatch.com Web site accuse Rowlan of illegal activity and accuse Sheriff Richard Fewell of covering up for him. Rowlan works with Metro Narcotics Unit, and the postings on Copwatch.com revealed his identity by showing his driver's license photo and even his home address." The News-Star notes, "Only Greer was employed by the department at the time of the Internet postings and was fired after an internal investigation revealed he passed along his personal identification number to Newton so Newton could enter the Thinkstream law enforcement information center. Newton had left the Sheriff's Office for a job with the West Monroe Police Department. … Caviness was working with the FBI Task Force through his employment with the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office. After the internal investigations by the Sheriff's Office and West Monroe police, Caviness resigned his job with FBI Task Force but still works with the East Carroll Sheriff's Office."

DOJ Asked To Monitor New York Election. The New York Times (2/4, Lambert) reports, "The already ferocious campaign to fill a State Senate seat on Long Island reached a new pitch yesterday with a mass mailing featuring Osama bin Laden, accusations of improper donations, and a request for federal monitors to guard against voter intimidation at the polls on Tuesday." The Times continues, "The contest has drawn intense statewide political attention because a Democratic victory would edge that party closer to controlling the Senate. Unions and other special interest groups are funneling money and workers into the contest, which could become New York's most expensive state legislative race. … Gov. Eliot Spitzer has taken a direct role by campaigning and filming a television commercial for the Democratic nominee, Craig M. Johnson. Equally determined to preserve their majority, top Republicans are marshalling their forces behind their candidate, Maureen O'Connell." The Times adds, "Citing fears that Republicans will challenge the legitimacy of Democratic voters on Election Day to sway the outcome, the Democratic campaign formally asked the United States Department of Justice to dispatch monitors to polling places to prevent 'voter intimidation' and voting delays. … 'Independent federal monitors are critical to ensure a fair election,' the request said. A Justice Department spokeswoman said the request was under review."

The Long Island Newsday (2/4, Hadrick) reports, "Democrats raised the issue of intimidation this week after Republicans requested that poll inspectors be supplied with voter challenge forms and validation oaths. … Nassau Republican Chairman Joseph Mondello said, 'We welcome federal monitoring because it will prevent anyone from running people in from New York City who are not eligible to vote in Nassau County.'" Newsday adds, "A Justice Department spokeswoman said the agency is considering Johnson's request and will decide by Monday 'if there is a factual and legal basis that warrants' monitors."

US Shiites Complain Of Discrimination By Sunni Organizations. The New York Times (2/4, A1, MacFarquhar, 1.16M) reports, "Escalating tensions between Sunnis and Shiites across the Middle East are rippling through some American Muslim communities, and have been blamed for events including vandalism and student confrontations. … Some Shiite students said they had faced repeated discrimination, like being formally barred by the Sunni-dominated Muslim Student Association from leading prayers." According to the Times, "At the University of Michigan's campus in Dearborn, the Muslim association pushed through rules that effectively banned Shiites from leading collective prayers. … At Rutgers University, the tension started last year after…conservative Sunni students began openly mocking Shiites, and considered barring women from leading the student association. Several students involved said the group was heavily influenced by teachings from Saudi Arabia."

California To Export Inmates To Other States. The New York Times/AP (2/4, A23) reports, "As many as 5,000 California convicts will be transferred out of state to ease an overcrowding crisis in the state prison system, the top corrections official said Friday. 'We are severely overcrowded, and the need for more space is absolutely critical,' James E. Tilton, the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, said in a statement. 'This decision is being made to protect public safety.' In December, a federal judge warned that he would start releasing inmates early or prohibit convicts from being sent to state prisons from county jails unless the state acted immediately to ease overcrowding. The threat followed an executive order signed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in October authorizing voluntary and involuntary transfers of up to 5,000 inmates."

Faked Letters Cloud Dispute Over Monsanto's Bid For Delta & Pine. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/4, Melcer) reports, "Biotech crop giant Monsanto Co.'s proposed purchase of the nation's largest cottonseed company is alarming some farmers and agribusiness competitors — but Charles Martin isn't one of them." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Martin said he doesn't know how a letter opposing the deal, bearing his name, address and purported signature, was sent to a U.S. senator by a former congressional colleague as part of a lobbying campaign. … The letter identifies Martin as a longtime family farmer. 'Somebody is using my name falsely,' said Martin, a retired mechanical engineer from Hawkinsville, Ga. 'I've never farmed. … I can't even raise dust.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "The letter is one part of varied efforts aimed at derailing Creve Coeur-based Monsanto's plan to buy Delta & Pine Land Co. of Scott, Miss., for $1.5 billion. Opponents say the acquisition would give Monsanto too much control over American cotton. … Some opponents are pushing for congressional hearings on the deal, which Washington observers say are unlikely. Letter-writing campaigns are sparking interest among states' attorneys general; 32 have requested information from Monsanto. Staff at a Minneapolis public-relations firm are e-mailing appeals for an outcry in regions where no cotton is planted. … Monsanto already provides — and profits from — genetic traits that last year protected nearly 86 percent of the U.S. cotton crop from worms, herbicide or both, according to data from the Agriculture Department. … If Monsanto buys D&PL and fulfills a related promise to sell its own Stoneville cottonseed business, Monsanto's share of the U.S. cottonseed market will jump to nearly 50 percent, up from about 12 percent. In a half-dozen Southern states where D&PL is the preferred brand, that market share would top 85 percent."

Lame-Duck Delta CEO Leads Successful Takeover Resistance. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/4, Hirschman, Grantham) reports, "At first glance, the battle for Delta Air Lines seemed likely to be a rout. … The youthful, dynamic executive team at US Airways seized the initiative last fall when it launched a surprise takeover bid that caught a wounded Delta off guard." The AJC continues, "The group had already transformed a second-tier airline, the Tempe, Ariz.-based America West, into a major player by buying US Airways and taking its name a year earlier. By snatching Delta from bankruptcy court, 45-year-old Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker would get a tarnished gem and create the world's biggest airline in a single audacious stroke. … All that stood in the way was lame-duck Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein who, at 74, already planned to step down as soon as the Atlanta icon got out of bankruptcy court. He led a corps of untested executives who got their jobs when the previous executive team bailed out with controversial bonuses and protected pensions. Delta's 45,000-member work force had been battered by a string of layoffs, pay cuts and benefit reductions." The AJC adds, "Grinstein vowed to resist the US Airways offer, but some wondered if the opposition would wilt. Many airline analysts — always eager to see fewer players in the fractious industry — thought the deal would be a long-awaited catalyst for consolidation. … What neither US Airways nor Wall Street anticipated, however, was the high-spirited campaign Grinstein and Delta workers waged to defeat the merger proposal, which died last week when the airline's bankruptcy creditors refused to back it. Instead, they endorsed Delta's standalone reorganization plan, forcing Parker to abandon his $10 billion bid." The AJC notes, "Delta's strategy took advantage of Grinstein's long experience as a smooth boardroom operator and persuasive leader, as well as workers' hunger for a positive cause to rally around … It also benefited from the daunting obstacles that have long made large-scale airline mergers easier to talk about than pull off. While such deals may make financial sense, they are rarely popular with labor leaders, politicians or passenger advocates — and merger foes played those cards as well."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

CDC Flu Pandemic Drill Halted By Weather Concerns. The Washington Post (2/4, A3, Brown, 690K) reports the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention "held a pandemic 'war game' here [Georgetown] last week but aborted it at midnight Wednesday, halfway through its planned 24-hour run. The reason -- ironically, but perhaps not surprisingly -- was concern about public safety. CDC did not want a hundred of its most valuable employees rushing on Thursday morning over ice-slick roads to a mock disaster. … CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, who spent Wednesday facing nail-biting pseudo-decisions -- and made the real one to call things off -- was happy with half a pandemic."

Administration's "Interference" With Climate Change Research Denounced. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) Chris Mooney, author of 'The Republican War on Science,' and Alan Sokal, professor of physics at New York University, write, "By beginning to investigate the Bush administration's interference with scientists' work on global warming, the Democratic Congress has embarked on a key task: restoring respect for science — and more generally, for evidence and reason — in the federal government. That we need such reform, and from Democrats, is a historic irony, because it's the Republicans who have often tried to paint themselves as defenders of 'sound science' against ideologically motivated attacks."

Bush's Global Warming Measures Considered "Demonstrably Inadequate." The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M) editorializes, "Should Congress require any further reason to move aggressively to limit greenhouse gas emissions, it need only read Friday's report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the world's authoritative voice on global warming. … As we have learned over the years, talk is cheap in Washington, while meaningful action is almost certain to be expensive. President Bush has brandished those very real costs of moving to a new energy-delivery system again and again to argue against mandatory caps on emissions and to make the case for his own cost-free (and demonstrably inadequate) program of voluntary reductions. Yet what the panel is telling us is that the costs of doing nothing, especially to future generations, will be far greater than the price of acting now."

FBI, Los Angeles Police Cracking Down On Rising Gang Violence. The Chicago Tribune (2/4, Martinez) reported, "With one recent study enumerating 40,000 members in 700 gangs in Los Angeles, the city is the originator and exporter of dangerous gangs gone national, such as the Bloods, the Crips and Mara Salvatrucha 13 (MS-13), said FBI spokesman Kenneth Smith. … Chicago Crime Commission President Jim Wagner acknowledged Los Angeles as a breeding ground for gangs that are now in Chicago's western suburbs." The Tribune added that "on Wednesday, local officials and the FBI office in Los Angeles will host a long-planned summit with law officials from the U.S., Canada and Central America on 'transnational' gangs such as MS-13, which has ties to El Salvador. During the conference, the mayor and police chief are expected to announce anti-gang programs emphasizing prevention and intervention, officials said.

3rd Circuit Overturns Pennsylvania Man's Gun Conviction. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/4, Ove) reports, "Jason Korey, suspected by police of being a serial hit man and once described by one detective as 'John Dillinger Jr.' and by another as the 'closest to the devil I'll ever come,' again has proved a slippery target for prosecutors. … Already acquitted of two killings, and with charges of attempting a third withdrawn, he's won another legal battle." The Post-Gazette continues, "An appellate court has thrown out a federal gun conviction that would have sent him to prison for three decades. The case was built largely on evidence from a homicide trial that the district attorney's office lost. … The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last month that faulty jury instructions by U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster might have influenced jurors to convict Mr. Korey in 2005." The Post-Gazette adds, "The appellate court also took the unusual step of admonishing the judge for his handling of an inappropriate remark by the prosecutor. Judge Lancaster allowed an assistant U.S. attorney to launch into a speech to the jury instead of apologizing after the remark. … U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is now considering whether her office will retry Mr. Korey, 24, of Baldwin Borough, whose ability to escape homicide charges has long frustrated Pittsburgh police." The Post-Gazette notes, "He was acquitted in 2000 in the 1999 slaying of William Kuhn III, 24, a South Side cocaine dealer. The decision outraged detectives, especially because they believed that Mr. Korey had beaten another murder charge in 1999 when he was acquitted in the killing of Joseph Brucker, 17, of Whitehall. … Police didn't give up, though, and turned instead to the federal court system. … As part of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns, they teamed up with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to link Mr. Korey and the .22-caliber pistol used in the Kuhn killing. … A jury found him guilty of using a gun during a drug-trafficking crime and Judge Lancaster sentenced him to nearly 33 years in prison. … But among several challenges to the sentence, his public defenders said he was denied a fair trial because of prejudicial jury instructions and because the judge allowed Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love to issue an 'apology for foul language that bolstered the prosecutor's reputation.'"

Police Reap Benefits Of Seized Assets. The New York Times (2/4, Domash) reports, "In 2001, federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents gave the Nassau County Police Department Asset Forfeiture Unit a license plate number that was registered to an elderly woman in the county. It was the only lead they had on a suspected major drug and money-laundering operation, but it paid off in arrests — and, for the Nassau police, much more." The Times continues, "After a two-year investigation started by that lead, the Forfeiture Unit executed six search warrants in Nassau County, New York City, Miami and Boston and seized guns, drugs, $300,000 in jewelry, $600,000 in vehicles, $750,000 in cash and $3 million in real property — assets with a total value of more than $4.6 million. Spinoff investigations are continuing, and officials expect that the total forfeitures will eventually exceed an additional $5 million. … Most of that money will wind up in the bank accounts of law enforcement agencies instead of the criminals', paying for a wide array of crime-fighting equipment." The Times adds, "By confiscating equipment used in a crime, like cars; the proceeds of a crime; or items purchased with those proceeds, like jewelry or houses, asset forfeiture is designed to strip criminals of their ability to continue illegal activities. But it also has financial benefits for the police and taxpayers. … Although the Suffolk County Police and some municipal departments have also received forfeiture money, the Nassau County Police have been in the forefront locally in getting it. And the payoff has been substantial. … Nassau County established its forfeiture office in 1992. Twelve years later, Suffolk County started a unit as part of its narcotics bureau. … The forfeiture process is overseen by federal, state and local regulations. Once a prosecution begins, the forfeiture action runs parallel to it, but the distribution is not made until the criminal action is completed. … Distribution is determined by federal and state laws that first require an administrative or judicial finding that the property seized is an instrument or proceed of criminal conduct. The laws then address how the seized assets will be distributed, including the share that each law enforcement agency involved in the investigation will receive."

IMMIGRATION:

Former Circus Acrobat Pleads Guilty In Visa Scam. The Washington Times (2/4, Seper) reports, "A former acrobat has pleaded guilty to charges of helping as many as 870 foreign nationals enter the United States illegally and making false statements in visa applications, the Justice Department said." The Times continues, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Kristo Ivanov, 70, of Orlando, Fla., entered the plea Thursday before U.S. District Judge Donald P. Dietrich in federal court in Orlando." The Times adds, "In his plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Ivanov admitted that from 2001 to February 2006, he helped the illegal aliens enter or remain in the United States through fraudulent means, preparing visa applications falsely saying they were circus performers coming to work in Florida. … Mrs. Fisher said none of the aliens had been hired by any of the circuses listed in the visa applications, adding that they were 'simply a means for the aliens to enter or remain in the United States.' She said Ivanov charged each alien from $500 to $2,500 to prepare the applications. … 'Ivanov admits to helping hundreds of illegal aliens into the United States under false pretenses so that he could benefit financially,' Mrs. Fisher said. 'We will not allow this type of exploitation of our immigration system, which poses a risk to the security of our nation.' … A Bulgarian native who is now a naturalized American citizen, Ivanov came to the United States in 1980 as an acrobat for Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus. He has owned and operated a circus booking agency, Magic Star Entertainment, of Lake Mary, Fla., for more than five years and used that agency to sponsor illegal aliens to enter or remain in this country."

Contractors Decry Lack Of Rules For Hiring Immigrants. The Denver Post (2/4, Aguilera) reports, "Facing growing public criticism from activists opposed to illegal immigration, Colorado's construction contractors have begun to shed their reluctance to debate the issue publicly. … Contractors are joining a growing chorus of business leaders - including hotels, restaurants and agriculture - who say they are trying to hire only legal workers but lack a foolproof system for confirming an employee's legal status." The Post adds, "A company's best option is the beleaguered Basic Pilot Program, which uses Social Security numbers to verify worker eligibility. But federal authorities acknowledge that Basic Pilot can't reliably show when someone is misusing a citizen's identity. … As a result, the state's contractors say they are left with a difficult choice: Use Basic Pilot and risk hiring undocumented workers or aggressively profile prospective employees, which could lead to legal penalties." The Post notes, "Like contractors, meatpacking company Swift & Co. has walked both sides of the line when hiring, each time leading to federal scrutiny, observers say. … The company's efforts to confirm citizenship of its foreign applicants led to a Justice Department investigation in 2000. The company eventually paid a $200,000 settlement in 2002 and increased its reliance on the Basic Pilot Program. By 2006, however, federal authorities suspected Swift had become a job haven for illegal immigrants. In December, federal authorities raided six Swift plants and arrested 1,282 undocumented workers, many suspected of or charged with identity theft."

Immigration Fees Increase Deemed "Exorbitant" By NYTimes. The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes, "Citizenship and Immigration Services, the beleaguered federal bureaucracy that makes new Americans, has announced plans to increase fees sharply to cover its costs. The agency is distinctive in the federal government for being entirely dependent on fees it collects. It is also notable for backlogs and what its director, Emilio Gonzalez, acknowledges are 'dingy buildings' and 'rude employees.' Mr. Gonzalez promises that if the agency is granted an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers, it will process applications more quickly and take other steps to fulfill its responsibilities, the costs of which have risen sharply since 9/11. … Advocacy groups on both sides of the immigration debate agree that the increases are exorbitant, and we agree."

TAX:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In New York Tax Case. The New York Times (2/4, Johnston) reports, "The federal tax court has ruled in favor of the Internal Revenue Service in a 14-year-old evasion case involving a now-dead lawyer who was one of the nation's leading tax advisers, millions of dollars in reported real estate kickbacks and a Supreme Court ruling that ended a longstanding practice of secrecy in tax court." The Times continues, "In the decision last week, Judge Harry A. Haines of the United States Tax Court ruled that the lawyer, Burton W. Kanter, and two associates had accepted kickbacks from the Pritzker family of Chicago, which owns the Hyatt hotels, and then evaded taxes on the payments. … Lawyers for the three said they were stunned by the decision and would appeal it, expecting it to go to the Supreme Court for a second time." The Times adds, "They said the decision ran counter to the findings of a special trial judge who heard the case in 1994. That judge, they said, determined that small amounts of tax were due because of technical violations but that there was no civil fraud. … The two associates are Claude M. Ballard, a former general partner at Goldman Sachs who before that was a real estate executive at Prudential Insurance, and Robert W. Lisle, a Prudential real estate executive who died before the original trial. Mr. Kanter died in 2001."
